There is a family who inherited a house when their mother died. They live in another house down the road, because it is a very close community. They want to sell both homes so that they can move, and to use some of the resources that they would realise to put their children through higher education. They have tried to sell the houses by significantly reducing the asking price, but both properties are still unsaleable. They sought to rent out one of the properties, but a local accommodation agency advised them that a property that would normally rent at £120 a week cannot be rented out even at £90.

One couple bought a house in 1983. They have had a family since then. The house has two bedrooms, but they have three children. They want to move to a larger property as the children are of different sexes and have grown older. They cannot sell their property. The list goes on and on.

There is a family in which the father has an arthritic spine. He has had an operation, but it was unsuccessful. He has now had a second operation. Doctors and consultants have sent letters to, at that time, Union Railways, but the family have had no luck under the discretionary purchase scheme. They are stuck there.

There is a family who want to buy a business in Devon. They cannot buy it because they cannot sell their house.

In another family, the husband died. The wife is an epileptic and has been advised by doctors not to live alone. She wants to sell the house and go to live with her son.

The parents died in one family and left the house to their three daughters. They cannot sell the house. The list goes on and on.

In one family, the woman is on a breathing apparatus and really needs to move out of the area into a different environment. They cannot sell their house.

There is a family in which an elderly widow suffers from angina. She wanted to buy a bungalow when she retired. She cannot sell her house. It goes on and on.

I think that probably the worst case—it made me very cross—was one in which I was finally able to get Union Railways to agree to purchase the property. The couple in that house were desperate to move. Before the purchase went through, however, the husband died.

Those examples show the proposals' impact on ordinary people in a very ordinary part of London.

The Select Committee's and the ombudsman's reports recognised the importance of blight. On page xxix, referring to environmental improvements, the Select Committee stated:

"Blight cannot be dealt with in this way, and can only be responded to by compensation."

Later, it added:

"Furthermore, we require that the promoter improves the operation of the discretionary purchase scheme to reduce the apparent delays in making payments under the scheme."

The Select Committee stated on page xxxi:

"We have observed that the present law appears totally inadequate in situations in which a reduction in the price of a property is attributable to a project such as the rail link even though the property will not actually be physically affected."

The ombudsman's report stated:

"In my view, it is unquestionable maladministration not to have considered the effects of the policy upon those to be affected by it.

Such maladministration is more evident when the problems caused to individuals by the implementation of a policy become apparent, but still no action is taken to consider a remedy. I have found that that is what happened in respect of the CTRL."

I welcome the Government's response in setting up the interdepartmental working party, although, as I said in Committee, we need a time frame for it. I suspect that the Government will not bring the results of the working party's efforts to the House—I would welcome an assurance to the contrary—before the end of this Parliament.

The French can build railway lines properly—why on earth cannot we do the same? When the French want to construct a railway line, they provide generous compensation to people who, through no fault of their own, experience a diminution in the value of their property and who lose the freedom to move—that primary control over their lives.

Mr. Tony Banks: I endorse what my hon. Friend said, and merely underline her point that the French can construct lines so swiftly because people genuinely welcome them and there is not a long-drawn-out battle, as there is when people realise that they are going to suffer physical and economic hazards. Perhaps that is why the French are able to build lines so much more quickly than we can.

Ms Hodge: I concur with my hon. Friend entirely.

[Ms Hodge]

Additional costs would be involved in a more generous compensation scheme, but in relation to the project as a whole, they would be marginal. Compared with the additional costs that have already been incurred by the delay in this case, the costs of additional compensation would be peanuts. The Government appear to have accepted the additional costs arising from the changes in the scheme, so why cannot they accept the additional costs arising out of an appropriate compensation scheme?

I hope that hon. Members will today take this issue seriously. The question is who pays. In this context, is it fair that ordinary residents—householders who have found that, through no fault of their own, the value of their property has been massively diminished and that their ability to sell it has been annihilated—should pay? In other matters, the Government say that the polluter pays. In this instance, the Government are the polluter and they should pick up the bill and support the three new clauses.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: I have considerable sympathy with the new clauses. The key point is the one that has been made on several occasions—that the House and the country want the rail link, in which case the developer and/or the Government should pay for it. The people who should not pay for it are those whose properties are in the line of the rail link and who face the diminution of the value of their homes and businesses.

Like the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), I have had dozens of people come to my surgery over the years, some with cases just as heart-rending as those that she mentioned. I should point out that this blight hit my constituency all the way back in 1988 when the original route was proposed. So we are no novices in this dreadful business of blight and the compensation that is required.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe) referred to three forms of blight. I strongly support his comments about peripheral blight. Where the rail link goes through the urban area of my constituency, it passes literally thousands of homes. In that broad swathe, those residents have found that they cannot sell their houses or achieve properly secured mortgages. They are well and truly stuck, whether or not the circumstances of their family or employment require them to move. We must examine the matter of peripheral blight.

Another form of blight was brought before the Select Committee, although it did not grapple with it—the blight that brings about bankruptcy. I brought two cases before the House in an Adjournment debate, which were also heard in the Select Committee, of residents in the direct line of the high-speed rail link. They were small business men who used their properties to secure loans for their businesses. In both cases, the security of their loans proved inadequate, the finance ceased to become available and their private companies withered and died. The blight compensation provisions include no provision to compensate people in such dreadful cases.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister's announcement that he will appoint a working party to consider matters of blight. I hope that the working party and the Minister will give careful and rapid consideration to peripheral blight and the extraordinary cases of failure of family businesses resulting from the impact of the rail link.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): May I add to the litany of overwhelmingly strong cases? I notice that the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) also wishes to catch your eye in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He has been an assiduous chaser after the same solutions. I have no direct vested interest on behalf of my constituency in this particular Bill, although the borough of Southwark was directly affected by the previous proposals and route and the issue of blight was very pertinent. When my constituents and those of two other constituencies in my borough were spared, it would not have been fair if we walked away and left the case to be fought by those who are in the same position. People in the boroughs of Barking and Dagenham and of Newham and in Kent and Essex—

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): And Islington.

7.15 pm

Mr. Hughes:—and in Islington, are still directly affected. It is a very important issue.

I wish to rehearse again the fact that we have had an unsatisfactory law on compensation for a ridiculously long period. Of course the interdepartmental working party is a good idea, but unless they result in proposals, good ideas are not much use. The Minister will be aware that, on a regular basis, I persist in arguing the same case in relation to those who suffer blight from works connected with the underground. My constituents have an interest in that.

Some businesses in my constituency have gone under—not physically, but commercially—as a result of the Jubilee line extension. Some of them fall within the rules. If a building is physically taken out of the local geography because the line or the works go through it, people are compensated. If it happens to be two yards away—as a building is in Borough high street by London Bridge station—such that all a person's business is taken away, they are not. If a great hole is dug before the front door, if people can hardly see that the business is still there and if to get to it they have to be athletes or trapeze artists—in short if the business is clearly no longer viable, people do not qualify for compensation. If the traffic is redirected because the works are outside the door of a business and passing trade disappears, no help is available.

It could be said that people just have to take the commercial risk. That is true as long as it is not a matter of public provision for public benefit made through an Act of Parliament. However, when we are talking about a rail link between the channel tunnel and the capital city, about public railways—even under a privatised Railtrack—or about public tube services—even under a privatised tube network, although I hope that that never happens—it is not good enough to say that people must take the commercial risk and accept that they may be sitting pretty one day and the next be blighted by a proposal that affects their business or home life.

People can suffer blight even with the benefit of the advice of the most vigilant lawyers in the world. One of my constituents inquired whether his business would be affected by the route. He was expressly told that it would not. On the day on which he bought the business, there was no blight. Literally a month later, the proposals changed. It was too late. He had made the commercial transaction, acquired the business, laid out the investment and borrowed the money. He got into difficulties, but when the plans changed, it was too late. That was a risk that he was meant to take.

I should be grateful to hear in the Minister's response how soon we shall hear the results of the review and how soon legislation will be introduced. I join my colleagues in requesting that any response does not benefit generations to come, to the exclusion of those who have precipitated this call for a fairer compensation system. Other countries have such a system. Compensation can be provided through insurance. It need not cost the nation a fortune. We really must stop blighting the lives of hundreds and thousands of families and business people without compensating them, when simple legislation such as has been introduced by many colleagues over many years could reasonably do so. It is not beyond the wit of men and women to devise a system. We ought to get on with it.

I hope that this is the last time that we have to put in a plea in the Report stage of a Bill. I am sure that if the Government wanted to introduce a compensation Bill in the one remaining Session of this Parliament, all of us would be willing to postpone the general election by a few months to put it on the statute book.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): I, too, support new clause 1, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe), and the comments made by those who have spoken in the debate so far. I also support the new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge). I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench will note that hon. Members from the three major parties are all saying the same thing on the issue of blight and compensation. The position is profoundly unsatisfactory.

The issue of blight was raised at the very outset of proceedings on the Bill in the Second Reading debate on 16 January 1995. Fifteen months later, we still have had no practical response other than the formation of an interdepartmental working party. Those of us who have been privileged to serve in government know well the immense length of time that it takes for any legislation to emerge from interdepartmental working parties, if it ever does.

Also, as far as I am aware, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not responded to the specific recommendations of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. Perhaps he has now proposed a scheme to the Committee, but, if so, it has not been reported to the House. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us whether a scheme has now been devised in accordance with the undertaking to produce one in response to the Committee's recommendation, whether it has been submitted to the Committee and when we shall know the details.

The Select Committee examined the Bill over a long period, and did heroic and sterling work. The issue of blight and compensation was raised continually. Now the Bill is on Report, but as far as I know—unless my hon. Friend the Minister can tell us something positive—we have been given neither a Government amendment nor a Government policy to deal with the problem.

As the hon. Member for Barking pointed out, this is not really a public expenditure issue but an equity issue affecting individuals. It cannot ever be right for a responsible public body to look to individuals, through the value—or devaluation—of their assets, to subsidise the public sector infrastructure work that is required in the public interest. It is fundamental that people must be treated fairly, and not be faced with a massive, long-term and perhaps permanent reduction in the value of their main asset so that a public sector project can proceed. The burden should be spread across all taxpayers.

I consider it morally incumbent on the House, on Union Railways and on the Government to provide an equitable answer to a problem that has been described eloquently by members of all the major parties in the House. If that cannot be done here, perhaps it can be done in the other place. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will respond positively.

Mr. Chris Smith: I am grateful for the opportunity to make a brief constituency contribution from the Back Benches, and to support what has been said by the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge). As I always do on these occasions, I declare an interest, not only on behalf of the hundreds of constituents who are affected by the rail link but on my own behalf: my home abuts directly on to the line.

I want to make two specific constituency points about blight. First, however, let me pay a warm tribute to the Select Committee's work. It deliberated carefully for many hours, and listened attentively to the numerous representations of my constituents.

Last July, when the Committee made its initial findings public, my constituents were overjoyed by its recommendation that the line running under the borough of Islington should be in tunnel all the way into the railway land behind St. Pancras. For a few weeks, it appeared that the blight that had threatened many of the streets immediately surrounding the western end of the line through Islington would be lifted. Then rumours began in the press that the Government were reconsidering the Committee's recommendation, and Union Railways subsequently submitted a revised version of the scheme. That revised version is now included in the Bill.

It must be said that the revised scheme is still massively better than the original reference case first advanced by Union Railways, but it gives the petitioners less than the arrangement that everyone thought had been decided last July, and a number of concerns remain—two in particular. The first relates to the timing of any decisions arising from the deliberations of the interdepartmental working party. The timing of any compensation scheme is vital to the affected areas.

I am particularly concerned about the impact on homes in Bunning way—flats and houses in my constituency that were sold a few years ago, specifically as starter homes. Many were sold to young couples who were buying their first home, intending to move in due course. A number of those couples now want to start families, but their homes are not large enough for them to bring up children there, and they wish to move. At present, however, their homes are severely blighted, and they could sell only at sharply reduced prices.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

Under the present scheme, even if those people qualify for compensation, they will not receive it until the railway has been running for a year—and it may not start running until seven to 10 years from now. By then, they will have had to give up the idea of having children at all, or they will have had to subsidise a railway by selling their homes at a loss. I do not consider that a just way of dealing with the impact that the line will have.

My other concern relates to the Gifford street embankment. It is currently proposed that the line should be tunnelled through the embankment until it reaches a point just before the east coast main line, when it will emerge into the open to cross that line. It is extremely important to those living in Gifford street—one of those homes happens to be mine—that the tunnel be bored through the bank rather than dug in a "cut and cover" operation. A ministerial assurance has been given, in a letter to the local representative group that raised the issue with the Minister, that the tunnel will indeed be bored, but I fear that that assurance will mean little if a problem suddenly arises on the site. When the time comes for the work to be carried out, we may be told that it is far too difficult to bore the tunnel, and that half the embankment will have to be removed instead.

We asked for the requirement for the tunnel to be bored to be inserted in the Bill, but, sadly, the Select Committee did not agree to that. I hope that the Government will none the less give enforceable undertakings to the Committee in the other place, because that particular question will substantially affect the issue of blight in Gifford street.

Those are two specific issues, but they reflect the general concern that I know is shared by all of us with constituents who are directly affected by the proposed line. We all want to see the channel tunnel rail link in place and we want trains travelling fast from St. Pancras through the tunnel to the continent. However, we must make sure that that is done in the right way and with due consideration for the lives and livelihoods of the people who live immediately beside the line and who will be directly affected by the work when it starts and when the trains are running.

7.30 pm

Mr. Brooke: I follow my parliamentary neighbour, the hon Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). If, in speaking to the new clauses, I referred to a railway line or route other than the one that eponymously gives its name to the Bill, I would almost certainly be ruled out of order. Therefore, I say elliptically that if my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) had tabled his new clause mutatis mutandis in relation to another Bill that related to another railway line, I would have supported it in the same way as I support this new clause.

I cannot claim a constituency interest, for the reasons set out by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), because the original line changed for both of us. There is also the historic fact that the profession of British consulting engineers grew up along Victoria street in the last century so that its members could be within walking distance of the House to advise Committees on railway legislation during that era.

I support the principle of the new clause and I should like to make a supportive reference to what I would call the long-standing anticipatory blight about which other hon. Members have spoken—caused because no compensation is affordable until the relevant works are triggered. I shall also refer to those unfortunate people who, when the works are going on, will have to sustain the aggravation, potentially without receiving in benefit from the completed works even a tithe of the disruption that they have suffered. In that respect, I found a sympathetic resonance in the speech by the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), whose new clause we are also discussing.

I have been delighted to hear about the interdepartmental working party. In view of all the rail workings that stretch in front of us, I hope that its terms of reference are wide and that they relate to the widest possible range of contingencies so that we may make the maximum use of fallow time as this line and others unroll. The hon. Member for Barking spoke about the French arrangements and in that context I have taken the liberty of suggesting to London First, which rightly presses London Members on a series of issues on London's behalf, that it might sensibly mount an examination of those arrangements to see whether their application would economically accelerate the building of railways that they otherwise support.

As I have not so far been ruled out of order, I shall conclude by reminding the House of Miss Katherine Whitehorn's account of the effect of the London motorway box in the street in which she once lived. She recounted that the only house adversely affected by the plans had been bought three months earlier by a professional clairvoyant.

Mr. Watts: I can tell my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) that the terms of reference of the interdepartmental working party are broad.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Do they include clairvoyants?

Mr. Watts: I do not think so.

The working party will look at changes in the compensation codes that could be applied not just to this project but more broadly and, undoubtedly, to another project that my right hon. Friend might have had in mind.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) asked about the working party devising a scheme to meet the requirements of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. That work is still in progress but, as we said when the setting up of the working party was announced in November, it will be brought to a conclusion as soon as possible. I am afraid that I cannot be more precise on that.

Mr. Hughes: When is "as soon as possible"?

Mr. Watts: Perhaps I should consult a clairvoyant on that.

I sympathise with the view of many hon. Members that property owners or occupiers should not suffer loss on the sale of property as a result of perceived blight. However, I do not think that the new clause is the right way to address the problem. It goes much further than the concerns that were expressed by the Select Committee and that led to the setting up of the working party. It is premature, as it is in advance of the outcome of that review, which we announced on 18 March.

We should briefly consider the principles that underlie all existing compensation provisions. They include that the basis for any claim should be assessable against objective criteria; that the cause and effect must be demonstrable; and that the claimant should not finish up in a better position than would otherwise have been the case. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment explained in Standing Committee the three main circumstances under which owners may be compensated under current law. They are, first, where property is acquired compulsorily for the purposes of a public project; secondly, where property is subject to statutory blight, that is, blighted because of a future intention to acquire it; and, thirdly, where property is subject to injurious affection. It may not need to be acquired, but the conditions apply if there is a clearly demonstrable adverse affect on its value as a result of, for example, noise or vibration.

Mr. Rowe: I hoped that I had made it clear that, by putting properties on the market and seeing just how much less they fetched than would have been their valuation otherwise, we had met the standard of objectivity that the Minister has just stated.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend's suggestion and those made in the debate by other hon. Members will be looked at by the working party. I have said that the terms of reference are wide, and we shall wish to consider all relevant experience and suggestions, including, of course, overseas experience.

The new clause ignores the principles under which existing arrangements have operated. Some hon. Members may say, "That is well and good, but we think that the existing arrangements are inadequate." However, such fundamental changes should not be made just in respect of a specific project, but made only after careful review and as the basis for making changes that would apply to all similar projects.

We recognise the legitimate concern about the wider effects of blight—so-called perceived or generalised blight—which may affect property values even where there is no direct effect on the property, so existing compensation provisions may therefore not apply. That concern was raised by the Select Committee, which heard a great deal of evidence on a wide variety of concerns related to the Bill. Many of the matters that were raised essentially had to do with the provisions in general law rather than those in the Bill. The Committee concluded that in all such cases the existing national rules should apply. Even in the case of property compensation, the Committee concluded that existing arrangements were inadequate and called for a national review rather than special treatment for the project. In response, we set up the interdepartmental review of blight which the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment announced in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) on 18 March, Official Report, column 9.

New clause 1 recognises that any scheme now instigated may be premature, in that subsection (5) provides for the arrangements to be repealed in the light of the recommendations following the review.

The new clause raises practical issues and difficulties. If we were to agree to such a radical extension of the statutory blight concept, it would raise difficult issues about the definition of "unblighted value" and on the means of disaggregating the various factors that may have reduced the property's value, given that "perceived blight" can be widespread and is a thoroughly subjective, although pernicious, concept. By definition, there would be no identifiable or measurable physical effects.

Furthermore, the scheme that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) proposes might increase blight if it encouraged people to sell at a loss because they knew that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would be obliged to pay the difference between unblighted market value and any amount realised.

I am not rejecting out of hand the notion of a compensation rather than a purchase basis. As my hon. Friend alluded, in my discussions with him, I have acknowledged that that might be a sensible approach, but, today, I am not prepared to say that I have reached that conclusion. These important matters must be considered carefully in the review.

Mr. Allen: Will the Minister consider asking the interdepartmental working group to consider also non-monetary compensation so that, for example, the homes for the frail elderly on the Euston side of St. Pancras might have to be rebuilt rather than an exchange of money taking place?

Mr. Watts: The working party can consider all suggestions made during this important debate.

There is a danger that the effects of a scheme such as the one that my hon. Friend suggests could lead to snowballing blight. There could be a perverse effect. If the new clause were added to the Bill, his scheme would be part of the Act and if the new clause caused a blighting effect on other property, the operation of the scheme under the Act would be compensatable under the new clause's powers.

I understand that my hon. Friend is concerned about blight caused by earlier routes and proposals. I understand that his new clause would not cover that and that it cannot be made to do so within the scope of the Bill, so I am not sure that the new clause would achieve all that I know that he wants it to achieve on behalf of his constituents.

I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will accept what I have said about the inadvisability of making piecemeal changes to the compensation code on blight before the outcome of the review, specifically set up, at the Select Committee's request, to consider that subject, but the important issue that remains is how any changes that are made as a result of the review would be applied to people affected by the project.

The House will know that, for obvious reasons, it is not the usual practice of Governments to give any prior commitment in respect of policy reviews that have yet to be completed and in, Standing Committee, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment said that he would consider sympathetically how the review's outcome could be applied.

[Mr. Watts]

I have given further thought to that. I take the point made in the debate that it would be perverse if a review that led to changes in the compensation code—a review prompted by the blight problems caused by the project—and the outcome of its recommendations were such that people affected by the project could not benefit from the review. Therefore, I am prepared to go further and to give a clear undertaking that any changes introduced to the compensation code as a result of the review will be given effect in respect of blight arising from the channel tunnel rail link. I hope that, with that assurance, my hon. Friend will not feel it necessary to press the new clause.

Mr. Rowe: Is it in order for hon. Members and members of public to submit evidence to the working group and, if so, how do we do it?

Mr. Watts: Certainly. A total of 130 organisations, professional and otherwise, have been invited specifically to submit their views, but the views of hon. Members and of members of the public, submitted in writing to the Department of the Environment, would be most welcome.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am sure that the House will be encouraged to hear what the Minister said to the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe). We are grateful for that and for the additional information. This may not have been put to the Minister in these terms and therefore I will not expect an immediate reply. The right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) raised a similar matter. Will the Minister consider whether people affected simultaneously, not by channel tunnel works, but by the same issue and who have raised those effects in parallel—although they do not come under this specific legislation primarily—could also be considered? We are looking at a date start for a new scheme. I hope that the Minister will consider whether, equitably, all people affected in similar ways by similar legislated-for proposals might be considered and reply in due course, as soon as he has had a chance to examine the matter.

Mr. Watts: I shall reflect on what the hon. Gentleman says and reply to him in due course. That is one of the factors that can be taken into account in the review.

I hope that, with the clear assurance that I have given hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent and the House, he will not feel it necessary to press his new clause to a vote.

7.45 pm

Mr. Rowe: I have been in this place long enough to know that it is frequently wise to accept half a loaf rather than no bread at all and, given that we are shortly to send the Bill to another bakery, I am inclined to accept my hon. Friend the Minister's concession with considerable gratitude and pleasure. I wish that he had been able to go much further, but I understand the constraints under which he is operating and, therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 15

LICENSING

Amendments made: No. 1, in page 8, line 8, leave out 'and'.

No. 2, in page 8, line 10, at end insert

',and

(c) any station constructed for the purposes of the rail link at Stratford, in the London borough of Newham.'.—[Mr. Watts.]

Clause 30

CONSTRUCTION OF AUTHORISED WORKS: FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Amendment made: No. 9, in page 16, leave out lines 29 to 33.—[Mr. Watts.]

Clause 31

RESERVED CAPACITY ON THE RAIL LINK: EXPENDITURE

Amendment proposed: No. 3, in page 16, line 34, leave out

'enter into an agreement with'

and insert 'make payments to'.—[Mr. Watts.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 4 to 7.

Mr. Timms: May I briefly ask the Minister a question that arises from the amendment and that has been raised with me and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), dealing with the terms on which payments will be made to London and Continental Railways?

Suggestions have been made in the press—I have with me a copy of the New Civil Engineer from 28 March—that London and Continental Railways will not have to start work on building the channel tunnel rail link until European Passenger Services is profitable, which will clearly give London and Continental Railways, as the owner of EPS, the ability to borrow against the Eurostar revenue stream. Is that part of the agreement between the Government and London and Continental Railways?

Profitability for Eurostar will entail about 6 million or 7 million passenger journeys per year, compared with about 3 million journeys at present. It is projected that that will take 18 months or so. If it does take that period, that may just about be consistent with the current timetable of construction commencing in autumn 1997, but it is tight.

Is there uncertainty about the timetable for the scheme related to the speed of achieving profitability at Eurostar? Will that be a factor in whether the 2002 target date for the first trains from Stratford to Paris is achieved? As far as I know, the Government have said nothing on the point, but there has been speculation about it and I would be grateful if the Minister could clarify the position.

Mr. Watts: In the development agreement, there is no relationship between the start of construction and the profitability of European Passenger Services, although it will be desirable for EPS to be transferred to London and Continental Railways as soon as possible so that it can start to improve the service's profitability. There is nothing in the agreement that ties the profitability of the Eurostar services to the start of construction.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 4, in page 16, line 35, after 'undertaker' insert

', or its nominee, in pursuance of an agreement'.

No. 5, in page 16, line 35, leave out 'to it'.—[Mr. Watts.]

Clause 32

HOLDERS OF FUNCTIONS OF NOMINATED UNDERTAKER

Amendments made: No. 6, in page 17, line 11, leave out from beginning to second 'the' and insert—

'(3) An agreement by the Secretary of State with respect to'.

No. 7, in page 17, line 12, at end insert

'shall be effective notwithstanding that it fetters his discretion.'.—[Mr. Watts.]

Schedule 13

PROTECTIVE PROVISIONS

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 216, line 15, at end add—

'PART V

PROTECTION OF OWNERS OF LAND OR BUILDINGS AT RISK OF SETTLEMENT

1. The following provisions of this Part of this Schedule shall, unless otherwise agreed in writing between the nominated undertaker and the owner, have effect.

2. In this Part of this Schedule "the zone of influence" means the area within which land is liable to subside as a result of the construction of an authorised work.

3. The nominated undertaker shall in the construction, maintenance, use and operation of the scheduled works employ best practice to prevent or minimise settlement or damage to buildings.

4. The nominated undertaker shall notify in writing the owners of any land within the zone of influence at least 28 days in advance of the commencement of tunnelling and on completion of tunnelling in such zone.

5. If a building within the zone of influence of an underground authorised work is suffering or has suffered serious structural damage during the construction of the authorised work, an engineer or surveyor appointed by the owner shall, on giving reasonable notice, be entitled to inspect the authorised work in the vicinity of such building accompanied by a representative of the nominated undertaker.

6. The nominated undertaker shall ensure that any tunnel forming part of the authorised works has sufficient strength on completion of the construction of the tunnel safely to withstand a uniform or partial load of 50 kilonewtons per square metre.'.

I must begin by declaring an interest because my house in Forest Gate in the east end of London lies directly over the proposed channel tunnel link; not just to the left or just to the right, but immediately over it. Obviously, my property is very much affected. On the other side of Sprowston road is the site of the vent shaft. No one can say that I will not be materially affected by what is going on. I hasten to add that I am more than happy to undergo all the privations that will no doubt accompany the construction of the tunnel in order to achieve what we have all been trying to achieve—the international station at Stratford. I make no complaint about that. Of course, I raise this matter on behalf of many others as well as myself. A large number of people in the London boroughs of Newham, Hackney and Islington will be affected.

There are many Victorian properties in the area. There was a great deal of war damage and many of those buildings suffered badly. Movement of the ground underneath them potentially puts them at risk. I do not want to be sitting in my front room on a quiet day with my good lady wife, Sally, listening to our favourite Status Quo records, as we often do, only to find that with a horrible crash my entire house has fallen in on to the 4.15 pm out of Stratford and we find ourselves being conveyed at 186 miles per hour towards the Gare du Nord in France. If we were going to do that, perhaps I could have my own small station called Sprowston halt, or something like that. In that way I could descend into the tunnel in a more dignified fashion.

There is a problem and there will be subsidence. Although we are given all these assurances, the point of my amendment is to try to obtain certain assurances that, if the older properties are affected, compensation can be paid.

Mr. Allen: Is this one of those occasions when, unusually, my hon. Friend is seeking to defend the status quo?

Mr. Banks: I would always defend the group Status Quo, but it extends only as far as that. I certainly would not defend a joke like that.

I should give the reason behind the amendment. In the same way as statutory undertakers are offered protection in the Bill for their services and equipment, home owners and other owners of land and buildings should be offered protection. The promoters informed the Select Committee in June 1995 that a deed concerning settlement would be offered to owners within 30 m of a tunnel and the proposed deed was put before the Committee. However, it was on a take-it-or-leave-it basis and the promoters were not willing to enter into negotiations on its terms as they require it to be in standard form.

After considerable pressure, the promoters have responded to amendments suggested by the London borough of Hackney, in concert with Islington and Newham. A meeting to discuss points arising but not to negotiate took place at the beginning of March.

For the sake of amity, co-operation and some of the other things that we have seen associated with the Bill, I have given the Minister a copy of my briefing note so that he is in a better position to answer. The points included in the amendment are matters of general principle upon which it has not been possible to date to reach agreement with the promoters. I specifically draw attention to paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6.

I will not bother to go through all the points since I have already conveyed them to the Minister. If the Minister can give me some assurance that he is looking at those points sympathetically, I will be overjoyed.

Mr. Watts: As the hon. Member for Newham, North–West (Mr. Banks) has acknowledged, most of these matters in our view are already covered by the code of construction practice, which is a legally enforceable agreement.

[Mr. Watts]

With regard to the inspection of the works, paragraph 5 of the proposed amendment would give an engineer or surveyor appointed by the owner of the building which was suffering or had suffered "serious structural damage" the ability to inspect the CTRL works in the vicinity of the building. That is an issue that the local authorities have raised in terms of an addition to the deed and we have considered it carefully.

In view of the fact that the main issue of relevance in the unlikely event of such damage is the determination of remedial works to the building, we have concluded that the advantage to building owners of such a right, when measured against the difficulties of providing for building owners' engineers to have access to, for example, major underground tunnelling operations, would not be warranted.

With regard to the load-bearing standards of tunnels, paragraph 6 of the proposed amendment would place a requirement on London and Continental to construct tunnels so that they could withstand a load of 50 kilonewtons per square metre. I am not an engineer, but I am told by those who are that, while we would not expect there to be a problem in meeting and indeed, in some cases, exceeding that sort of load strength where the existing ground conditions provided that level of load-bearing capacity, there are concerns about the burden that such an absolute general requirement would place on those building the CTRL, in cases, for example, of made ground where that load bearing might not exist and also in terms of the monitoring requirements and the need to demonstrate that we had met the requirement in each and every case.

I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if individual owners have residual concerns about protection for existing buildings, we would be willing to consider including this sort of provision in additional individual settlement deeds.

The code of construction practice is contractually binding on London and Continental through the development agreement. In addition, the settlement deed which is available to householders provides a direct and legally enforceable remedy for individuals. So there is double protection.

We believe that the deed, coupled with the provisions in the code of construction practice, deal with the subject of settlement in a much more detailed and comprehensive way than the hon. Gentleman's amendment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be adequately reassured. If he requires further reassurance, perhaps we could correspond on the matter.

Mr. Tony Banks: All I can say is that I would not like to be around and facing my wife if our house did fall into the tunnel, but, of course, I probably would not be. With the assurances that the Minister has given, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Title

Amendment made: No. 10, in title, line 5, after 'therewith;' insert

'to make provision about related works;'—[Mr. Watts.]

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

7.57 pm

Mr. Watts: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This debate completes 16 months of scrutiny of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill by the House. Between February last year and February this year the Bill was considered by the Select Committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant). More than 1,000 petitions were received and the Committee's task was on a scale without precedent. It was carried out with great patience, care and balance, and tributes have been paid from both sides of the House to the work of the members of the Select Committee. The Committee has sought some substantial changes to the route and has rejected others. The Government accepted in full all the recommendations of the Select Committee.

We have given the Bill further careful scrutiny in Standing Committee and in the House today. Everyone is united in the desire to see the project proceed with the greatest speed and I can assist that process by drawing my remarks to a close and wishing the Bill a successful and speedy passage through another place.

7.59 pm

Mr. Jamie Cann (Ipswich): As a member of the Select Committee, I should like to say an odd word or two about the way in which the Bill's proceedings were conducted. I know that I speak for everybody who served on that Committee when I say that we are very grateful to the Government—I say this because I can see that there are no press around—for the way in which they listened to the Committee after its year and one month's worth of deliberations, took on board the proposals and suggestions made, and in a bipartisan manner produced plans which I think are a very good result. Let us hope that works on the ground come off just as well and that they are completed as quickly as possible.

I should also like to say how much I as an Opposition Member valued, as we all did, the way in which the hon. Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant) handled matters in the Select Committee. He dealt with every one of the more than 900 petitioners with patience, care and attention, even though many were apprehensive. What is more, one or two barristers the Committee left feeling more apprehensive than they had been when they arrived, which was also a good thing. The hon. Gentleman was ably assisted by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir I. Patnick).

By and large, it was a delightful Committee on which to serve. It did practical, good work, producing a rail link that, at the end of the day, was accepted by the Government. I think that the link is accepted by the people of the counties and boroughs through which it passes as well as it could possibly have been. Serving on the Select Committee was one of the better parts of my time so far in the House.

8 pm

Mr. Jacques Arnold: The House has been working on the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill since Second Reading on 16 January last year. My constituents and I have been working on what was originally a threat and is now an opportunity since the autumn of 1988. Between those dates, a difference has been made by the appearance on the scene of London and Continental Railways. Since the announcement in late February, hon. Members who represent Kent and other Members who are affected have yet to meet the leaders of London and Continental Railways. I should not like to miss this opportunity to draw very much to their attention the fact that Members of Parliament who represent constituencies along the route are not to be ridden over roughshod; our concerns and those of our constituents should be listened to very carefully. I hope that meetings will shortly be held so that we may highlight matters.

Although I appreciate very much the attention that the Select Committee paid to the concerns of my constituents, I should like to highlight to the promoters and to the House a number of issues affecting Gravesham that have not been addressed. Perhaps the greatest environmental threat along the channel tunnel rail link remains that to Ashenbank wood and Cobham park in my constituency—issues that I raised on Second Reading which have not been addressed.

I remind the House that Ashenbank is ancient woodland, of significance for its wildlife habitat, and a site of special scientific interest. Cobham park and its ponds along the route are a fine example of a Repton landscape, which would be damaged by the link. Proposals provide for a wedge to be driven through the woodlands and a railway to be driven along the edge of Cobham park. The devastation would be considerable. Scientific analysis conducted subsequent to the proposal showed that the subsoil at Ashenbank wood is such that the cutting would need an even wider land take, which would be devastating to that ancient woodland. Scientists and engineers have developed proposals for tunnelling under the site and they should be addressed.

I should also like to draw to the attention of the promoters the proposal for crossing the A227 Wrotham road in my constituency on an elevated viaduct. It is highly inappropriate to the environment and we have not yet seen a design that gives us any confidence that blight from noise will not affect the considerable number of houses nearby.

It is proposed that the channel tunnel rail link will also pass underneath the A2 motor road in Northfleet in my constituency. That road carries extremely heavy traffic from north Kent to London, and very careful attention must be paid to mitigation work so as not to disrupt the traffic passing through during construction.

My constituents are delighted by the Ebbsfleet station proposal, which brings regeneration benefits to our area and the prospect of commuting to London in 19 minutes instead of the current 40 minutes. The Blue Circle properties company owns a large amount of land in that immediate area and has come up with magnificent development proposals. I hope that London and Continental Railways will negotiate effectively and constructively with Blue Circle so that the development of the station and the Blue Circle property areas are co-ordinated to the benefit of my constituents.

I should like also to refer to the Northfleet bypass. That town has on one side the Thames tunnel of the channel tunnel rail link, which is a major construction project in itself, and on the other the Ebbsfleet international station. The only connection between the two is the road that trundles right through the middle of that old town. We need a bypass, and the Select Committee said that the matter should be addressed. It is known as the south Thameside development route phase 4. Kent county council is being far too slow in acting on the matter, and there is talk of the planning application for the road being called in. I call on my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that if that scheme takes place, work will be extremely fast, since it would be very unfair to my constituents to have construction traffic for the channel tunnel rail link passing through the town.

On balance, I welcome the Bill, because it means improved transport and thousands more jobs for my constituency. However, I ask the House and particularly the other place not to lose sight of the environmental impact on Kent, which badly affects my constituency. There are still problems that need to be addressed.

8.6 pm

Mr. Brooke: The length of time that the Bill has been in gestation has been testified to by others. The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann) was very generous in his comments on how the Select Committee was conducted. I should like to take advantage of the presence in the Chamber of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) to record one of my favourite pieces of British film comedy dialogue.

In the early stages of the "Titfield Thunderbolt", when the vicar of Titfield is confronted with the news that the line is already closed between Whitstable and Canterbury, he says:

"Perhaps there were not men of sufficient faith in Canterbury."

That faith has been deployed in the passage of the Bill, to the pleasure of all of us.

As the tail light of the departing Bill moves into the penumbra towards the other House, I should like to recount briefly my involvement in the very early stages of the tunnel that gave rise to the Bill. I was a Treasury Minister and we were negotiating a treaty with France. A problem arose about what we should do, since French customs officers carry guns; if they were on the train when it entered the tunnel, they would still have the guns on them when they came out of the tunnel at this end, and British customs officers do not carry guns.

The preferred solution of myself and the officials working with me was that French customs officers should be allowed to carry guns, but if in the event of their arrival on British soil they wished to use them, they would have to apply in writing to the chief constable of Kent. I am delighted to say that the preferred solution was acceptable to both Governments who were negotiating the treaty, and I think that it is established in writ.

I hope that solutions of similar ingenuity are deployed in the face of any other difficulties that the Bill meets before it completes its journey and when it is subsequently implemented.

8.8 pm

Sir John Stanley: I cannot resist a brief rejoinder to the comments on Report of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) and other Opposition Members on the subject of delay. Their sense of history was curtailed at about 1988. I remind them that the biggest single cause of delay was the 15 to 20-year delay occasioned by the cancellation of the previous channel tunnel project in 1975. It was fitting that the last amendment on which the Labour party chose to divide the House was a wrecking amendment that would have set the project back another three or four years.

[Sir John Stanley]

The delay has been of huge benefit to Kent and south-east London, though possibly not to Essex. It greatly benefited my constituents because the result of the delays is a route that, environmentally and in engineering terms, is a vast improvement on the original scheme. All the key improvements were made by Ministers, often against the opposition of British Rail.

The project began back in 1989 when British Rail produced its so-called three alternative routes. That was a desperately ill-conceived scheme in engineering terms and catastrophic environmentally. It resulted in tens of thousands of people suffering blight needlessly. Successive ministerial interventions brought about this much better scheme.

My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Parkinson was responsible for scrubbing the awful route 3 through the heart of Kent—some of the most beautiful countryside in the county and, I believe, the whole country. It was a devastating proposal. We in that part of Kent will always be indebted to him for taking steps to dispose of that route.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) also decided to say no to the route that British Rail then preferred and chose instead the private sector alternative brought forward by Ove Arup. It is poetic justice that it is a small shareholder in London and Continental because its scheme, devised off its own bat, provides the basis of the present one.

My constituency owes an enormous debt to my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor). When he was Secretary of State for Transport, he listened closely to the representations that I and others in the Medway gap area of my constituency made and decided to put the line past the north downs and across the Medway gap in tunnel instead of, as previously intended, overland. As a result, we have what some of my constituents are kind enough to refer to as the Stanley tunnel. On 1994 prices, I fear that it added another £70 million to the cost of the scheme, but my constituents in Aylesford, Eccles, Burham and Wouldham are eternally grateful for the Government's good decision to put that section of the route in tunnel.

Having said that, it may sound carping to end with a limited but important note of criticism about one matter. I make no apology for that because I have a small handful of constituents, six home owners, who are now above the line of the so-called Stanley tunnel on the top of Bluebell hill, whose treatment has been totally indefensible. At the beginning of 1994 a letter from Union Railways dropped through their letter boxes. It was a formal, Dear Sir/Madam letter headed, "Announcement by Government on Channel Tunnel Rail Link". I will read out its first three sentences. I hope that hon. Members will consider the implications for the saleability of their homes, had they received it. It states:

"I am writing to let you know that the Secretary of State for Transport has announced the Government's decision on the route to be safeguarded for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link. This has been developed by Union Railways for the Department of Transport. The route selected is proposed to be in tunnel at this point and may affect the subsoil to the property described above."

In each of the six cases, the property described above was the address of my constituent's home. All hon. Members will reach the conclusion that if such a letter had descended on their doormats, it would have had a devastating affect on their ability to sell their houses. That group is wholly blighted. I must tell my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport that it is morally unacceptable that they should be left in that position. The basis for buying them out is entirely compatible with the three compensation criteria that my hon. Friend the Minister for Railways and Roads read out in response to the amendment moved on Report by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe).

The letter is specific, directly relates the event to the channel tunnel rail link and refers precisely to the fact that the subsoil of those properties may be affected. Critically, it cannot be chucked away. It cannot be stuck in the bottom of a drawer, torn up—that would be inadvisable—or given to the dog to chew. It is a legally significant letter. A vendor of a property who received such a letter and failed to disclose it to a prospective purchaser could face a substantial damages suit. The letter has to be disclosed. It is a killer letter for valuations and it has wholly blighted the homes of that small group of my constituents.

On Report we discussed amendments on compensation. That will take a considerable length of time. I am glad to have the Minister's assurance that any changes will be made retrospective in respect of this project. New legislation is not necessary to deal with this problem. It can be dealt with immediately under existing legislation. The ambit of the existing discretionary purchase powers available to Union Railways enables it to be dealt with.

As my last offering, at the final stage of the Bill, I once again urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that people who received the letter saying that the project may affect the subsoil of their properties deserve—indeed, rightfully demand—that the discretionary purchase scheme should be extended to enable them to sell their houses to Union Railways. That request is wholly justifiable and equitable. If necessary, I urge my right hon. Friend to use his powers of direction to direct Union Railways to ensure that the discretionary purchase scheme is extended to cover the purchase of the houses blighted by the letter.

8.18 pm

Mr. Rowe: I owe the channel tunnel rail link a great debt of gratitude. Without it, probably nobody in my constituency would know who I was. I am sure that every hon. Member has had the experience of being told, "I saw you on television, but I have no idea what you were talking about." But when people see me on television they always know what I am talking about, because it is always the channel tunnel rail link. I do not quite know what I shall do when the Bill has gone to the House of Lords.

I pay a big tribute to the people along the line who have given up hours and hours of their time, spent large sums of their own private money and worked enormously hard, not only for their own benefit but for that of their friends and neighbours along the route. At least two of the people in my constituency who took a tremendous interest in the subject have died—John Castle, who became a real expert on freight, and contributed substantially to the development of some of the thinking both in the Department and outside, and Professor Bob Bottle, whose contributions on the subject of noise were much respected.

Lamentably, at the beginning of the project British Rail treated local people with the most profound contempt. But since Union Railways took over, that attitude has changed. I believe that John Armit, Bernard Gambrill and others, who have treated my constituents with courtesy, have discovered little by little that those people had a considerable contribution to make to the development of the project. Sometimes we tend to take far too lightly the wealth of knowledge, experience and sheer hard work that volunteers put into such operations.

I must add three short comments about my anxieties. I am still deeply anxious lest, despite the Select Committee, the private consortium should seek to cut corners in the provision of protection and the like. There is still a worrying lack of detail in many of the drawings. Fully detailed design drawings have not yet been produced, and in such things all sorts of devilment may lurk. So I want to be assured again that Union Railways really will be held to the protections that we have gained so far.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Sir K. Speed) cannot be with us tonight—I believe that he is representing the United Kingdom at the Council of Europe—but he asked me to associate his name with my statement that we need proper protections, bunds and noise barriers.

Some of the effects of noise are hard to predict. For example, the Department covered the newly extended M20 with a concrete surface, and the noise has now been admitted to be horrendous, despite the fact that when measured technically it does not reach a critical level. When one hears it, that noise makes a huge difference. In villages such as Harrietsham, in my constituency, which will be sandwiched between the channel tunnel rail link, the new M20 and the old A20, all in one tiny gap, there is a great need for proper protection. I much regret the fact that the Boxley long tunnel was not accepted by the Select Committee, and I hope that the Select Committee in the House of Lords will investigate the idea effectively.

I should also like to be assured that the speed for which the line is designed will not change once it has been determined. I have heard that the speed at which the trains should run has already been agreed, but if a decision were taken later to run trains at 20 or 30 mph faster, we should see the absurdity of an enormous bund of earth on which trees had been planted having to be uprooted to create further protection, if that were possible. So we need an assurance at the beginning that the speed for which the line is designed will not change sharply after the initial protection has been put in place.

The National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association say clearly, and I agree with them, that the power to take and occupy land for the construction of the CTRL should be restricted to the absolute minimum. We want to keep the land out of its proper use for as short a time as possible. There should be no nonsense about the constructors hanging on to land "just in case" for years after it is needed.

Finally, I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) said. I have spoken to the chairman of the consortium, and we had hoped for an early meeting, so let us send a message from the Third Reading debate that the sooner the new consortium can meet us and talk about our problems, the better we shall all be pleased.

8.24 pm

Mr. Allen: The Opposition unreservedly welcome the concept behind the Bill, and are pleased that the channel tunnel rail link now appears to be on the way. However, the Government have snatched defeat from the jaws of victory by overrunning their 1988-89 costings from the £1 billion estimated then, when we could have had the line, to what is now projected to be about £5.4 billion. That is quite a feat, even by the Government's standards. The eight-year delay has also cost an incredible amount.

As I said, I welcome the concept. However, the light at the end of this tunnel for the Conservatives is the on-rushing train of a general election. It will thus be left to the Labour party to carry out the pledges and promises in the Bill, and we shall do that.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

GEC Closure (Gorton)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ottaway.]

8.26 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I am grateful, on behalf of my constituents, that Madam Speaker has selected this subject for discussion. I should like to associate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) with what I am about to say. He wished to be present for the discussion, but compelling circumstances have prevented him from being here.

East Manchester, and my constituency in particular, used to be a national centre of heavy engineering. We had many famous names in Gorton, and one can still go to the railway museum in York and see the great engines that were manufactured there. But now my constituency is an industrial graveyard, and out of 634 constituencies in Great Britain, Gorton is 30th in terms of unemployment.

We have almost double the national level of unemployment, and male unemployment, at 21.3 per cent., is more than twice the national average. In the Manchester area, we have lost 30,000 jobs in recent years, and now local unemployment is about to be increased as a result of a wanton action by GEC, which has decided to close down the Long and Crawford factory in Gorton road.

Long and Crawford manufactures switchgear. It has a high reputation. GEC bought it in 1988, and the productive efforts of the work force resulted in a profitability that meant that, by 1993, GEC had recouped the money it had paid for the company. Now, having used that company and its dedicated and skilled work force for its own convenience, and having turned my constituents and those of my hon. Friends into industrial pawns, GEC intends to close the company. The death sentence will be carried out on 16 August.

There is a work force of 234, and 127 are to be thrown on the scrap heap. The 107 remaining staff will be transferred to another site—which 107, it is not yet known. When they are transferred to the other site in Higher Openshaw, it will be at standards much inferior to those they now have, and on a much more precarious basis.

The men who will lose their jobs—the 127—are, in theory, eligible for redundancy compensation of up to £20,000. However, the maximum redundancy compensation available will be £17,000, and the median compensation will be only £8,000—and that is for men who have 25 years' service. Even the largest sum would not be of much help to men with mortgages to pay and with children to feed and clothe—particularly as there is an extremely unpromising prospect of new employment.

The closure notice that was distributed to the work force promised:

"Assistance will be given to those affected in seeking alternative employment."

What good will that be in an area with such high male unemployment? One hundred and seven men will be transferred—in the inelegant language of GEC, they will be relocated. While keeping their jobs will be better than nothing, they will not keep their present pay and conditions.

A notice issued by N. F. Collins, director and general manager, said:

"All 'relocated' employees will relocate on GEC ALSTHOM T and D Long and Crawford Limited contracts of employment. Terms and Conditions of Employment will remain unchanged with the exception of those employees who are covered by the payment by results (PBR) scheme."

The notice continued:

"The Company proposes to remove the existing outdated PBR scheme and replace it with an improved basic rate, paid monthly, which will be more comparable with those elsewhere in the industry, thereby helping to ensure the long term viability of Long and Crawford."

The "long term viability" of Long and Crawford means that the company is shutting down the Long and Crawford factory and transferring the name and some of the work to GEC at Higher Openshaw. The scheme is outdated simply because GEC has decided to scrap it—and for no other reason. What does this mumbo-jumbo mean? It is GEC doublespeak for an ultimatum to the transferred workers.

Mr. Collins said in his notice that workers will be "invited" to agree to these changes. It means compel and force—they will have no choice. It is GEC doublespeak which means that the workers will be forced to agree to the changes.

Ending the payment by results scheme will cut the wages of the men who will be lucky enough to be transferred by some £60 a week—that is a severe pay cut. Management will buy out the scheme for a lump sum, but will not compensate workers for the loss of their bonus scheme over much more than a 12-month period—particularly as, even if transferred, they will have no guarantee of job security. They are subject to blackmail.

Another note was distributed to the work force. Under the heading "Co-operation", it stated:

"The scheme is conditional on full co-operation which includes the working of such overtime as is both required and approved.

Any instance of industrial action will result in the immediate withdrawal of the scheme."

Co-operation is not a matter for agreement between the company and the work force—it is an ultimatum imposed on the work force by the management, including compulsory overtime if management so decides. The workers will have no power to defend themselves, because if they try to do so, the scheme will be scrapped.

Apprentices will not be transferred as the sub-contract work at the new site will carry no apprenticeships with it. The skilled workers of the future will not be trained at the new site. What hope does that bring for Britain's industrial future if an area of high skill is not to train young people who can succeed and continue to do the work?

I am informed that the same applies to inspection. Inspection standards are high at the present Long and Crawford site. At the new site—where the work will be sub-contract work—inspection may be little, inadequate or even non-existent. We are talking about extremely important matters, because both supply and safety are involved. Several hundred thousand switchgear units may have to be refurbished at any time.

The work force have told me that a new product is coming, and that it will presumably be manufactured at the new site. I am informed that it will be developed only for the home market, and that potential export markets in Jordan, Saudi Arabia, the other Gulf oil states and South America are to be thrown away.

As for the Gorton road site, the closure notice states:

"The Gorton Road site will be decommissioned and sold for industrial development which should lead to the creation of some alternative jobs for the area."

Again, that is GEC doublespeak. GEC has every intention of selling off the site and realising what money it can from getting rid of it—that is part of a classic asset-stripping operation.

Talk of creating alternative jobs is meaningless at best and hypocritical at worst. Just what are these alternative jobs going to be in an area with such high unemployment? I have asked GEC this, and it has been unable to give me any information that is meaningful in any way. If a powerful combine such as GEC is destroying jobs, who will be able to come along and create the new jobs that it says are possible?

I raised this matter at Question Time last week, and the President of the Board of Trade responded to my question. With respect, the President of the Board of Trade knew nothing of the matter—I do not criticise him for that, because I raised this matter as a supplementary question. However, in response to my question, the President of the Board of Trade immediately launched into a panegyric of praise for GEC. In Manchester, we know GEC all too well—we know it as a ruthless employer and as a company that has made a practice of shutting factories, sacking men and making money out of methodical asset-stripping.

Long and Crawford is not the first closure that GEC has inflicted on people in the area, but I hope that it will be the last—but with GEC's record, one cannot be sure. From my encounters with the people at the very top of GEC, I know them as arrogant and uncaring. GEC is run on the basis of a quick turnover and fast profits at the expense of its workers and products. Unlike other companies that I can think of, the record of GEC is a telling explanation of the industrial decline of this country and the transformation of much of Manchester from a centre of excellence and innovation into its present state, with all too many closed factories, and all too many derelict sites.

Manchester is a city of innovation and energy. Our people create things; we are the home of the computer; we have done things in Manchester that the rest of the country should envy. Nevertheless, because of the actions of GEC and companies like it, we have high unemployment, and the skills that my constituents would be only too happy to deploy are not used.

What hope is there for these men when the Confederation of British Industry and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce have said that there are signs that firms expect to shed labour in the coming months? Despite the response by the President of the Board of Trade last week—which I realise was an off-the-cuff response—I hope that the Minister of State who will reply to the debate will offer some hope to my constituents.

We need not sympathy—we will provide our own sympathy in Manchester—but practical action, which we in Manchester would be happy to provide for ourselves if we had the opportunity to do so. My constituents, the people of Manchester, are proud, skilled and dedicated men, whose wish is to work for their country. They ask the Government to work for them so that they can work for their country. As their voice in the House of Commons, I ask the Government to take action for them, for the city of Manchester and for Britain.

8.40 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment (Mr. Eric Forth): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on obtaining this Adjournment debate, with its obvious importance for his constituency and the surrounding area.

Of course it is unfortunate for Gorton and the surrounding area that GEC Alsthom has decided to transfer its work from its Long and Crawford site in Gorton to Openshaw, but that does not mean that that was the wrong decision, or avoidable. From time to time, companies must make tough decisions of that type to ensure that they have a sound long-term future. Even in a healthy economy, jobs will inevitably be lost. The important thing is that more jobs are created to replace them.

As the right hon. Gentleman pointed out, GEC Alsthom has been hit by a drop in demand for its switchgear. Changes from oil to gas-based products and changes in technology that are vital to the company's international trading position have meant that only half as many people as previously are needed to produce its gas-insulated switchgear. As the right hon. Gentleman observed, the company has therefore decided that, in its judgment, relocating to another of its sites in Openshaw can help it to remain, in the overall sense, competitive.

It would be commercial suicide to keep on high numbers of staff in industries where automation had reduced the demand for labour, and it would put businesses at the mercy of overseas competitors. Where efficiency savings from merging two parts of a company might be made, it would make no sense not to adjust staffing levels.

My contention is that it is not for Government to seek to interfere with or second-guess commercial decisions of the type that have been described. If we tried in any way to force companies to keep unprofitable sites open, we would add intolerable burdens to their businesses and risk destroying jobs in the long term, as firms went out of business or chose to relocate overseas.

However, having said that, and in reply to one of the questions that the right hon. Gentleman reasonably asked, agencies and services exist to help those who become redundant as a result of actions such as have been taken on this occasion, to try to ensure that everyone involved has the best chance of a speedy return to work. For example, the Employment Service and Manchester training and enterprise council have contacted GEC Alsthom to offer help.

I am told that the company has appointed a firm of employment consultants to advise its workers on employment issues, and has pledged to do everything possible to support those who will lose their jobs in the reorganisation. Following discussions with the training and enterprise council, the affected workers will be given immediate access to the training for work programme and other adult training programmes.

As part of that package, Manchester TEC also offers training grants to employers who are prepared to recruit and train those who have suffered from redundancies. The

[Mr. Eric Forth]

TEC has been working with the Trafford Park development corporation to help local firms there recruit and upskill engineering workers to meet their current and anticipated labour needs.

For those affected by a decision of the type that we are discussing, the prospects are not necessarily as gloomy as the right hon. Gentleman appeared to suggest. We know that most spells of unemployment tend to be short. Of people who become unemployed, about half leave unemployment within three months, two thirds within six months and 80 per cent. within a year. If we add to that help of the type that I have described—from the Employment Service and its programmes, or the training and enterprise council, or the actions that I am told that the company is taking—there is good reason to believe that the people affected by such a decision can expect, directly or after retraining or other support, to find other work in the foreseeable future.

I do not want in any sense to underestimate, or not to have regard to, the pain and problems that are caused to those affected and their families. That, I fear, is a common experience for those who lose their jobs, but I believe that it is much better to look on the more positive side of these matters and have regard to the measures that can be taken to help them.

The overall picture in the Greater Manchester area is certainly more positive than that. To paraphrase, the right hon. Gentleman asked, "What hope is there for people who are thus affected in Gorton?" I wish to mention some examples, which are by no means a complete list.

Nynex is creating 4,500 jobs with a £1.1 billion investment in the north-west as a whole. Four hundred and twenty-five jobs are being created in Stockport with the Co-operative bank's new telephone banking centre. Three hundred jobs are being created in Irlam with Omega Engineering. Six thousand short and long-term jobs are coming in the new £127 million Lowry centre in Salford.

There will be two thousand jobs from a new concert hall next to the G-Mex centre, 1,000 new jobs in Cheadle with John Lewis and Sainsbury's, and 6,000 jobs in the new Trafford shopping centre. I could add to those the many thousands of jobs and inward investment that will result from Manchester hosting the 2002 Commonwealth games.

The right hon. Gentleman is probably thinking, "But what relevance do these have to the people who have been affected at GEC Alsthom?" In the world we face today, as I said earlier, jobs may be lost and others may be created, and sometimes that will require people to be prepared to retrain or reskill or alter their career direction to take up opportunities like those that I have mentioned, which may at first glance not be immediately relevant to the people who have lost their jobs and to the skills that they have acquired.

There is a wider and general recognition that this is likely to be the pattern of the future; that people, perhaps regrettably, can no longer expect to do the same or a similar job throughout their working lives; that we must find ways to help people, by education, training, and support of different kinds, to make the career changes that may be necessary to give them better prospects for the future. Increasingly, that must be understood and accepted.

We and our agencies want to do everything possible to help. Training programmes such as the training for work programme, work trials, jobfinders grants—at least for the long-term unemployed—and various job-finding measures that we have on offer, are the sort of things that may come to the rescue of those who find themselves out of work for a longer period.

The new jobs that are coming along may not be the same as the old ones, and may not be in exactly the same location—they may not even require the same skills—but, with some flexibility and a preparedness to contemplate career changes and new directions, there is real hope for the people who have been affected by the changes that the right hon. Gentleman has described, and for others of his constituents. They should be prepared to consider changes in employment or perhaps be willing to travel some distance to work elsewhere.

The lessons of other large-scale engineering redundancies in the Greater Manchester area suggest that those wishing to remain in engineering are often successful in finding work within a few weeks or months of being made redundant. As the right hon. Gentleman said, more than 100 of the 236 employees of Long and Crawford will be transferred to Openshaw. There is also a distinct possibility that some of the staff who have been served with redundancy notices may be redeployed elsewhere within the group.

I cannot agree with many of the right hon. Gentleman's comments about GEC. I believe that we must exercise some good will on such occasions. Government agencies and the company must be willing to work together to try to maximise opportunities for the people involved and affected. By adopting a positive outlook and by working together co-operatively, we can help those who are affected by difficult decisions such as this.

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that there is real hope for his constituents. The Government are always prepared to work with the company and with local authorities to try to maximise the opportunities available to those affected by redundancy. I am sure that Government agencies also will be prepared to listen and to offer positive assistance. Therefore, I hope that he will take from this brief debate a more hopeful and positive outlook. He may be assured that the Government, their agencies and all those involved will continue to work positively to assist his constituents.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes to Nine o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 26 April 1996

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Offensive Weapons Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

9.34 am

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I believe that you have been briefed about the reason for the withdrawal of my new clause 1, which was tabled some time ago, and the tabling last night of new clause 2, which is starred. The Public Bill Office found an error in line 9 of the new clause—it was my fault or that of those who drafted it for me—where the word "Act" was used instead of "section".

I understand that the Public Bill Office discovered the error only yesterday morning, although it has had the new clause since before the Committee stage. I learnt about the error last night at 7 o'clock through a conversation with my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland), and we attempted to put right the mistake by withdrawing new clause 1 and tabling new clause 2. I believe that the late discovery of the error was due to the bereavement of a staff member in the Public Bill Office. In those circumstances, Madam Speaker, I hope that you will select new clause 2 for consideration this morning.

Madam Speaker: I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman. I have considered carefully whether I should make an exception and allow starred new clause 2 to be called in the circumstances that he has explained. However, I am not prepared to allow the Bill's proceedings to begin with consideration of a new text that hon. Members have not seen before this morning. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman might consider discussing the matter with a colleague in the other place.

Clause 1

ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT FOR OFFENCES OF CARRYING OFFENSIVE WEAPONS ETC.

Mr. David Nicholson: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 10, at end insert—

'( ) an offence under section 1 of the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959;'.

I shall be brief, as I had intended to speak mainly about my new clause. The amendment seeks to ensure that the legislation relating to flick knives—the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959—should carry powers of arrest similar to those proposed for offensive weapons in the Bill. I hope that I have the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) in extending the Offensive Weapons Bill to include flick knives. They are clearly a major threat to personal safety, so it is desirable that they be included within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I do not have section 1 of the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959 before me, so I ask my hon. Friend to explain what he has in mind. Is not the matter covered by paragraph (l), which refers to an "offence of having article with blade or point in public place"?

Does that not include flick knives?

Mr. Nicholson: The drafting of the Bill is principally a matter for my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam. This is a belt-and-braces effort to ensure that flick knives are included in the Bill. I made a copy of the relevant section from the 1959 Act.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for hon. Members to filibuster without having got their act together? It is clear that, as usual, an attempt is being made to avoid debating important measures that could come before the House later. Conservative Members do not seem to have got their filibuster or papers together.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): It is clear that a great deal of research material on the subject is available, and presumably the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) was trying to find the relevant document.

Mr. Nicholson: I had no intention of filibustering, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I intended to sit down, having made my point. I cannot explain why a reference to flick knives is not in the Bill, but I have the text of the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959. Section 1 states:

"Any person who manufactures, sells of hires or offers for sale on hire or exposes or has in his possession for the purpose of sale or hire, or lends or gives to any other person—

(a) any knife which has a blade which opens automatically by hand pressure applied to a button, spring or other device in or attached to the handle of the knife, sometimes known as a 'flick knife' or 'flick gun'; or

(b) any knife which has a blade which is released from the handle or sheath thereof by the force of gravity or the application of centrifugal force and which, when released, is locked in place by means of a button, spring lever, or other device, sometimes known as a 'gravity knife', shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on summary conviction . . . to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale or to both such imprisonment and fine."

Therefore, I want the Bill to refer to such weapons.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): My understanding is that the Bill's purpose is to ensure that police officers are given the power of search and arrest in a public place. The 1959 Act proscribes flick knives and gravity knives. Most of us are of an age that we can recall that in the 1950s, such weapons were a scourge on our streets. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 included a long list of other items that I can only think are used to cause injury, such as knuckledusters, hand claws, belt buckle knives and push daggers. The 1988 Act extended the 1959 legislation to include all those items.

[Mr. John Greenway]

Section 142 of the 1988 Act allowed magistrates to issue warrants authorising police constables to enter and search premises for flick knives or gravity knives, or for weapons set out in the order made under section 141. If the House accepts the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), as it should, will that put beyond any dispute the ability of a police officer to arrest in the street someone whom he finds in possession of one of the weapons in question? It may be, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said, that the weapons would be caught in the generality of the measure.

Mr. Tim Smith: My hon. Friend said that the Criminal Justice Act 1988 extended the 1959 legislation. If so, and if a flick knife is an "article with blade or point",

as I believe it is, I cannot see the need for the amendment.

Mr. Greenway: The 1988 Act, in extending the 1959 legislation, included a long list of other items that do not necessarily have a blade or point, such as "the weapon sometimes known as a 'telescopic truncheon', being a truncheon which extends automatically by hand pressure applied to a button, spring or other device"

and

"the weapon sometimes known as a 'blowpipe' or 'blow gun'."

On the face of it, such weapons would not be caught by the general description of an "article with blade or point".

If the Bill's purpose is to put on a proper footing the power of the police to stop, search and arrest in a public place, and given that the 1988 Act allowed magistrates to issue warrants rather than give the power of stop, search and arrest, we ought to a do a belt-and-braces job and make sure that the power of arrest is included. I doubt that the House will have the opportunity to consider the matter again for some considerable time, so I am glad to see so many of my hon. Friends in their places. It is important to get the Bill right, and I hope that my explanation of my understanding of the law will assist the House.

9.45 am

Sir Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): My hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) has initiated and advocated an important point, ably supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). Clause 1 refers to arrest without warrant for carrying offensive weapons, and in speaking to it I must declare that I am the parliamentary adviser to the Police Federation of England and Wales.

Amendment No. 1 would make it clear without doubt that the legislation relating to flick knives will carry a similar power of arrest as proposed in respect of other offensive weapons in the Bill. That sensible provision would be widely welcomed by police forces throughout the country. The amendment does not require lengthy consideration, but it is evident that flick or gravity knives present a problem, and the Bill addresses the dangerous knife culture that has developed in this country. I hope that the House will be disposed to support my hon. Friend's amendment.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I reject amendment No. 1, but not with any great enthusiasm. The amendment would give the police the power of summary arrest in relation to the offence of manufacturing or selling a flick knife or gravity knife. I sympathise with the spirit behind the amendment, and it is understandable that my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) wants to be tough on the manufacturing or selling of flick knives or gravity knives. They are vicious and create appalling harm, so why not arrest on the spot persons who peddle, sell or manufacture those weapons? Why not close the loophole? Why not make a belt-and-braces amendment? That all sounds so logical.

Such weapons are invariably smuggled into this country, largely from France—where they are legally obtained over the counter. Even if a seller of such weapons is caught in this country, which I regret is rare, the offence does not qualify for the emergency action of immediate arrest and interview at the police station. Selling is a static activity. It causes no immediate harm, so the offence of selling such weapons is dealt with by a summons. The vendor is easily traceable by virtue of his premises.

The danger comes when a weapon is in the hands of the purchaser and from what he might do when he goes out of the shop into the street. If he is then found carrying a flick knife or gravity knife, which are banned under the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959, he can be arrested on the spot. In any case, there is a flaw in the drafting, in that my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton has limited the scope to gravity knives and flick knives. Why did he not include butterfly knives and the rest of the 14 weapons already banned under section 141 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988?

The amendment would extend the power of summary arrest to the offence under section 1 of the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959, which makes it an offence to import, manufacture or sell a flick knife or gravity knife. Most of us have a rough understanding of what a flick knife is—a knife or blade that opens automatically when a button is pushed. A gravity knife is similar, except that the blade is released by the force of gravity and what the 1959 Act describes as the "application of centrifugal force". The offence under section 1 of the 1959 Act is not in the same category as that of carrying an offensive weapon or knife.

First, selling is an absolute offence and it is therefore less difficult to establish whether an offence has been committed. Next, the offence will not normally have been committed in the street, but at a fixed address—the seller's shop. That means that the offender is easily traced, and interviewing can be carried out on his premises. There is no difficulty in keeping tabs on the offender—he is there.

The force of the amendment should be put in the context of the number of recorded convictions. It is very rarely that vendors are found to be selling such weapons. Indeed, there was a total of only five prosecutions in 1994 and one in 1993. In the circumstances, I do not think that it would be appropriate to make the offence arrestable. I therefore reject the amendment.

Mr. Tim Smith: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) on promoting the Bill, which I believe is much needed in the light of recent tragic events of which we are all aware. The heart of her Bill is, of course, clause 1. The important point is that the clause is about the carrying of offensive weapons.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) first introduced amendment No. 1, I had thought that section 1 of the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959 also referred to the carrying of offensive weapons, and that is why I thought that the amendment might be unnecessary. If all that we were talking about was the carrying of offensive weapons, that would be covered by clause 1 as it stands. My hon. Friend was, as I understand the position, referring only to flick knives and one other kind of dangerous knife.

I now appreciate, in the light of what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam, that the 1959 Act is about the manufacture and sale of offensive weapons. The amendment would therefore have the effect of widening considerably the remit and the scope of clause 1. I tend to agree with my hon. Friend that that was not really the original object of her Bill, because she seeks to give to the police the power to arrest without warrant, in the street or on school premises, in circumstances in which they have good reason to believe that a weapon might be about to be used immediately. That is a very different proposition from somebody either manufacturing or selling one of those weapons. Serious though that offence is, it does not involve the immediate intention of using the weapon to cause harm. The amendment would extend the scope of clause, and on balance I believe that we should not accept it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): I shall not detain the House for long, but I wish to deal with a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). I can assure him—and the point has already been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland)—that the carrying of any offensive weapon, including flick knives and gravity knives, which is prohibited by the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959, will be arrestable under clause 1. The amendment would make the sale or manufacture of such weapons arrestable.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), now that he has heard what has been said, will feel able to withdraw the amendment. We all wish to take strong action against knife-related crime, and if there were an operational justification for the amendment, we would need to consider it seriously, but the amendment would widen the provision considerably and we would end up with a measure that was too strong for the circumstances that are envisaged.

Mr. David Nicholson: My hon. Friend the Minister has pointed out that the existing legislation makes the carrying of flick knives an arrestable offence, so the sanctions and provisions of the Bill will apply as much to flick knives as to other offensive weapons. I am grateful to have had the opportunity to air such an important matter and for the assurances from my hon. Friend the Minister. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 4

OFFENCE OF HAVING ARTICLE WITH BLADE OR POINT ON SCHOOL PREMISES ETC.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Beckenham): I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 2, line 38, leave out from 'reasons' to the end of line 39.

The amendment would affect clause 4, which was added in Committee for very good reason, because it deals with the carrying of bladed articles in schools. I wish, in passing, to make it clear that I fully support the clause and I was delighted that it was added. It deals specifically with the sort of violent incidents in schools that have caused so much concern to the nation of late. It also has some bearing on one of the motivations behind the Bill, which was the unfortunate murder of headmaster Philip Lawrence, although that took place just outside school premises.

Because clause 4 was added in Committee, the House did not have the opportunity to consider it on Second Reading or to table amendments to it in Committee. For that reason, I tabled the amendment today. It would strike out subsection (4)(d), which is a reference to national costume. To explain the relevance of that, I need briefly to refer to the earlier part of the clause.

The main purpose of the clause is to make a specific offence of the carrying of bladed articles—which are banned under section 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 or under section 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953—on school premises. The clause also specifies exemptions or clear defences on those two offences, and subsection (3) provides the general defence of being able "to prove . . . good reason or lawful authority for having the article or weapon . . . on the premises".

Subsection (4) extends the defence to provide specific defences. In my view, most genuine defences would be covered legitimately by subsection (3), so I slightly question the need for subsection (4) at all. I assume that it is included to clarify the situation for people who, quite legitimately, carry pointed instruments or weapons, which action would otherwise constitute an offence. The four specific additional defences are defined as follows:

"(a) for use at work,

(b) for educational purposes,

(c) for religious reasons, or

(d) as part of any national costume."

I seek to remove paragraph (d).

It would seem that the wearing of the Sikh kirpan would be fully covered by subsection (4)(c), if it were not covered, as I believe it probably would be, by subsection (3). There will be examples of individuals wearing the full Sikh regalia in schools, and the kirpan is part of that regalia. The Sikh community inherits rich cultural and national traditions that are linked to religion, and the wearing of various garments is a requirement for strict adherence to the Sikh religion.

10 am

I wish to do nothing to detract from the ability of a Sikh to carry out his religious observances. They are a fine body of people and I would hate to see either their religion or their tradition inhibited in any way. I believe, however, that Sikhs would be fully protected by subsection (4)(c) as a result of a religious imperative. I do not believe that the removal of subsection (4)(d) would have any impact on them.

That leaves us with a simple question: to what would subsection (4)(d) apply? I need to be thoroughly convinced that there is a good and overwhelming reason for the specific reference to "national costume" to be included. I have nothing against the wearing of national costume.

[Mr. Piers Merchant]

As something of a romantic, I rather approve of people dancing or walking around in various national costumes. I would hate in any sense to be destructive of tradition.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman seems almost to be ridiculing his amendment. Is he aware that the amendment has been seen in some quarters as an attempt to inhibit the wearing of the Scottish national costume and the purely ceremonial element that is involved in the wearing of that dress? Is he not diminishing respect for that costume and that activity in the rather flippant way in which he is introducing the amendment?

Mr. Merchant: I fail to follow what the hon. Gentleman is saying. I am not being flippant. I made it clear that I took national tradition seriously, otherwise I would have not made the remarks that I did. As for Scotland, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have observed that the amendment does not apply to the relevant area of Scottish law. The amendment is directed to English law.

Mr. Michael: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that many Scots wish to wear their national costume in England and Wales? Therefore, the amendment applies to citizens of the United Kingdom when they are seeking to wear Scottish national costume in England and Wales. Is the hon. Gentleman serious, or is he intent on arguing in support of the amendment to take up time, only to withdraw it?

Mr. Merchant: I am concerned about these matters. I am aware that there are Scotsmen in England who wear national costume. I am not aware, however, that that happens very often in English schools. To the extent that it does, I believe that there would be protection in any event.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (North Dorset): Will my hon. Friend ignore the filibustering attempt of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), who is clearly trying to disrupt the argument? There is a distinction between United Kingdom national costumes, such as the Scottish costume and the equipment that is worn with it, and the national costumes of other countries. Is subsection (4)(d) an attempt to protect Greek evzones who wear their costume? I hope that my hon. Friend will deal with the distinction between United Kingdom national costumes and national costumes of other countries.

Mr. Merchant: That is an extremely relevant point, as is that of weapons that are linked with national costume.

I shall pose three questions that I think are relevant to the amendment. First, are there clear and specific examples that show it to be necessary for someone to attend school premises wearing a national dress that has, as an essential part of it, a sharp or bladed object?

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): I draw my hon. Friend's attention to pipe bands, which regularly appear on school premises throughout the United Kingdom. An essential part of a pipe band's proper costume or outfit—highland dress—is the skean-dhu. I wear it on school premises and in Parliament.

Mr. Merchant: No doubt my hon. Friend also wears it in the street from time to time. I feel sure, however, that he would not fall foul of the main part of the Bill, even though there is no specific exemption for national costume in the rest of the Bill.

I believe that Scottish pipe bands would be absolutely and fully covered by parts of the Bill other than subsection (4)(d). For example, they would be covered by subsection (3), because they would be able to prove that they had "good reason" for wearing a national costume, including the skean-dhu. If not, they would be able to illustrate that the full costume was being worn for "educational purposes". Pipe bands would not walk on to school premises out of a whim. No doubt they would have been invited. There would be a good educational reason for their being on the premises. They would probably not be able to defend themselves for "religious reasons", even though I know that many Scotsmen—especially highlanders—feel extremely strongly about their national costume.

I return to the three questions that I have been attempting to pose for the past five minutes. First, are there relevant examples that show the absolute necessity of subsection (4)(d)? I question that. Secondly, if people are wearing national costumes at school, why is that? If there is a good educational reason, that is fine. But are we really saying that we want to encourage those attending school to wear an array of national costumes from different parts of the world? That would be inadvisable in itself. Thirdly, is it always necessary to carry a weapon as part of a national costume? Given the various degrees to which I have been pressed over the past few minutes, I exclude the Scots.

There have been many precedents created for the display of national costumes. There have been some exemptions for usual practice in occupations that require a uniform to be worn. In those instances, there has nearly always been a specific reason. For example, railway conductors have long been allowed, if they are genuine Sikhs, to wear the required items to which I have referred. That exemption has not been extended to people who happen, on a whim, to wish to wear a national costume. We do not see bus conductors wearing Dutch clogs, for example, or Lederhosen. It would be rather absurd if they were allowed to do so. A schoolteacher would not be especially well thought of if he suddenly took to arriving at school and conducting lessons dressed in Lederhosen and wearing Dutch clogs, not necessarily together. There is a clear distinction between national costume and clothes that are part of religious observance.

There will of course be exceptions, and no doubt a school might wish, as part of its curriculum, to show national costume. A school might have a day on which people would be encouraged to dress in national costume as part of a history lesson or for cultural studies, and that would be covered under "legitimate educational purposes". In the vast majority of cases, however, the legislation would not even begin to apply because there would be no likelihood of sharp instruments being carried.

I should like, finally, to refer to Scotland and to the Scots, although my remarks have been anticipated to some extent. I stress that I deliberately did not table an amendment to the latter part of the Bill, which refers to Scottish law, because I take seriously the matter of Scottish national costume. I accept that national costume is regarded differently in Scotland, and I can think of no reason why it should not be so regarded under the law.

Scottish costume requires the carrying of the skean-dhu, which might be ruled, in other circumstances, as contrary to the Bill—under clause 4 or elsewhere—because it is of course a sharp and pointed instrument. I do not have a great deal of experience of how sharp and pointed it is—perhaps luckily. My hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) will no doubt be able to enlighten us on that point.

My hon. Friend might also be able to explain why it is necessary to carry the skean-dhu as part of national costume. Sometimes I wonder whether it is entirely necessary, or whether it might be more sensitive for a Scotsman visiting a school not to include it as part of his national dress. I am willing to be corrected on that point if I can be assured that wearing a skean-dhu is absolutely essential, and that a Scotsman would feel naked without that part of his dress.

I think that a Scotsman would still find that there was little doubt that he would be able to defend himself fully against any absurd charge that might be attempted under the Bill, either under subsection (4)(d) or under any of the other clauses to which I have referred. Therefore, Scotsmen, however sensitive they may be about it, need not feel threatened in any sense by my amendment.

For all those reasons, I argue that subsection (4)(d) is unnecessary. This is a probing amendment, to the extent that I am asking to be convinced that it is necessary. I cannot think of any convincing argument that it is, but I have a sufficiently open mind to allow myself to be persuaded, if other hon. Members are able to do so.

10.15 am

Mr. Bill Walker: I shall speak against this amendment, which will not surprise the House, and take up the challenge thrown at me by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant). Perhaps he will now be able to understand why we Scots regularly have to remind everyone that it was our king who came down to sit on the Union throne and why, from time to time, we have to remind everyone that the Union between Scotland and England was voluntary. There may have been an element of bribery involved in it, but the Union was made by voluntary agreement.

In forging that Union, the Scots brought to the United Kingdom a certain colour and a certain heroism—which was found on battlefields, to the great advantage of the Union. Part of that Scottish tradition is the wearing of highland dress. I underline the fact that we are talking about highland dress, which is not worn by all Scots.

Lady Olga Maitland: Pity.

Mr. Walker: Yes, it is a pity.

One can, therefore, recognise that there is a great danger of alienating a part of a minority in the United Kingdom. We live in a world in which minority interests have to be considered with great care; we constantly see people introducing legislation to protect minorities. I am a minority of a minority in many ways, because not only am I a highland Scot but I am a highland Scottish Conservative Scot, and we really are a minority.

I am one of the few Scots who come to the House fairly regularly wearing my national dress. Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will know that I always wear it in matters in which the scouts have an interest because scouts throughout Scotland regularly wear highland dress.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): Will my hon. Friend clarify something for me? I understood from books of Scottish etiquette that the kilt should never be worn below the highland line.

Mr. Walker: That was probably written by a Campbell. The hon. Gentleman must understand that the Scots were on both sides at Culloden. As is often the way with the Scots, they hedged their bets—which was reason for sending our king down to sit on the throne. The truth is that the Scots always wear the appropriate dress when facing the enemy.

Mr. David Nicholson: I hate to spoil my hon. Friend's paean in support of the highlanders, but is not it true that at Culloden there were more Scots in the Duke of Cumberland's army than in the prince's army?

Mr. Walker: That was why the king's army won. I do not know why anyone should be surprised about that. That was the most astonishing intervention. The king's army would not have won if there had not been more Scots on Cumberland's side. So that there is no doubt on this matter, I should tell my hon. Friend that my mother's side was on the king's side and my father's side was on the losing side. Such situations were not uncommon in the highlands and among those who married lowlanders.

I should tell my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson)—it is a very important point—that the highland regiments, until well into the second world war, went into battle wearing the kilt, as they did in the first world war and in all earlier campaigns. I ask him: how can anyone possibly suggest that it was not proper to be wearing the kilt south of wherever? As I recall, most campaigns were fought far south of wherever. Scots all over the world, and particularly in England, demonstrate at every opportunity the fact that we reached an agreement on the Union, of which we are proud to be part.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham properly asked whether it would be right to remove the skean-dhu—the weapon with which he is concerned. The skean-dhu should be worn in the stocking and should not be unsheathed in public. I have occasionally shown my grandfather's skean-dhu, which is the one that I wear. He wore it during the Boer war campaign, the first world war in Mesopotamia and in two tours in India, when he was in the Black Watch.

We wear the skean-dhus because they are much more than symbols. They reflect family inheritance and tradition, and they cannot easily be replaced. My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham suggests that it should not be worn and asks whether one would feel naked without it. If one were not to wear it, one would feel that one was not continuing the traditions that make us what we are—beautifully different, yet part of this collective whole called the United Kingdom.

Given the opportunity, I shall in a later debate deal with the question of this beautiful United Kingdom of which I am proud to be part. I am proud to be part of it because

[Mr. Walker]

I am in a minority of a minority. I am a highland Conservative Scot, which is why I have to demonstrate clearly to the vast majority who are not of my background that we Scots have contributed massively to the Union.

It rarely, if ever, happens that the skean-dhu is unsheathed in public. I have the police's assurance on that, because the matter arose some years ago when we were debating legislation proposed by my former right hon. Friend who came from Grantham. I tabled an amendment to ensure that the skean-dhu was not covered by the type of provision that we are debating again today.

My advice to my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham is that there are no problems with the skean-dhu. There is no history of Scottish boys or members of school pipe bands behaving badly, and, "If it's not broke, you don't mend it."

Mr. John Greenway: My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) failed to advise us what possible mischief there would be in someone being on school premises with what might be regarded as an offensive weapon were it not part of a national costume. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) said, we have to consider whether there is the slightest chance of someone removing a skean-dhu from his highland dress and using it as a weapon of assault.

Mr. Merchant rose—

Mr. Greenway: I shall give way to my hon. Friend in a moment, but I wish to develop this point a little further.

I wish to relate an incident that occurred during my police career in the 1960s and which, on the face of it, might support the amendment. In reality, however, it serves to prove that my hon. Friend's proposition is ridiculous.

I had just walked into the front office of the Savile Row police station just after midnight, when there was an emergency call to go to the Westbury hotel around the corner in Conduit street where a brawl was taking place in the foyer. [HON. MEMBERS: "Surely not."] Yes, indeed, at the Westbury hotel.

Hon. Members will perhaps be surprised to learn that, when I arrived at the hotel, a mother and father of a punch-up was going on. It involved mainly gentlemen in dinner jackets, but one in highland dress. I, a bold 19-year-old policeman, tried to stop this fracas in one of our leading west end hotels. I was roundly assaulted with kicks to various parts of my anatomy, one of which I would not wish to mention in front of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland).

At that point, something strange happened. The gentleman in highland removed the skean-dhu from his stocking and attacked the throat of the gentleman who had kicked me in a particular part of my anatomy. I subsequently managed to arrest both gentlemen and, at the police station, they were charged with various offences relating to drunk and disorderly behaviour. On the advice of the station sergeant, the gentleman in highland dress was charged with an offence relating to the skean-dhu. The word "skean-dhu" appeared on the charge sheet.

In those days, it was usual for people who had been charged to appear at Bow Street or Marlborough Street magistrates courts the following day. The CID officer on duty that morning would consider any charges. When he saw the reference to the skean-dhu on the charge sheet, his first impressions was that I had been over-zealous and that the charge had been made simply because the poor fellow had the skean-dhu in his stocking. I assured him that that was not the case and that it was fortunate that the skean-dhu had not entered the other gentleman's throat.

Suffice it to say that when the gentlemen appeared in court that morning, it transpired that they both had impeccable professional qualifications. They had been at an annual dinner when an argument had broken out. Everyone there had been the worse for drink. They pleaded guilty to the offence and were roundly condemned and thoroughly ashamed of their behaviour.

I do not think that I have ever told that story in public before, and certainly not in the House. The point of my telling it is to emphasise that we are being asked to consider the likelihood of such an event happening on school premises if someone were wearing his national costume and had a skean-dhu in his stocking.

Mr. Merchant: A person intent on mischief would not be allowed to take a weapon into a school if he were dressed like me. If he tried to do so, he would immediately fall foul of the Bill's provisions. However, does my hon. Friend accept that such a person could put on any national costume—there is nothing in the Bill to say that he is not entitled to do so—and thus enter the school brandishing a knife without falling foul of the Bill?

Mr. Greenway: That is an absurd proposition. We have to have a sense of proportion.

In the story which I related, the Scottish gentleman who went to dinner at the Westbury hotel in highland costume was not committing an offence by having a skean-dhu in his stocking, but the moment he removed it from his stocking and attacked the other gentleman's throat, any defence that allowed him to carry that implement went out the window.

I can tell from the way that the House listened with care and interest to my story—I hope that I shall not be accused of filibustering or of being out of order for having told it, because it goes to the heart of the matter that we are debating—that the very idea that such an event could occur on school premises is patently absurd. In the extremely unlikely event of someone drawing that knife in anger from his stocking on school premises or elsewhere, he would lose the protection of any possible exemptions and would be guilty of a serious offence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham was right to raise the matter, because we must be sure to get the legislation right, but I hope that, on reflection, the House will not support the amendment.

10.30 am

Mr. Tim Smith: My hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) made a powerful and emotive case against the amendment. It is incumbent on those of us who represent English constituencies to listen to him carefully. There are many Scotsmen in England and, no doubt, many teaching in English schools. From time to time, they may choose to wear their national costume. If my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) examines the subsection that he seeks to amend, he will see that national costume provides a defence only if the person wearing it has no ulterior motive.

I listened carefully to the account by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) of his experience when, some time in the 1960s, as a 19-year-old policeman, he was called to the Westbury hotel after midnight. That fascinating episode from his past was also extremely relevant.

In fact, the defence that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam inserted in Committee, when clause 4 was first introduced, is not novel. It also appears in the Criminal Justice Act 1988, which refers to a "public place". As the 1988 Act is a consolidating measure, even in the 1960s—when my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale was serving at Savile Row police station—the gentleman wearing Scottish national costume would have had a defence had he not removed the offensive weapon from his sock. The point of my hon. Friend's story was that he did remove it. Until that point—or, perhaps, until the point at which he had consumed too much—he had not intended to do any damage with the weapon that he had decided to carry with him. It was part of his national costume, and posed a threat only when he removed it with intent to injure another person.

I strongly believe that we should keep legislation as simple as possible. Section 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, on which I believe clause 4 is modelled, provides the same defences. It refers to "use at work", "religious reasons" and "national costume". I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam has added "educational purposes", which is understandable in the context of schools.

I feel that the clause should be left as it is. I am glad that the Committee decided to extend the Bill by referring to schools; it is not entirely clear to me that a school is a public place, although a public place is defined in section 139 of the 1988 Act as a "place to which . . . the public have . . . access".

There could be some debate about whether the public do have access to schools. Clause 4 is a welcome addition to the legislation, and I feel that in this respect, at least, we should leave it unamended.

Lady Olga Maitland: I understand the spirit in which my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) tabled his amendment, but by the time he finished his speech I think we felt that he had not been all that enthusiastic in the first place, because he made so many exceptions. The arguments against the amendment are borne out by the experiences described by my very dear hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker)—another Scot; we have two on the Front Bench today—and the telling incident in the Westbury hotel described by the erstwhile detective constable, currently my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). Those experiences tell their own story; sometimes the law can seem absurd, or, indeed, an ass. If the amendment were accepted—I hope that it will not be—we would find ourselves in an invidious position.

The intention behind clause 4 is simple: it extends to school premises the provisions that already apply to the carrying of offensive weapons, such as knives, in public. I believe that, unless there are good reasons not to, we should strive for consistency between what happens in public and what happens on school premises.

The existing offence of carrying a knife in public is accompanied by a number of defences for anyone charged with such an offence. There is the general defence that the person concerned had a good reason, or lawful authority, to carry the knife. That makes good sense in regard to, for instance, someone carrying home a kitchen knife that he or she has just bought, or carrying a knife with which to cut cabbages on the allotment. A keen fisherman might carry a knife along with his rod and tackle.

There are also three specific defences. The person charged may be able to prove that he was carrying the article for use at work; he may be a carpet layer, for example, although that defence is somewhat over-used and, indeed, abused. He may be able to prove that he was carrying it for religious reasons, or as part of a national costume.

In extending the offence to carrying an offensive weapon to schools, we have added a specific defence where the person concerned can prove that he was carrying the article for educational purposes. He may be a teacher, or, indeed, a pupil, equipped with a tool with which to work in arts and crafts or cookery classes. The justification is obvious.

The amendment proposes to remove the specific defence in relation to national costume. I note that a similar amendment has not been tabled in relation to Scotland. I think I understand why—my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside gave us a very good description—but the traditional Scottish dagger, or skean-dhu, is part of that country's national costume, and there will be occasions on which it is worn on school premises: open days, speech days and, in boarding schools, on Sundays. I have seen them worn in church. Although a person wearing highland dress, complete with skean-dhu, would not often enter school premises in England and Wales, he could do so.

What is more likely is the extraordinary development that Scottish country dancing classes involving full highland dress, including the skean-dhu, would suddenly become unlawful. Pupils from a Scottish school visiting a school south of the border might well wish to go formally dressed as a courtesy, but under the amendment that could be construed as an offence. Similarly, pupils might take part in a school play in national dress, including a dagger.

Mr. Merchant: Would there not be a perfect defence in such circumstances under "educational purposes", if not under "good reason or lawful authority"?

Lady Olga Maitland: My hon. Friend is introducing yet more exceptions. There are so many exceptions that I wonder how often we would find that there was a rule.

The amendment is not logical, and could cause serious difficulties. If we are to keep the legislation as harmonious as possible, we should retain that specific defence in England and Wales. With great regret, I must tell my hon. Friend that I reject his amendment.

Mr. Kirkhope: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) has just said. We should not forget that there are many people of Scottish ancestry in this country. I include myself in that. My only problem is that, having heard the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker), I am not sure into what grade or category I fall. I am descended from a lowland rather than a highland family. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside will not be too prejudiced against me. There is some argument about whether I am entitled to wear a hunting Stewart tartan or whether, must be confined to the Galloway tartan of my own family.

[Mr. Kirkhope]

Mr. Bill Walker: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend. Before the industrial revolution, the vast majority of Scots—like everyone else in the United Kingdom—lived on the land, and the highlands were very densely populated. After the 1745 rebellion, the highland clearances and the industrial revolution, that changed. My hon. Friend is probably descended from highlanders.

Mr. Kirkhope: My family has been progressively moving further south all the time. My hon. Friend forces me into an embarrassing admission. Having survived in the Scottish lowlands, I understand that in some murky episode my family removed itself to the north-east of England, to Newcastle, apparently with some cattle and other items, which I suspect we have never returned. The point of relating that is simply to enable me to say that I was privileged to go to a good school in Newcastle, the Royal grammar school, at which some of the pupils were of Scottish extraction.

I was involved in Scottish country dancing, a fine social activity, and we were visited many times by boys from other excellent schools in Scotland. As we know, the Leader of the Opposition went to Fettes college, but I am not sure whether he ever visited the Royal grammar school or came to England in full Scottish dress, which I think he may be entitled to wear. I have related all that because it underlines the fact that the amendment would not be helpful. Although we are discussing pupils, we should not forget that many people are on school premises out of school hours for various purposes in which such national dress could play a part.

There should be consistency between knife carrying in public and on school premises. In that context, it is wrong for someone to have a defence for carrying a knife in public but not for carrying it on school premises. We have had some merriment and some tuition from my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside about Scottish history and folklore, but I invite my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Merchant: The debate has been skilfully and quickly turned into one about the Scots, which was not my intention when I moved the amendment. I am aware of the sensitivities and should like to make it clear that I have nothing against the Scots or Scottish national dress, which is an important, colourful and historical part of our overall United Kingdom culture. I was trying to make some serious points about what I thought could be a loophole in the Bill, and I am glad that at least I have been able to precipitate a reasonably full debate on the subject.

There have been many references to minorities. I distinctly appear to have become a minority of one on this issue and do not seem to have much hope of pressing my amendment. I suspect that I am surrounded by a majority of Scots, albeit wearing suits, but at least I am not like the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), who maintains his solitary vigil in the knowledge that he has a majority of one, on his side at least.

If the clause has to remain, I would prefer it to read "as part of that person's national costume" rather than "any national costume", but it is clearly too late to introduce an amendment on that. I hope that people will not use the clause as a loophole to avoid the Bill's provisions. Above all, I do not wish to be unhelpful—the magical word that was used by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary—or to upset or frustrate the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland). As she knows, I supported the Bill at every stage and spoke strongly in support of it on Second Reading and in Committee. As she says that the amendment would frustrate the Bill's purpose, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Merchant: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 2, line 43, leave out from 'months' to the end of line 44.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 14, in page 3, line 3, leave out

'or a fine, or both'.

No. 15, in page 3, line 6, leave out from 'months' to the end of line 7.

No. 16, in page 3, line 10, leave out

'or a fine, or both'.

No. 17, in page 4, line 10, leave out from 'months' to the end of line 11.

No. 18, in page 4, line 14, leave out

'or a fine, or both'.

No. 19, in page 4, line 17, leave out from 'months' to the end of line 18.

No. 20, in page 4, line 21, leave out

'or a fine, or both'.

Mr. Merchant: The amendment is straightforward and simple and I shall not detain the House. The linked amendments have exactly the same purpose, which is to remove the fine option from the offences related to the issue that we have been discussing, namely, the carrying of various types of weapons in schools. The amendments apply to England and Scotland, which are listed in the measure.

Removing the option of a fine leaves the penalty as a mandatory prison sentence. However, this is not so harsh as it may sound because the term of imprisonment that would be applicable for the offences will not exceed six months, two years or four years, depending on the clause to which reference is made.

10.45 am

I shall not detain the House by going into the detail of which offence attracts which punishment. My sole purpose is to say that maximum prison sentences are specified and that it is clearly up to the court to show flexibility according to the circumstances, detail and nature of the offence. Courts would be able to impose a light sentence if that appeared to be relevant, which means that there is room for discretion.

I move the amendment because at present the proposed sentence is identical to that which applies for offences that are committed outside a school. In my view it would be appropriate to have a tougher sentence when an offence is committed in a school. The reason is simple and relates to the environment in a school. A large number of children are present at one time without their parents, and for that reason they need extra protection. I cast no aspersions on our highly professional teaching staff and others who look after children in school. In the vast majority of cases it works perfectly satisfactorily and safely. Nevertheless, the ratio of adults to children is normally considerably lower than when children are with their parents. There is also the specific sensitivity and the potential target that a school may present to those who wish to cause mischief. I recently quoted two recent examples of that and there are many more.

The Bill needs an extra mark of protection for children who are potentially under threat. We need tougher deterrents and greater punishment and deterrence is the issue that I wish to stress. By making it clear to anyone who contemplates breaking the law that there is an automatic prison sentence, the deterrent value is that much increased. The amendments would strengthen the Bill and are based on good reason.

Mr. John Greenway: The amendment is not a good idea. Again I am sorry to differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant). He tried to explain that the courts would have discretion and spoke about a maximum rather than a mandatory sentence. None the less, removal of the fine option would be extremely serious and would leave a court with no option but to impose a custodial sentence. We should be clear on two points. First, with the exception of the exemptions that we debated earlier, this is an absolute offence. There is no requirement to prove that someone entering school premises with a knife had any intention of using it for any purpose. We all know why we are doing it and it is right that we should, but it is an absolute offence.

I do not want to give in any detail an example of the innocent carrying of a knife or weapon on school premises where someone would be caught under the clause, but it could happen, not least because, as the previous debate made clear, school premises are not used exclusively as schools. They are used for social events, especially secondary schools, and at weekends and during school breaks, so we must be careful. If we think about it clearly, the amendment would impose an absolute offence with an absolute certainty of imprisonment, however brief. That is not a good idea.

Secondly, is it always correct to say that imprisonment is a greater deterrent than a financial penalty? I am not sure that it always is. A youth in his late teens or early 20s, who is earning an extremely good income, may go to an event or dance held for his local football team on school premises. He could have his knife in his pocket and be found guilty of this offence. It would be ridiculous to say that the possibility not just of imprisonment, but of hitting his pocket would have no deterrent effect. It is not one or the other: it is the possibility of both that would be deleted by the amendment.

For those reasons, the amendment is not a good idea, however well intentioned it might have been. I return to the point that I made in the discussion on the previous amendment. Were anyone to be so foolish as publicly to draw a knife or pointed instrument from their person on any premises, the powers in the clause to impose extremely tough penalties can be used. The amendment imposes a penalty simply for an absolute offence of someone having such weapons on their person. It is possible that a relatively innocent offence could be committed.

It is right that we should accept the Bill, but equally it is right that we should allow the courts sufficient discretion to deal with the circumstances with which they will be confronted whenever this charge is brought, which we cannot necessarily foresee today.

Mr. Tim Smith: At about the same time as my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) was Detective Constable Greenway operating out of Savile Row police station, I was a young law student studying what Oxford university pompously calls jurisprudence, and I have a vestigial memory of some of the basics of criminal law. One of the things that we learned was that normally the criminal offence consists of two parts: a guilty act and a guilty mind. My hon. Friend has made the point that this is an absolute offence: there is no mens rea. It means, in effect, that the burden of proof shifts from the prosecution to the defence. That is why the defences in the clause and in section 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 are so important.

If all that one has to prove is that someone was carrying an offensive weapon, it is not reasonable that the only penalty that could be imposed on such a person is a prison sentence. At present if someone is convicted of an offence under section 139 of the 1988 Act, the court cannot impose a prison sentence; only a fine can be imposed. Clause 3 of the Bill increases the penalties.

I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) is doing. She is saying that Parliament believes that the position is now sufficiently serious that in certain circumstances the courts should have available to them the possible imposition of a prison sentence, but the Bill makes it clear that, until it becomes an Act of Parliament and is brought into effect, the only penalty that can be imposed is a fine.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) wants us somehow to distinguish school premises from public places generally. I understand why he says that. We all know of the recent horrific cases on school premises and of criminal offences close to school premises involving school teachers. We all share his deep concern about that, but we cannot therefore conclude that in the case of school premises the possibility of a fine should be ruled out altogether.

In those circumstances, taking into account the fact that only a prison sentence is available, not only juries, but perhaps magistrates might be reluctant to convict in certain circumstances. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale that it would be wrong to remove from the courts the discretion to decide what should be the appropriate penalty in any case.

Mr. Bill Walker: I welcome the opportunity to speak on this subject. Earlier, I mentioned the wearing of the skean-dhu. I was reminded by the hon. Member for

[Mr. Bill Walker]

Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) of an interesting event that occurred in my life, where discretion was important and where certain leeway was required.

I was to be joined at the United States Democratic convention in San Francisco by my wife and daughters. Before they boarded the aircraft at Heathrow airport, they were advised by the chap who was looking after them that Bill had been arrested in San Francisco because he was wearing a knife. The Democrats got themselves in an awful mess. Eventually, I met the head of the secret service, who was in charge of security. Being a sensible fellow, he said to me, "You and I had better come to an agreement and an understanding. You can come in the morning wearing your knife. They'll tannoy for me and I'll come. You will hand over your skean-dhu to me publicly so that everyone can see and then we'll go off for a cup of coffee and I will give you it back."

My arrest hit the headlines in the United Kingdom. I followed that with a visit to the Republican convention—this is important because this is where discretion comes in. The Republicans were determined that I was not going to be arrested at their convention, so they advised everyone at the convention that this chap wearing the kilt and the knife in his stocking was to be treated with kid gloves—British Member of Parliament and all that. Unfortunately, they forgot to tell the Dallas police. In Dallas, people can wear as many guns as they like, but they are not allowed to wear knives in public and I was arrested by the Dallas police on my way into the convention centre. They called up on their radio telephone and said, "We've got this guy," and all the rest of it. Eventually, it got through to the head of the police. He came on the radio to the car and said, "Look. We had better handle this with great care. This guy is a British Member of Parliament." So they photographed me dressed in my finery with my knife in my stocking and dropped the arrest charges. This is the discretion part. They realised that, although it contravened the law in that part of Texas, they had someone wearing his national dress. They took a photograph of me and distributed it to every policeman in Dallas to make sure that I was not arrested again. It is that sort of discretion that the courts need as innocent individuals could otherwise be caught by the Bill.

Mr. Michael: Is the hon. Gentleman sure that his photograph was distributed for the purpose he suggested? It is more usual for photographs of individuals to be distributed widely within a police force for a rather different purpose.

Mr. Walker: It might have been because I am such a good looking fellow and the police thought that all the ladies of Dallas should know that I was visiting—like pop stars and other people of substance. It probably had nothing to do with the fact that I was wearing my kilt, with a skean-dhu in my stocking. The hon. Gentleman's intervention was interesting. So far as I am aware, no one has ever found any reason, other than the wearing of my skean-dhu, to distribute my photograph. If he has evidence to the contrary, I would be delighted to hear of it. We could then discuss what a suitable penalty would be.

11 am

Lady Olga Maitland: The remarks of my hon. Friends in response to the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) have been of one mind. We need flexibility and it would be a great mistake to remove the degree of decision making and options that should be available to the courts. Indeed, it would be unusual for the option of a fine not to be available as one of the penalties.

I understand that in 1994 fines were imposed on almost three quarters of offenders sentenced in magistrates courts, covering a very wide range of offences and involving about 1 million people. Six months' imprisonment and/or a £5,000 fine are the normal maximum penalties for trial in a magistrates court. The courts must have the power to deal with the whole range of serious incidents that may occur under the proposed offence of carrying an offensive weapon or knife on school premises. Some examples of that offence will be so serious that gaol must be the penalty—there is no doubt about that. That will be especially true where it is clear that the defendant went out intending to stab a victim viciously, not caring whether it caused injury or death.

Nevertheless, there will be offences where there are strong mitigating factors, such as those described by my hon. Friends, which must be regarded as being at the lowest level of seriousness. Indeed, there could be considerable misunderstandings. In those circumstances, it would be wrong to imprison the offender as such a penalty would be quite disproportionate. Without the power to impose a fine, magistrates would often feel obliged to impose very short terms of imprisonment, which could be far less effective than a fine for some offenders, as a fine would hit their pockets very hard. Many of them could not give a hoot about spending a few days in gaol. However, if they do not have very much money and what they do have is regularly docked so that they no longer have beer money, they might think twice.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does my hon. Friend know whether there are any precedents for what is being proposed in the amendment? Are there any criminal offences for which magistrates can only send people to prison and cannot fine them?

Lady Olga Maitland: I am not aware of any. I understand that it is not the practice of this country to shackle magistrates or justices in that way.

The amendments are somewhat spurious. It should be remembered that there is a power to override gaol sentences under section 31(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977. That gives Crown courts the power to impose fines, of any amount, regardless of any restrictions imposed in specific pieces of legislation. It is also important to remember that providing for a fine in legislation can actually increase the severity of the penalties available. A long gaol sentence together with a fine is obviously more severe than just a prison sentence. Furthermore, it is arguably the case that a large fine may be taken more seriously by the offender than a short prison sentence, depending on the circumstances of the case. I therefore support my hon. Friends' call for the amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. Kirkhope: I agree with the arguments deployed by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam and others of my hon. Friends, in particular my hon. Friends the Members for Ryedale and for Beaconsfield. We all want strong measures to be taken against knife carriers, but to remove the option to impose a fine or to impose a fine as well as a prison sentence would not only reduce the flexibility that the courts can exercise, but in some cases, as has been stated by my hon. Friends, it would actually weaken the severity of sentencing.

Mr. Merchant: I hope that I have at least given the House an opportunity to examine, in a little more detail, the nature of the punishment that should fit the crime. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale felt that it would be inappropriate to have only a prison sentence. Perhaps I take a tougher line on crime than he does. I strongly believe that prison is a tough deterrent—in most cases, the ultimate deterrent—and I am not entirely convinced by the argument that a fine, however unwelcome, can be a tougher way of dealing with offenders.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) referred to mens rea. Given the clarity of the offence and the wide knowledge of the existence of this legislation when enacted, as I hope it will be shortly, people—especially youngsters—will know full well that they are committing an offence if they carry a weapon as described. Therefore, it could quite easily be said that if someone is carrying such a weapon, he has a guilty mind as well as carrying out a guilty act. I doubt whether there will be many instances of someone saying, "I had no idea and no intention of breaking the law by carrying this weapon." Hon. Members should remember that we are talking about the carrying of the weapon; we are not referring to any intention that it may be used, which in itself would constitute a separate offence.

I feel strongly that the carrying of knives on school premises is a very serious matter. It happens a great deal more in some areas than hon. Members may be aware. It is therefore incumbent upon us to take a tough line so that we can avoid some of the disasters that have occurred and might occur again.

I make no apology for moving my amendment or for wanting a debate to draw attention to the risks posed by people carrying knives. The House needs to ensure that tough action is taken against such offences. Having said that, I accept that I am once again cast in the role of a minority. Having drawn attention to my point, and its having had a good debate, I hope that at least some of my motives for introducing it will be taken on board.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lady Olga Maitland: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 3, line 15, at end insert—

'(7) In the application of this section to Northern Ireland—

(a) the reference in subsection (2) above to section 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 is to be construed as a reference to Article 22 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987; and

(b) the reference in subsection (6) above to section 14(5) of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992 is to be construed as a reference to Article 2(2) of the Education and Libraries (Northern Ireland) Order 1986.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 5, in page 3, line 32, at end insert—

'(4) In the application of this section to Northern Ireland the reference in subsection (1)(b) above to section 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 is to be construed as a reference to Article 22 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987.'.

No. 6, in page 3, line 32, at end insert—

'(1A) In section 172 of that Act (extent), in subsection (3), for "section 139" there is substituted "sections 139 to bE".'.

No. 9, in page 4, line 44, leave out 'and' and insert 'to'.

No. 10, in clause 7, page 5, line 39, leave out 'and 3' and insert

', 3 and 4(1), (1A) and (3)'.

Lady Olga Maitland: These amendments fulfil a commitment given by the Minister during the Committee stage on 6 March. He informed the Committee of the intention, which I fully share, to extend to Northern Ireland the new offence of having an article with a blade or point on school premises. That is the effect of the amendment.

The amendment would add subsection (7) to new section 139A—the offence of having a article with blade or point on school premises—of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, to provide the relevant adaptions in application of the new section to Northern Ireland. Thus, any reference to section 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953—which refers to the prohibition of the carrying of offensive weapons without lawful authority or reasonable excuse—will be construed as a reference to the equivalent offence in the law of Northern Ireland. That is found in article 22 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, which refers to the carrying of offensive weapons in a public place. A similar amendment is made in new section bI of the 1988 Act.

Provision is made for references to section 14(5) of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992 to be construed as references to article 2(2) of the Education and Libraries (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which contains the definition of a "school" in Northern Ireland. A new clause 4(1A) is inserted to amend the extent section of the 1988 Act to apply to the new sections 139A and 139B to Northern Ireland, and a consequential amendment is made to clause 4(3) as a result.

The amendment fulfils a commitment that my hon. Friend the Minister made in Committee, and I am therefore only too glad to table it on Report. I hope that it will be supported by my hon. Friends.

Mr. Michael: I am happy to confirm the Opposition's support for the amendments. As the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam said, it introduces an element of consistency by extending the application of the Bill to Northern Ireland, which is to be welcomed. I am glad that she and the Minister have been able to fulfil the undertaking that was given in Committee.

Mr. Kirkhope: As my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam has said, the amendment fulfils a commitment that I made in Committee. I therefore naturally support it, and welcome the support of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael).

Amendment agreed to.

Lady Olga Maitland: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 3, line 27, after 'article', insert 'or weapon'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 4, in page 3, line 28, after 'article', insert 'or weapon'.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

No. 7, in page 4, line 38, after 'article', insert 'or weapon'.

No. 8, in page 4, line 39, after 'article', insert 'or weapon'.

Lady Olga Maitland: This is another somewhat technical amendment, but important to the overall purpose of the Bill. Its intention is to clear up a small and entirely unintended ambiguity in relation to police powers of seizure of knives and offensive weapons on school premises. It is proposed in clause 4 to extend the offences of carrying a knife or offensive weapon in public to school premises. Those two separate offences are referred to in the proposed new section 139A, subsections (1) and (2), of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 in relation to England and Wales. The equivalent Scottish offences are referred to in the proposed new section 49A, subsections (1) and (2), of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995.

The problem arises in relation to the associated police power of seizure of a knife or an offensive weapon if an officer discovers such a thing in the course of a search on school premises. The proposed powers of seizure are referred to in subsection (2) of the proposed new section 139B for England and Wales, and subsection (2) of the proposed new section 49B for Scotland. Both provide that a constable may seize an article—I emphasise the word "article"—of a kind described in subsection (1). That may conceivably be taken as omitting the power to seize offensive weapons. The amendment merely rectifies that.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam has given a technical explanation of the need for the amendment, but not one that is easily understood by a lay person. Surely the word "article" includes weapons, especially when one considers the context of the Bill and other legislation under consideration. As the Minister is to comment, perhaps he will deal with that point.

I clearly understand that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam wants to ensure that items are not accidentally omitted so that powers given to police officers in the Bill would therefore be faulty. I share that aspiration, but I do not understand why the amendments are necessary. The Minister may not be all that distant from the drafting of the amendments, so I ask him to explain in lay terms why the wording as it stands is not satisfactory and why the word "article", as one would commonly understand it, does not include weapons as a matter of legal definition.

11.15 am

Mr. Kirkhope: One of the problems is that the amendment is essentially technical. I fully understand that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth is saying that without the amendment problems may not be caused—but problems could be caused. As the matter is currently framed, it is possible to construe the clause as proposing a police power of seizure for knives, but not for offensive weapons. I am advised that the amendment must be technical.

Mr. Michael: I am not trying to delay the Minister; I am simply trying to understand what is being said. If offensive weapons other than knives are not included, would the Minister illustrate the sort of articles of which he is thinking? That might make the matter wholly transparent.

Mr. Kirkhope: I cannot really do that because the term "offensive weapons" covers a large range of items. The word "article" does not help us. We believe that the word "article" does include weapons, but we still think that there is a possibility of doubt in legal argument; that is why we are trying to remove the ambiguity. In talking of offensive weapons, a sharpened screwdriver comes to mind, for instance. Nevertheless, the amendment has to be technical. It is important that in such an important measure we should remove any possibility of misunderstanding or ambiguity, and any opportunity for the extension of legal argument and of justice not being done. The amendment is very sensible and, uncontentious and would clarify matters.

Mr. Michael: The Minister's illustration is very helpful. Am I correct in thinking that he is saying that the wording is basically to act as belt and braces, and that it does not change what was intended by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam or those who were originally involved in drafting the Bill or what we understood that we were doing in Committee, and that it is merely to ensure that there is no doubt?

Mr. Kirkhope: I can confirm that. While the hon. Gentleman and I may think that it is perfectly reasonable to interpret the matter in a certain way, lawyers might use the opportunity in certain circumstances to misunderstand the wording unless it is absolutely crystal clear. That is the reason for the amendment, which we support.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 4, in page 3, line 28, after 'article', insert 'or weapon'.

No. 5, in page 3, line 32, at end insert—

'(4) In the application of this section to Northern Ireland the reference in subsection (1)(b) above to section 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 is to be construed as a reference to Article 22 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987.'.

No. 6, in page 3, line 32, at end insert—

'(1A) In section 172 of that Act (extent), in subsection (3), for "section 139" there is substituted "sections 139 to 139B".'

No. 7, in page 4, line 38, after 'article', insert 'or weapon'.

No. 8, in page 4, line 39, after 'article', insert 'or weapon'.

No. 9, in page 4, line 44, leave out 'and' and insert 'to'.—[Lady Olga Maitland.]

Clause 6

SALE OF KNIVES AND CERTAIN ARTICLES WITH BLADE OR POINT TO PERSONS UNDER SIXTEEN

Mr. Michael: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 5, line 7, after 'applies', insert

'or who encourages or incites the purchase of an article to which this section applies by or on behalf of a person under the age of sixteen, or who advertises such an article for sale in a way which appears to incite or condone the possession of such an article for violent purposes,'.

The Bill deserves two cheers and it will earn a full three cheers if the amendment is accepted. The amendment is intended to take a grip on the incitement and advertising that have helped to encourage the knife culture, which we all abhor. This point was discussed on Second Reading, and I believe that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam was sympathetic to my argument then.

To explain my reference to three cheers, from the beginning, Labour has supported the Bill, which will take a grip on the carrying of knives. A second cheer went up when the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam and the Minister accepted the proposal made by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), the shadow Home Secretary, that we should ban the sale of knives to young people under the age of 16. However, we need to go beyond those measures, to take a grip on the knife culture in general, and in particular on those who profit from encouraging impressionable young people to take an unhealthy interest in offensive weapons. That is why we need a ban on the advertising of such weapons. I shall spell out the problem briefly.

On Second Reading, there was agreement on both sides that we needed to control the advertising of guns and weapons generally. Today, the amendment is designed to deal specifically with advertisements that encourage the knife culture. I raised the question of advertising and the mail order of weapons as long ago as the debates on the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, to which I proposed amendments, so it is not an issue that has suddenly come out of the blue.

Last year, the shadow Home Secretary brought to the attention of the Advertising Standards Authority some advertisements that included other weapons such as guns, but which also specifically included quite horrific weapons with titles such as "Rambo shortsword" and "SAS shoulder holster knife".

In response to the approach by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn, Lord Rodgers, the chairman of the Advertising Standards Authority, stated specifically that the authority had no powers to ban such advertising. Therefore, since as long ago as the period before Second Reading, Ministers have known that legislation is the only way in which to ban such advertisements and it is disappointing that we have not yet got that point covered in law.

We cannot deal with the whole issue of the advertising of weapons and guns in the Bill, but we can agree to an amendment that would ban advertisements that are specific to the knife culture. I am sure that all hon. Members agree that such weapons can have no legitimate use; there can be no legitimate reason for wandering the streets with something called an "SAS shoulder holster knife" or a "Rambo shortsword".

Mr. Merchant: The hon. Gentleman will remember that we exchanged words on this subject in Committee; we may not have been talking on quite the same subject then. Will he confirm—I have great sympathy for his objective—that it is possible under existing ASA arrangements and the Committee of Advertising Practice codes to prevent advertisements that or are "emotive or aggressive"? That would catch many of the advertisements to which he refers.

"appeal to the immature or unstable mind"

Mr Michael: No, it would not. The code would have an effect on those who observe the code of conduct. It might have an effect on the responsible end of the press. I am sure that The Times, The Guardian and other major newspapers take note of requirements set down in guidance from the Advertising Standards Authority, but the code does not actually stop anyone putting in such advertisements. Nothing illegal is involved; people do not have to take note of the code. I shall develop that point in a moment, with specific reference to what has been said by the ASA.

The ASA confirmed, after my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn referred to it the advertisements I mentioned, that it was not considered appropriate to take action on them. It referred them to a working party, and that working party may come up with new words or may strengthen the code of conduct, but that will not control the type of advertisements and virtual incitement that I am talking about.

As I said, we raised the issue on Second Reading, when it was made clear that the ASA was not able to ban advertisements that encouraged people to purchase weapons for the purpose of violence. I make it clear that we are not talking about advertisements in relation to country sports and things of that sort. We are talking about the wording to which I have referred, which is clearly not about sporting or legitimate activities.

On Second Reading and in Committee, I quoted a letter from the ASA in reply to our initial approach to it. The letter states:

"It is important to be clear that the Advertising Standards Authority is not in a position to ban such advertisements."

That sentence from the ASA goes to the heart of the question raised by the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant). It is clear from the authority itself that it does not have the power to do what the House wants, and that is why an amendment is needed to achieve the desired result. I should perhaps make it clear that that statement was authoritative, because it came from Lord Rodgers of Quarry Bank, who is chairman of the ASA.

Mr. Merchant: I do not want to labour the point, but I do not think that the hon. Gentleman entirely appreciates how the ASA works in practice. I was very involved in the advertising industry and had experience of the ASA. The ASA's latest publication, which deals with its research on this subject, says that companies whose advertising is found to be unacceptable or questionable will be asked to make any necessary amendments. I appreciate that that does not have the force of law, but does the hon. Gentleman not accept that in practice, the ASA's authority is extremely strong in the advertising industry? In 99 per cent. of cases, what it decides to do will be followed by the industry.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman destroys his own case by the words that he quotes. The ASA says that companies "will be asked" to change their advertising. In view of the wording used in advertisements to which I have referred and the motivation of people who would be willing to put such advertisements in public periodicals, I do not believe that such people will respond to being asked rather nicely to amend the wording that they use. That is simply not good enough.

If the hon. Gentleman's own words are not sufficient to destroy his case, I quote again the very specific and authoritative statement by the chairman of the ASA. He says:

[Mr. Michael]

"It is important to be clear that the Advertising Standards Authority is not in a position to ban such advertisements."

That is absolutely clear and specific.

Sir Michael Shersby: I am very sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's line of argument. Does he agree that many of the advertisements for these horrible knives appear in fringe magazines of one kind and another, which probably never even cross the doorstep of the Advertising Standards Authority, but which are circulated to groups of people whom the advertisers believe will buy the product?

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. In a conversation that I had with members of the Advertising Standards Authority, they commented on the vast amount of advertising there is and said that it was totally impossible to monitor all of it. It is impossible for them to monitor all mainstream advertising, never mind the fringe periodicals to which the hon. Gentleman refers. He is precisely right.

There are vulnerable people who can easily be encouraged in the culture of violence and the knife culture, which give rise to such concern. We are talking about a fringe activity, not about an activity involving masses of people. However, it is those who are vulnerable in some ways and who can become dangerous in other ways if their predilections are encouraged who are the target of fringe advertising. That advertising is my target in the amendment. The hon. Members for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby) and for Sutton and Cheam are, I believe, sympathetic to that point.

If we were talking about advertisements that appear in major, large-circulation periodicals, there would be no great difficulty, because the pressure of the ASA would discourage them from continuing to accept such advertisements. However, the hon. Member for Uxbridge is absolutely right to say that that is not the target of the amendment. But without the amendment, as Lord Rodgers made clear, the target that we have in mind cannot be tackled by the ASA.

In Committee on the Criminal Justice Bill in 1994, in response to a question of mine, the Minister of State, Home Office, the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), said:

"The British code of advertising practice includes special provisions on the advertising of weapons so that advertisements for weapons, such as knives, neither condone nor incite violent behaviour".

That is what the hon. Member for Beckenham was referring to, but we now know that the Minister was wrong, because the code cannot extend to the sort of fringe periodicals that are likely to do the damage, because they are circulated in the type of environment that encourages the knife culture.

11.30 am

The Minister of State continued:

"Where advertisements are found to contravene the codes, the Advertising Standards Authority can take steps to rectify the situation as appropriate."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 15 March 1994; c. 1357.]

We now know that the powers of the ASA are not appropriate, but clearly at that time the Minister thought that something should be done about the matter, and erroneously believed that the ASA had the power to intervene. As I said, the ASA has made it clear that it does not have that capacity.

In March, I asked the authority what action it had taken on various advertisements referred to it by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn. The answer was simply that the matter had been referred to a working party. I do not see the point of referring a matter to a working party if the authority does not have the power to deal with those specific issues and the periodicals that advertise such items.

We would end up with a tougher code enjoining The Guardian and The Times in even stricter terms to observe the standards that they observe already. That is patently useless in tackling the development of the knife culture.

There are advertisements generally available in this country that find their way all too easily to impressionable young people, displaying illustrations of weapons that no one could reasonably want for legitimate purposes. They incite people to purchase such weapons for all the wrong reasons. Such advertising should be brought under control, and my amendment at least addresses that specific problem.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is after, but how can he establish whether a generally available advertisement is directed at people under 16? Would it not be more straightforward to say that he really wants to ban advertisements of all kinds?

Mr. Michael: No, but I do want to ban advertisements that encourage the carrying of articles for an offensive or violent purpose, and that is what the amendment would do. The point is that those who use such advertising are seeking impressionable people, especially impressionable young people. That is where the tap ought to be turned off, and that is what my amendment would do.

The clause as it stands puts the onus on those in the retail trade, especially people who specialise in country sports, to ensure that they do not sell weapons to young people under 16. It is right that they should have that responsibility, but the stable door is still left wide open on mail order. There is no control over the type of articles advertised that can be purchased by youngsters through mail order. That is why the amendment is needed.

That may be irresponsible advertising, and it is not controlled. The mail order advertisers are not controlled as the Bill will control the retail trade in general, so there is a wide gap in the provisions that we are passing. We have put the onus on the retail trade, which will put an additional pressure on many responsible shops, and we think it right to do so, but it is surely also right to put the onus on advertisers not to advertise weapons of the type that I have described.

The clause as it stands says:

"Any person who sells to a person under the age of sixteen years an article to which this section applies"— that would now be an article or a weapon—

"shall be guilty of an offence liable . . . to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or a fine not exceeding level 5".

The amendment seeks three things. First, it would place a similar penalty on a person who encouraged or incited the purchase of such a weapon. That is straightforward. People should not incite youngsters to obtain and carry weapons.

Secondly, the amendment would make it a punishable offence to buy a weapon on behalf of a youngster under 16. Surely that is a sensible extension of the requirement. Thirdly, it would make it a punishable offence to advertise

"such an article for sale in a way which appears to incite or condone the possession of such an article for violent purposes".

That would not stop the advertising or sale to adults of items needed for legitimate activities such as work or fishing or whatever; it would concentrate the weight of the legislation on the nature of advertisements that include words that appear to make violence attractive or to incite those who are interested in violence.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam on bringing the Bill before the House, and hon. Members on both sides of the House who have supported it. We are tackling a serious problem, and we need to go behind that problem to the culture that appears to encourage people, especially young people, to become involved in carrying weapons, and potentially in actual violence. I hope that my amendment will attract support throughout the House and that the Minister will accept it.

Sir Michael Shersby: I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), and I have considerable sympathy for what he said. He touched on an important subject, of which many hon. Members will have had no experience, because they do not come into contact with the type of publication that he was talking about.

Mr. Michael: May I make it clear that I—and, I am sure, the hon. Gentleman himself and my hon. Friends—have come across such periodicals only in the course of research?

Sir Michael Shersby: I am sure that that is the case.

I shall tell the House about an experience that I had two or three years ago, when the chairman of the Metropolitan Police Federation drew my attention to an advertisement that, if I remember rightly, appeared in one or two of the east London local papers. It was for a commando knife made of carbon fibre, complete with blood channels, which was described as an ideal Christmas present. It was said that it could be used as a letter opener.

The advertiser did not give his address, simply a telephone number, but it was made clear that one could purchase the knife by using a Visa card. The chairman of the federation and I set out to track down the address of the advertiser, and used all the legitimate channels open to us, but we could not find it. The telephone number was ex-directory.

We therefore decided to purchase the article to see what was being offered. I still have mine locked up in a safe as an example of such terrible weapons. We referred the matter to the Home Secretary, who was extremely concerned about it. An individual was clearly advertising a weapon that had only one purpose—to kill. It could certainly not by any stretch of the imagination be described as a letter opener. If I tried to bring mine into the House today, I think that you would instantly have me incarcerated in the Clock Tower, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a serious and dangerous weapon.

Since then, I have seen a number of other examples of such items, often advertised in the fliers that are inserted in local newspapers. Newspaper proprietors may not be aware of the detailed contents of the fliers; they are interested only in the business of circulating them in the newspaper. Therefore, they can reach a wide variety of people, many of whom will be young. Other advertisements appear in what I would describe as fringe periodicals of one kind or another, which are sometimes issued free with newspapers. They advertise a horrifying variety of articles that no law-abiding citizen would want to possess. As has been pointed out, such articles are particularly attractive to young people—particularly men between the ages of 16 and 18 who are becoming interested in knives, guns and things of that nature.

We must address that problem. It is very difficult to deal with because, as I said by way of intervention earlier, the advertisements and fliers do not always come to the attention of respectable and distinguished bodies such as the Advertising Standards Authority or the Committee of Advertising Practice, which deal with such matters in a practical and a sensible manner. The advertisements and fliers in question often appear on the fringes of society. But they advertise equipment—certainly knives and other dangerous articles—that has only one purpose: to kill human beings.

I realise that it is a difficult problem to resolve. However, I express my strong support for the arguments advanced by the hon. Gentleman. He makes a good point, which needs to be addressed—although I do not underestimate the difficulties of doing so.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I urge my hon. Friend the Minister not to accept amendment No. 22. I understand exactly what its supporters seek to do. However, I fear that if we accepted the amendment, we would not achieve the results that my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby) and the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) seek. In accepting the amendment, we would be going down the slippery slope of restricting freedom of expression.

I take the point that the literature in question does not constitute a very pleasant form of expression—I find the advertisements as offensive as anyone else does. Nevertheless, we must not restrict people's rights to express their views and to advertise products. That goes to the heart of our freedom in this country. We restrict that freedom very reluctantly. We do so in the case of pornography and indecent material, and the hon. Gentleman is asking for a similar restriction of freedom in this area.

Mr. Michael: I find it difficult to believe what I am hearing. The hon. Gentleman is saying that allowing people to advertise weapons in a way that incites violence is protecting freedom of speech. Does he seriously mean what he is saying?

Mr. Atkinson: I am saying exactly that. In this country, people have a right to publish their views—provided that those views are not indecent or restricted by the laws of libel—however offensive they may be. All hon. Members can think of things that we find offensive and would like to restrict or ban. I might like to ban Labour party political broadcasts, but I cannot do that because the Labour party has a right to televise those broadcasts.

The hon. Gentleman must understand that he is going down a very dangerous road. If he had introduced such a measure in this place in the 19th century, virtually every hon. Member on these Benches would have attacked him vehemently. We must be careful not to take away people's freedoms. We should do so only if we could prove that, by accepting the hon. Gentleman's amendment, we could solve the problem. Clearly, that is not the case.

[Mr. Atkinson]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge said, weapons such as Rambo shoulder holsters are advertised in fliers. It is a sinister and subtle mail order trade, which does not reach most young men aged between 16 and 18 who are the targets of the legislation. Such material is sent to those rather curious people who like to collect military equipment and memorabilia. I do not think that such people are the cause of violence on the streets or the targets of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland).

If we could prove conclusively that restricting those fliers would have a positive impact on violence on the streets, I might consider removing people's rights of expression. However, that is not the case. Those who use such weapons on the streets are not collectors; they acquire knives and carry them for violent and illegal purposes, and the legislation is correct to crack down on that practice.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister not to restrict freedom of expression. If we were to restrict the advertising of a Rambo shoulder holster knife, it would be an easy and logical next step to ban films and television programmes about Rambo-type characters. We must not go down the road of censorship and restriction of expression. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister and the House not to accept the amendment.

Sir Michael Shersby: I ask my hon. Friend to clarify his remarks. I agree completely that the House should not do anything to restrict the lawful, reasonable and sensible expression of opinion by any individual. I think that everyone present accepts that. However, we are not talking about that: we are talking about those who advertise dangerous articles, the only purpose of which is to kill other human beings. We are not talking about confining people's legitimate expression of opinion: we are talking about those who offer horrible knives for sale, usually in a covert manner. As I explained earlier, they often do not provide their address and operate through ex-directory telephone numbers. They ensure that the material that they produce is directed at the people who are responsible for many of the problems with which we are dealing today.

I fully accept that it is not an easy matter to resolve. However, I do not think that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said anything that would constitute a restriction on the legitimate rights of individuals to express their views. He is talking about the advertising of weapons to young people who may purchase them. As a result, we may then read in the newspapers, see on television or hear on the radio that someone has lost his or her life.

11.45 am

Mr. Atkinson: My hon. Friend reinforces my point: I do not believe that the leaflets that advertise those products covertly get into the hands of young people. They do not. The products are sold to collectors of military memorabilia and to the patrons of those sorts of establishments, who could not sell those weapons to people under a certain age, according to the terms of the Bill. Such people constitute a curious minority.

The advertisements do not appear in reputable magazines that are widely available around the country, because those magazines are covered by the Advertising Standards Authority code of practice. Such advertisements do not appear in newspapers, because newspapers also adhere to that code. The advertisements appear in small backstreet fliers that are circulated discreetly among collectors of those sorts of items. I do not believe that they get into the hands of the people whom the Bill is targeting. That is my argument.

If such advertisements were encouraging young people at large to commit acts of violence, I would take a different view. However, we must not restrict people's right of freedom of expression—no matter how undesirable that expression may be—unless we are absolutely certain that, by removing that freedom, we shall achieve our aim. I urge the House not to support the amendment because it will not do that.

Mr. Merchant: I have great sympathy with the objective of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) in moving the amendment. It is entirely laudable that he wishes to restrict the sorts of advertisements to which he referred, which are clearly harmful and go against the principle of the Bill. However, I part company with him on the means of achieving that aim.

I believe that the hon. Gentleman misunderstands—I do not suggest that he has any intention to mislead—the way in which the Advertising Standards Authority and the self-regulatory system in advertising work. I believe also that his quotation from the letter that he received—although I am sure that the quotation is accurate—is not a fair reflection of the way in which the ASA works in practice.

Mr. Michael: The day before we debated the issues in Committee, I had a long conversation with an official of the Advertising Standards Authority. As a result of that conversation, I am absolutely certain—without any shadow of doubt—that I have quoted Lord Rodgers' statement absolutely correctly. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman understands that it is a very specific statement, which has been checked carefully.

Mr. Merchant: If I may continue to describe how the ASA works, I shall answer the hon. Gentlemen's question. The ASA was originally established by the advertising industry, but is an independent body, and its authority is probably greater than that of any other self-regulatory body. The hon. Gentleman is correct when he says that the ASA does not have the force of law, which is palpably true. He is also right to say that the ASA could not ban and prevent by law every advertisement. I do not challenge that point, but seek to illustrate that the effect of a firm line by the ASA is equivalent to that of the hon. Gentleman's amendment.

As a result of a complaint or on its own initiative, the ASA will examine an advertisement in detail. If it breaks the code of practice—and as I said in my intervention, any advertisement of a kind to which the hon. Gentleman referred would do so—the authority can take action. The hon. Gentleman attempted to suggest that the ASA just asks nicely for an advertisement to be withdrawn, but does nothing if that request is ignored. From my past experience in the industry, I know that if the ASA makes such a request, one can be pretty certain that the vast majority of the industry will instantly accede.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman entirely misses the point. Responsible organisations do not need the ASA's advice in such circumstances. If there is a slip-up and an unacceptable advertisement gets through the net, the media will respond to an ASA request. We are concerned not about responsible organisations, but about advertisers and periodicals that do not give a toss for the authority's views, which makes the amendment necessary. Does not the hon. Gentleman understand?

Mr. Merchant: I entirely understand, and if the hon. Gentleman is patient—and I do not intend to delay the House long—I shall answer his point specifically. We must deal first with the vast majority of advertising, and that comes under the scope of the ASA. One passes laws to cover an entire subject, not one small part.

Mr. Michael: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Merchant: No, because I know the point that is exercising the hon. Gentleman and I shall answer it.

It is important to understand the whole subject. If a firm advertises wrongly, in a way that would upset the hon. Gentleman, me or the ASA, the authority can deal with and bring sanctions to bear against the people involved at every stage of the process—the advertiser, the agency that produced the copy, the media or the direct mail company that posted the leaflet or publication. The ASA can also deal with host advertisements, in the form of leaflets within a mailing or publication. One would be hard put to find an advertisement that could not be the subject of ASA sanctions.

The hon. Gentleman exaggerated the number of cases when an offending advertisement would be outside the ASA's control. I concede that such incidents could arise, but the hon. Gentleman grossly exaggerated the number.

Mr. Michael: I have not exaggerated the number, because I have not given a number. The number does not have to be large. The hon. Gentleman implied that we legislate only for majorities, but we do not—we legislate for minorities. Murderers account for a tiny minority in this country. We legislate against murder because we do not regard it as acceptable. We are doing the equivalent in this case.

Mr. Merchant: As a matter of fact, we do not legislate for the majority or the minority: we legislate for everyone across the board. That was the point that I was trying to make. The hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the law was necessary to deal with a number of cases. He is right to say that he did not specify how many there were, but his argument gave me the impression that he was talking about a large number. All I seek to do is to suggest that the number is extremely small and—this is the crucial point—the number of cases in which the ASA would not be able to solve the problem would be roughly equivalent to the number of cases in which the law could not solve the problem, if the amendment was accepted.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept and understand that the existence of a law does not prevent an offence from being committed. Even if the amendment were successful, people would still break the law, and place advertisements with no telephone number given, but with a discreet way of obtaining the goods concerned. That happens now in other areas, including pornography, which is why there is a thriving, though illegal, pornography industry. The sole purpose of my remarks is to point out that the amendment would not have any effect and would not improve the situation. The self-regulatory system is extremely effective. For the most part, it achieves the objective, and when it does not, nor would the law.

Lady Olga Maitland: I have great sympathy for the arguments put by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. We have discussed the issue in the Chamber, in Committee and outside. It would be a great pity if we dismissed the hon. Gentleman's concern out of hand, and I wish to demonstrate to him much thought I have given to the subject and how hard I have gone into his arguments. I hope that he will bear with me while I try to give him a real answer. I will not delay the House for too long.

It is appalling to see advertisements that appear to encourage vulnerable young teenagers or their older friends to buy vicious knives that serve no useful purpose, save to harm others. It is equally appalling to read advertisements that appear to incite or condone the possession of those knives for violent purposes. No one could dispute that.

I have read the report by the Advertising Standards Authority on weapons advertising, and I have a copy here. I am sure that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth has studied it; if not, I shall let him have a copy. The report contains some provocative reading. The ASA conducted a survey, and I found its attitude a trifle complacent. The authority said that it had received only four complaints in six years and that, therefore, there were not as many serious grounds for complaint and anxiety as we believe. However, in my view, the authority failed to recognise that the kind of magazines that publish those disturbing advertisements are read largely by people who enjoy or are somewhat excited by such material and they are not likely to complain. The complaints have to be brought in from outside.

Admittedly, the ASA was very concerned about a mail order advertisement for a wide variety of pocket, hunting and fishing knives. Although the advertisement contained no specific claims, its headline "KNIVES, KNIVES, KNIVES" was considered excessive. The report drew my attention to replica knives, which were given some very unhealthy descriptions. For example, a 13 in replica sword based on those used in the Napoleonic wars was described as being "carried by riflemen for vicious hand to hand combat."

A replica skean-dhu was described as a "wickedly effective fighting knife." The ASA conceded that such advertisements were questionable, but other descriptions are even more vivid. A "Terminator Terror Sword"—the name alone is sufficient cause for concern—was described thus:

"an explosive power radiates from this monstrous double handed sword . . . fearsome death's head skull that grins menacingly . . . absolutely awesome 56" overall."

The ASA conceded that the words were sinister, menacing, monstrous, unnecessary and excessive.

It should be said that, usefully, the ASA has paid just as much attention to guns in its research. Guns do not come within the scope of the Bill, but in the light of the terrible Dunblane tragedy there is no doubt that there are lessons to be learnt about the way in which some guns are promoted. Bearing in mind the time element which is pressing on us, I shall not go into that subject.

[Lady Olga Maitland]

Suffice it to say that we are all suitably horrified. We feel that much more could and should be done. But what is the right approach? It is necessary to explore a number of difficulties.

12 noon

In clause 6, the proposal is to make it an offence to sell certain articles, including knives and razor blades, to those under 16. The offence would be one of selling rather than buying. The onus would be on the seller rather than the buyer. I think that that is right, given that there is already an offence of carrying a knife in public. The additional offence of buying would create too great a concentration of offences. The problem is adequately catered for by having selling and carrying offences.

The proposal behind the amendment is to create an offence of encouraging and inciting the purchase of a knife or other banned article by someone under 16 years of age. We cannot have an offence of inciting someone to commit another offence that does not exist. Someone could be held to be inciting another to carry a knife or other offensive weapon in public without good reason, but that would not require legislative change. We must reject—

Mr. Michael: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Lady Olga Maitland: I shall continue. It may be helpful if I complete what I am saying.

We must reject the proposal that is set out in the first part of the amendment on the basis that it is flawed. It would create an offence of incitement to do something that is not of itself an offence.

It is proposed also to create a different offence, which would be to advertise one of the articles whose sale to people under 16 we proposed to ban in a way that appears to incite or condone the possession of that article for violent purposes. It is already a common law offence for a person to incite or encourage another to commit a crime. To advertise an article for sale, representing its virtue to be that it may be used to undertake an act that is an offence, is an incitement to commit that very offence. That is true even when the advertisement is accompanied by a warning that the act is an offence.

I am trying to say that we are already covered by existing legislation. We do not need to go that bit further, as is proposed by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. It is clear that the amendment would add nothing to existing law. Although incitement can arise in relation to any offence, it is not general practice to include specific provisions for incitement for each offence. The result would be cumbersome and unnecessary.

Despite the findings set out in the ASA's report, I am concerned that it appears to be lacklustre when it comes to what it would like to do next. Surely the onus is on the ASA. It should monitor the media annually. Having said that it will take its responsibility on board, the ASA cannot duck it and say that the job is too large. It seems that there are many people who would help the ASA to undertake its task. There is plenty of evidence that the relevant material can be brought to light.

The ASA should not wait for a complaint to be brought before it before taking action. It should move rapidly as soon as it sees an advertisement that is downright dangerous and inflammatory. It must put much more direct pressure on advertisers, publicising what has been done and forcing them to withdraw such advertisements.

We should also encourage the police to take action when material that clearly incites others to commit crimes is brought to their attention. The police, after all, have the powers, and they should feel free to use them.

In view of those matters, I feel that it is not realistic to support the amendment—much as I sympathise with its spirit. Because of the ASA report, I believe that we should be keeping an eye on the situation and pressing that agency to be vigilant in exercising its responsibilities. At a later stage, if the system is not working, we will have to think again.

Mr. Kirkhope: I cannot say that I am without sympathy for the views that have been expressed. We had a very interesting debate on this matter in Committee, when I expressed some sympathy for the concerns expressed not only by my hon. Friends but by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam that the amendment—although it is well meaning—is flawed in one part, and I believe that the other part is unnecessary. I hope that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth will in due course withdraw it.

I believe that the amendment is aimed at, among other things, dealing with the serious issue of how such articles are advertised and how that advertising is controlled. I should like to comment on the advertising of weapons in the context of the Advertising Standards Authority's recent report, to which hon. Members have referred.

The ASA has just reported on its survey of weapons advertising in the non-broadcast media. I understand that the report, which some us have already received, will be made more widely available in due course. The report is of very great interest, although the Bill, as we know, does not contain proposals directly affecting advertising.

The survey's aim was to ascertain the prevalence and presentation of weapons advertisements in the United Kingdom. Those conducting it monitored a range of newspapers, magazines and mail order catalogues during the first two weeks of February this year, and they made the following findings. They found a total of 259 advertisements, which included duplicates. The advertisements were for guns, knives, sports goods—ranging from martial arts weapons to archery equipment—replicas and catalogues. Of the total, 226—or 87 per cent.—of the advertisements were for guns, including air rifles, pistols and so-called "soft firers", which are guns that fire balls at very low velocity. The great majority of advertisements came from titles dedicated to such subjects as martial arts, fishing and field sports. About half were classified as advertisements for guns.

The ASA reports its views on the acceptability of advertisements under the British codes of advertising and sales promotion. I shall deal in a moment with what the ASA can and cannot do in situations in which it considers that advertisements are in breach of the codes.

The codes lay down the criteria for advertising standards and state that advertisements should be prepared with a sense of responsibility to consumers and society, and that they should not contain anything that might condone or encourage violent or anti-social behaviour. Advertisements that were presented in a manner that might appeal to the immature or unstable mind, for example, would be unacceptable. Similarly, if a weapons advertisement were emotive or aggressive, it would come into conflict with the codes.

I turned with interest to the section of the ASA report that considered whether the advertisements picked up by the survey were considered to be acceptable or unacceptable. That is of interest for two reasons. The first reason is that we all, I think, want to know whether advertisers are behaving themselves. Secondly, however, I believe that it is helpful for us to have some insight into the way in which the ASA judges whether an advertisement is acceptable.

Of the 259 advertisements picked up by the survey, the great majority—94 per cent.—were considered to be acceptable under the codes. The remaining 6 per cent. were considered to be questionable. I should say that the low level of questionable advertisements should not lead us into complacency. As I mentioned earlier, 97 per cent. of the advertisements came from titles dedicated to subjects as diverse as martial arts, fishing and field sports. I believe that most advertisers will be responsible about the manner in which their advertisements are presented.

Although the ASA's report does not make it explicit, I believe that the majority of advertisements that were found to be offensive were at what one might call the "seedy end" of the range. Much of this relates to guns and knives rather than other offensive weapons—it is the latter with which we are mainly concerned now—but it would be helpful if I referred to the report as a whole because of the light that it sheds on the ASA's general approach.

In my opinion, certain mail order publications pander to the immature with advertisements of the type that I mentioned in Committee and that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam mentioned again a few moments ago. The ASA stated:

"Advertisements should not glorify violence nor should they suggest that psychological excitement is to be gained from owning and handling weapons. Claims which refer to power and strength (even by using exaggerated exclamation marks) could appeal to the immature or unstable mind."

That certainly seems to be a promising starting point.

The report went on to say that six advertisements caused concern by referring to "The lightweight rifle packing the heavy punch!!"

and

"Pistol power! shooting fun starts with",

and that phrase is followed by the brand name. The ASA states that, although these expressions could be relatively harmless if used purely in the context of the Olympic sport of shooting, in other contexts the descriptions could be inappropriately emotive.

Five of the advertisements picked up in the survey were considered questionable by the ASA because they seemed unnecessarily provocative. A mail order advertisement placed by a retailer of air guns, swords, knives and replicas was considered irresponsible because of the use of the following language:

"How cash crunching prices leave competitors heads rolling like lemons on lino. Battle burgers, had enough of pledgee wedges and stench warfare? . . . Sadistic ballistics".

I do not pretend to understand all that, but I understand enough to find it highly offensive. The ASA viewed that advertisement as aggressive and likely to appeal to the immature. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam cited similar examples which I do not need to repeat.

I take some heart from the ASA's criticism of advertisements that appear to take a frivolous approach to the advertising of potentially dangerous weapons. I know that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth is especially concerned about that. The ASA's report mentions a mail order advertisement for rifles. It is in the style of a comic strip in which the characters use expressions such as "Brill!", which we all know is an abbreviation of "brilliant", and "Get this!" The ASA considers that an immature way to promote guns.

Three of the mail order catalogues were considered to contain questionable advertising material. One advertisement for a gun referred to a "fistful of fun" along with the statement:

"it's the kind of gun you just can't put down".

The ASA considered that a frivolous and irresponsible way to promote an air gun. As has been said, many immature people, or those with psychological difficulties, do not look at advertisements in the way that people with a more mature mind might. That certainly causes me great concern.

I shall deal now with the ASA's follow-up action to the survey. The purpose of the survey was, given current concerns about the sale of weapons, to ascertain the prevalence and presentation of weapons advertising in the United Kingdom. The ASA will distribute the report widely, which is good because it needs careful scrutiny. It will ask all the companies whose advertisements it considers unacceptable or questionable to amend them in future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) referred to the nature of the ASA's approach when it feels that sanctions might be necessary. Judging from its past performance, I believe that the ASA will be successful, but I remind the House that the ASA has no statutory powers. It was established in 1962 as an independent body to administer the British codes of advertising and sales promotion. The codes regulate the content of all non-broadcast media in the United Kingdom. The authority seeks to ensure that everyone who commissions, prepares, places and publishes advertisements observes the codes.

In this context, it is important to realise that many sanctions are available and that they are widely spread throughout the non-broadcast media. They include adverse publicity, the refusal of further advertising space when codes are broken, the removal of trade incentives, which is often very important, and legal proceedings if advertisements are in any way misleading.

The question that still arises is whether the arrangements are adequate. It is helpful in that context to distinguish between the article being advertised and the terms in which it is advertised. As we know, guns and knives can be bought and sold perfectly legally. As for knives—it is knives in which we are mainly interested—I believe that we have gone as far as we can in banning weapons that have a legitimate use, and that can be defined in law in a way that distinguishes them from knives that have other uses. Under the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959, for instance, flick knives and gravity knives are prohibited. Anyone who sells any of those articles, be it over the counter or through mail order, is committing an offence that carries a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment, a £5,000 fine or both.

[Mr. Kirkhope]

12.15 pm

The ASA is not in the business of banning advertisements for articles that may be sold legally; that would be a matter for Parliament. I know that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth feels that we should take matters further. Let me make a few comments about whether it is desirable or possible for Parliament to ban advertisements for knives.

It might well be desirable to ban advertisements for certain knives. I have in mind the so-called Rambo survival knives, and articles of that sort. Regrettably, the practical difficulties that arise when we consider banning the sale of those items also arise when we consider advertising. We cannot define the items in law in a way that distinguishes them from knives that have legitimate uses. A manufacturer may give a knife a fancy or even an offensive name, but the fact remains that, unless the article in question has a mechanism or feature that enables it to be distinguished in law from knives that are used legitimately, it is not possible to ban one without banning the other. Even if it were possible to tease out advertising from simple sale, it could be strongly argued that, if it is legal to sell something, it should also be legal to advertise it. As I said earlier, I believe that we have gone as far as we can in banning the sale of undesirable articles.

It is one thing for an advertisement to describe, say, an angling knife in a straightforward and unemotive way; it is quite another for the advertiser to say or imply that it can be used to inflict injury. In reaching a decision about whether an advertisement is unacceptable, some pretty fine judgments may have to be made in a number of different contexts. It is not easy to legislate for that.

The ASA regards the use of the title "KNIVES, KNIVES, KNIVES"—mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam—as excessive, and is confident that it will get it modified in future advertisements. I doubt whether we could achieve that through statutory control. As I have said, there are problems. Some of us may feel that censorship might not be such a bad thing, but if we censor so-called Rambo survival knives, should we not also censor Rambo-style films? Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), I believe that there could be a slippery slope. I also feel that we would have great difficulty in dealing with much of the advertising that we would want withdrawn or changed—some of which, as my hon. Friend pointed out, emanates from shady operations with limited circulation, and which is very difficult to control, particularly if the distributors do not care for the law.

I am concerned, however, that the ASA normally only responds to complaints, rather than looking for objectionable material. Much of that material will appear in magazines and catalogues whose readers may actually enjoy it rather than wishing to complain. In the context of the debate, those people worry me.

I have taken careful note of the contribution by my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby), who represented the views and concerns of many people. I make it clear that, as a result of the ASA report and our debate, I intend to approach the ASA to have further discussions about its approach, its sanctions and the discipline that it brings to the advertising industry. I hope, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam has said, that it will continue its regular surveys to keep an eye on what it going on. In the meantime, more may have to be done and, as I say, I intend to approach the ASA for further discussions.

Mr. John Greenway: In those discussions will my hon. Friend seek to address the potentially growing problem of the advertising of such material through the Internet?

Mr. Kirkhope: That is an important point. Within the Home Office I am involved with a team that is looking at the effect of the Internet, particularly some of the unpleasant material that is passing through it. I shall do my best to include that in my discussions with the ASA. I apologise to the House for having spoken for so long. I ask the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Michael: The Under-Secretary quoted example after example of advertisements that make my case absolutely and unquestionably. The hon. Members for Sutton and Cheam and for Uxbridge also gave examples which show why the amendment should be accepted. The Under-Secretary and the Advertising Standards Authority agree that these advertisements are intended to appeal to immature people, especially to young people, and that has been accepted.

The Under-Secretary agrees that the ASA does not do enough. He was right to suggest that it is too much of a limitation that it considers a case only when it receives a complaint. I hope that he is successful in his discussions with the ASA on that. The hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) shakes his head with a violence that seems likely to do him some damage. However, his enthusiastic support for the Advertising Standards Authority is misplaced on the basis of what it has said to me and to others on precisely this point.

Mr. Kirkhope: Perhaps I could set the record straight. I used the word "normally" and I did not say that it was exclusively the case. In my discussions with the ASA, I shall speak about the emphasis on proactive or reactive attitudes.

Mr. Michael: I welcome the fact that the Minister intends to do that. It will be interesting to discover the outcome of that discussion, but having it does not abrogate the Minister's responsibility. The Minister has expressed concern, but what do the Government intend to do? Nothing! He has acknowledged that the ASA has no statutory powers and cannot do anything about those who ignore its rules, its codes and its advice. Is there some sort of ban on Ministers agreeing to regulate anything, even matters that are universally accepted as being in the public interest? Only yesterday, the private security industry was raised. Regulation is wanted by the police, by the industry itself and by the public, but Home Office Ministers appear to be stymied by the Department of Trade and Industry from agreeing to regulate even in the public interest.

I would not have moved the amendment if the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam or the Government had drafted amendments to try to tackle the problem. The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam has acknowledged that there is a need to take some action and has attempted to deal seriously with the issues that I have raised, although I think that she has been led astray by the Home Office from her virtuous efforts to tackle the knife culture. She suggested that everything is covered by existing legislation. She is wrong. If we want the police to act on such weapons, we need to give them the tools that they need to do the job, and the amendment would help in that regard.

The hon. Lady said that the onus is on the Advertising Standards Authority. No, it is not. I agree with her criticisms and also hope that it will take the matter more seriously, but it is the responsibility of Government and of Parliament to take the necessary steps to ensure that legislation is in place for people who do not observe the ASA's voluntary requirements.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the ASA has already responded to our concerns and that, as a result of our earlier debates, it has published this report?

Mr. Michael: Yes. It has been a bit slow to do so, but the ASA has, I acknowledge, responded to some extent. I am not, however, trying to place the onus on the ASA. My basic point is that responsible advertisers seeking to sell articles to people involved in fishing or other sports will observe the ASA's rules, but people who seek to sell weapons that are intended for violent purposes to impressionable people, including impressionable young people—who can then become a danger to society—will not take a blind bit of notice of what the ASA says.

I was taken aback by the speech of the hon. Member for Beckenham. I am not sure whether he has retained an interest in the advertising industry, but I believe that he was speaking against the interests of that industry and of the ASA.

Mr. Merchant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Michael: Wait one moment. The vast majority of people who publish and who advertise have no interest in promoting such weapons in the sort of advertisements that have been quoted by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. The amendment aims at a specific target. It is in the best interests of the advertising industry as a whole that this disreputable bit of the market should be hit by my amendment.

Mr. Merchant: I will not be drawn back into the debate, because I have made my position clear; but, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned it, I want to make it clear to him that I have no interest in the advertising industry or in any other industry. I have no such connections and never have done during my period in the House.

Mr. Michael: If there is any doubt, I was referring to interest in the sense of keeping up to date and of being aware of issues that affect the industry. My point is that the line that the hon. Gentleman was taking is not in that industry's interests.

The hon. Member for Beckenham made the point, as I have done, that the vast majority of the industry observes voluntary regulation, but we often legislate in the House for a small number of people who go against the interests of the community at large. I gave the example of murderers. There are not very many murders, but it is such a horrendous offence that we legislate specifically to try to prevent the actions of that minority and to punish them if they offend. That is what laws are for.

Similarly, I know that we are trying to regulate for a small minority of advertisers and a small proportion of the advertising market, but it is a proportion. It continues to have these advertisements, which succeed in reaching some people. If advertisers were not selling any of these things, they would not continue to advertise. Responsible organisations do not need the advice of the Advertising Standards Authority on this matter. If they are slipping, they will listen to the advice in the report, which has been referred to by several hon. Members. The amendment is about advertising by organisations and individuals who do not give a toss about the views of the ASA or of hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) made an extraordinary speech. He appears to be so obsessed with freedom of expression that he does not care whether that advertising results in violence or even death. I have to put it that strongly to him because such things are encouraged by the advertisements that have been quoted, among others, by the Minister and myself. I expect people involved in country sports generally to support my amendment when they consider its specific wording and the type of advertisements to which we have referred. The amendment would catch those who advertise

"such an article for sale in a way which appears to incite or condone the possession of such an article for violent purposes."

The amendment is very specific and it is narrowly drawn.

It is difficult to believe that the hon. Member for Hexham is so naive as to think, first, that those advertisements get into the hands only of those who are not impressionable in any way and do not get into the hands of young people and, secondly, that it is all right for people to advertise in that way.

12.30 pm

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I may be naive, and perhaps I am old-fashioned, but I believe in defending the right of an individual to self-expression. It is something that we should restrict only with very great reluctance. It should be restricted only if the hon. Gentleman could show, through his arguments during this debate, that some positive benefit to the public would result from passing his amendment. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has shown without doubt that the amendment would not achieve that. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman should not try to restrict the rights of people to self-expression. I agree that they are unpleasant people, but simply because someone is unpleasant does not mean that he should not be able to express his views.

Mr. Michael: I do not regard the hon. Gentleman as old-fashioned, although I certainly regard him as naive and his views as dangerous. The expression of views can cause enormous problems in society and the House has legislated against that in certain cases. On a number of occasions we have expressed concern about the freedom to incite violence, including racial violence. Are those freedoms that the hon. Gentleman would wish to defend? I rather think not. If he reads his words in Hansard and considers their implications, he may come to regret deeply what he has said today.

[Mr. Michael]

Fringe periodicals of the sort that the amendment would target reach impressionable young people, as do flyers in local newspapers. The freedom to incite violence is a freedom we can do without. The self-regulatory system is not sufficient. We need to control the advertising of offensive weapons to ensure that neither guns nor knives get into the wrong hands, thereby putting the public in danger. It is in the interests of the advertising industry—even of the ASA—that we should legislate in the way suggested in my amendment. It is certainly in the interests of the public and also of the police, who have to deal with violence on our streets.

There has been a series of cross-party debates on the Bill. I acknowledge the fact that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam has tried to deal with the issues that I have raised. We are agreed on the need to do something about advertising. Unfortunately, the Minister has not yet accepted that. I hope that, in the atmosphere of a cross-party approach to the horrific events at Dunblane and cross-party agreement on necessary legislation, we will continue to debate the whole issue of mail order of weapons—including guns and knives and the way in which they can be advertised through channels that will encourage the interest of impressionable young people. I hope that, this year, legislation will be introduced to tackle a problem that I have been glad to be able to air during this short debate.

It is not my purpose to delay the Bill. As I said earlier, we give two cheers for it; I would have liked to be able to give a third cheer for having my amendment accepted. However, two cheers are better than none. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 7

SHORT TITLE AND EXTENT

Amendment made: No. 10, in page 5, line 39, leave out 'and 3' and insert

', 3 and 4(1), (1A) and (3)'.—[Lady Olga Maitland.]

Title

Lady Olga Maitland: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in line 1, leave out from 'about' to end of line 12 and insert

'persons having knives, other articles which have a blade or are sharply pointed or offensive weapons; and about selling knives or such articles to persons under the age of sixteen years'.

I tabled the amendment as a result of concern expressed about the long title of my Bill. It is a very long title and we feel that the Bill should now be given a better title and a relatively short one. I am assured by the draftsmen that the shorter version that I proposes is no different in substance from the one that it replaces and does not affect the Bill's scope. It is therefore an uncontentious, technical amendment, about which there is not a great deal more to be said.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

12.34 pm

Lady Olga Maitland: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is an important Bill. It is a sad reflection on the times that it needs to be introduced at all. The knife culture is set to engulf us all unless we take a firm hand and curb it now. There must be tough condemnation from society for young thugs who indulge in mindless violence, and the backing of Parliament to ensure that we have legislation that will work. We want to ensure that those who carry knives do so at their peril. They are not heroes; they are common little criminals. They will be caught, they will face stiff penalties, and wherever they turn they will face a wall of obstacles preventing them from obtaining their vicious weapons. The Bill will achieve all that.

It might be helpful if I set out the context in which the Bill came about. I have personally campaigned for years against the knife culture. I know one family in particular—Bill and Valerie Dennison—who were shattered when their 17-year-old son, John, was mindlessly stabbed to death. We owe a debt to headmaster Philip Lawrence, slaughtered by a teenager: his courage and sacrifice spurred me on, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my hon. Friend the Minister helped me to put the Bill together.

Tragically, Mr. Lawrence's death is one in a long series of statistics. Knife-related offences are increasing year on year, and the victims are of all ages—children, teenagers, middle-aged people, pensioners and, above all, the police. In 1994, 1,000 police officers were seriously assaulted and injured in England and Wales. Prosecutions rise every year, and in 1993-94—the last year for which figures are available—there was a sharp jump of almost 1,000, to 3,367, in London alone. That is a good example of just how serious the problem is. Despite the appalling tragedy in Dunblane, more people die from being stabbed by a knife than from being shot by a gun. Of the 677 people murdered in this country that same year, 236 were stabbed. In London, 41 per cent. of all murders involved knives or other sharp instruments. In short, the knife is more lethal than the gun, and we have no choice but to tackle the knife culture with great urgency.

Such offences are taking place all over the country. The decent suburban areas and the peaceful rural countryside are not immune to the violence. In my constituency, a pleasant, green and seemingly tranquil part of the world, 54 people were arrested for possessing offensive weapons in just six months of last year. We have had our share of stabbing incidents. Youngsters as young as 10, 11 and 12 years old have been caught with knives.

A regular survey of the press will come up with its own catalogue of tragedy. Barely a week passes without one hearing of a terrible death. I look back, for instance, to February, when a 14-year-old boy was stabbed in the chest while playing with school friends. Last year, the Director of Public Prosecutions, Barbara Mills, reeled in horror when her husband, John, was stabbed just yards from their front door. Just two months ago, a gang fight in west London resulted in death, and in March an amnesty produced 37,000 knives. I imagine—sadly—that that is only a tiny percentage of those still at large. And so the awful tragedy goes on. The nation may be horrified, but with determination, we should be able to prevent our country from sliding into the violent chaos that dominates major US cities such as New York, Washington and Chicago.

The Bill tackles the problem from the bottom. A week ago, the Evening Standard published a despairing article which accused Scotland Yard of being "soft over war on knife culture".

The article suggested that the police were weak in view of the fact that although 60,000 people had been cautioned or prosecuted for having offensive weapons between 1990 and 1994, a mere 1.7 per cent. had been gaoled. The paper was right in one respect, because the law needed to be tightened up, but it was wrong to suggest that nothing was being done.

In many cases, the police were powerless to do more. The Bill will greatly help the police to make an arrest on the spot when they find a person carrying a knife without good reason. Until now, the policeman was powerless. He was empowered only to issue a caution, a warning or a summons, which could sometimes take weeks to go through the system.

In future, the thugs will have a shock when they are caught. Their swaggering arrogance will disappear when they are frog-marched down to the police station. Furthermore, on conviction, they will no longer get away with a ticking off. They will face stiff fines and, according to the circumstances, they may face gaol sentences of up to four years. There will be no hiding place for these mobsters.

Tragically, school premises have been the scene of far too many knife incidents. Until now, schools were a sanctuary, like a church, which the police could not enter to search and arrest. We have therefore taken a significant step in Committee by including in the Bill a provision permitting the police to go into schools to search and arrest. They were not able to do that before because the sanctuary aspect of schools prohibited them when they wanted to go inside. It meant that children felt that they could get away with it.

It is significant that the important step of allowing the police into schools has been welcomed by 14 different teachers' unions and associations. Regrettably, the chief education officer in my Liberal Democrat-controlled authority admitted to my researcher that he could not see any advantage in allowing the police to go into schools and that he was against the suggestion. He speaks for himself and for the Liberal Democrat attitude towards being tough on crime. The Liberal Democrats are certainly out of step.

We shall not rest there. Not only do we want the police to have permission to go into schools, but we want to forbid the sale of knives to under 16-year-olds. We have therefore taken a major step by including in the Bill a provision whereby retailers will not be able to sell knives to teenagers under 16. The truth is that these teenagers feel that buying a knife is smart. It is not; it is cheap and cowardly. The retailer is now protected by the fact that he cannot sell knives to under-16s. If he does and is caught, he will face a fine of up to £5,000.

I trust that the Bill will be the breakthrough that we crave. Society has had enough of this thuggery. There may be many causes. I believe that the breakdown of the family structure has a great deal to do with the problem. Parents who love and control their children, bringing them up in a stable and disciplined environment, are far less likely to find that they have offspring who turn into street thugs. However, this is not the time to apportion blame; it is time to recognise the difficulties that we face and to take firm action.

I am grateful for the support that I have had from my hon. Friend the Minister, from my colleagues and from the Opposition in bringing this important Bill through all its stages. I commend the Bill to the House. I trust that it will have a safe passage when it is piloted through the other place by my father, the Earl of Lauderdale.

12.43 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) on her Bill and on the campaign that preceded it. In each case she has done the community that she represents in Sutton and Cheam, and our nation, a great service. I hope that she will not think it a discourtesy on my part if I leave to see constituents shortly after speaking.

As you will know, Madam Deputy Speaker, Philip Lawrence was my constituent and friend, so I have been extremely close to one of the main triggers of the Bill. I would like to say a word or two about that situation, without prejudice to the forthcoming trial of those charged with his murder.

The position would have been different, and Philip might have been with us today, if the Bill had been in place on 8 December 1995. Philip Lawrence saw a group of thugs outside his school, St. George's, behaving in a menacing way. If such a thing happens now, a headmaster will be able to call the police, who would have power to search those involved, on the suspicion that one of them was carrying a knife, and they would be able to disarm that individual. If that had been the case in December, a brave headmaster would not have had to face a group of thugs who were interfering with one of his pupils—a vulnerable 13-year-old—and then, when his intervention failed to deal with the problem, had to chase them up the road for 200 or 300 yd. Think of the courage of that. At that distance from his school, Philip Lawrence still could not resolve the situation, and he was stabbed in the heart. Somehow he got back to his school, collapsed outside it, was carried in by his colleagues and the children, and died 20 minutes later.

That has been such a tragedy for Philip's family—his dear wife Frances, his brave mother, who is nearly 90, and his four children. It has also been a tragedy for my community and for the nation. I believe that that sort of thing will be prevented in future by the Bill. For that reason alone, the Bill is right and proper.

What more can we say about the Bill's effect on schools? It is profound. For the first time, the police will have the power to enter schools and search for a weapon. My 23 years in teaching included my time as deputy headmaster at a school for 1,100 boys at King's Cross—fine boys, but it was not the easiest of areas. I was subsequently deputy headmaster of a school for 2,200 children from 11 to 19 on the Bellingham estate in

[Mr. Harry Greenway]

Lewisham, and I ran that school for periods of time. So I know that in running a school one often has to face physical challenges. As you know from your own professional days, Madam Deputy Speaker, in schools there are children who will go to Oxford or Cambridge, and there are those who may become criminals if we do not succeed in doing what every school seeks to do and handling them in the best possible way. From time to time I have had to disarm boys with knives and other aggressive weapons—boulders, great pieces of wood, and so on—just as other teachers, head teachers and deputy heads have had to do over the years.

Once the Bill is enacted teachers will not have to do that any more. If there is a suspicion that a pupil has a lethal weapon such as a knife, and if the head and deputy head feel that they cannot handle that difficult situation, they will be able to call in the police to deal with it. That is a sad development, because in one's professional days one liked to feel that one was king of one's classroom and of one's school—as, indeed, one was, and as head teachers, deputies and teachers still are, but they now need the assistance of the facility that the Bill provides to help them handle the serious and growing difficulties which, as we know, have led to the murder of a great headmaster.

I have nothing but praise for what my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam has sought to do, for the way in which she has gone about it and for her achievements in getting the Bill to Third Reading today. I congratulate her.

12.49 pm

Mr. David Nicholson: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) on her work in promoting the Bill and on responding to the horrific statistics and cases that she cited in her speech. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) described in detail the tragic murder of his constituent, and we shall all remember that case for a long time.

I wish to take the House back some 20 years when, perhaps rather rashly, I intervened in an incident in the west end of London. A person was lying on the ground being kicked by a group of four or five thugs and, in coming to his assistance, I was thrown to the ground and sustained a kick under the ribs. The police arrived rapidly, so I and the victim of the assault did not suffer worse damage. I fear that such incidents have become more common in recent years, and I wonder what would have happened to us if the assailants had been armed with knives.

Shortly before that episode, I had moved into a new flat and one evening I disturbed a burglar—a new residence is often burgled at the time of handover. The burglar did not steal anything from my flat, but when I discussed the incident with the owner of the flat downstairs he told me that the burglar had stolen some money from him. I said, "I'm very sorry—I wish that I had tried to apprehend him, but it all happened so suddenly." My neighbour replied, "It's a good thing you didn't do that because he also stole the bread knife." That brings home to us the danger faced by the police—to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam referred—and others going about their business who try to prevent street crime if they tangle with someone who is carrying a knife.

I hope that the Bill will proceed successfully through Parliament. My hon. Friend referred to the powers that the legislation will afford the police to arrest a person for carrying a knife without good reason. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North referred to the powers to search schools on the suspicion that students are carrying knives. We were appalled by the comments of the director of education in the borough of Sutton. I hope that there will be no resistance to the new extremely important powers that the Bill confers on the police to enter schools. They are a way of commemorating Philip Lawrence.

It may be quite easy for students in school who are carrying knives to arouse suspicion. Other students get to know about it, and therefore the staff will become aware that knives are present at the school and that they should call in the police. However, I am concerned about those armed with knives who seek to commit burglaries or street crimes or who simply meet up at the pub and are involved in an affray.

We have heard about the traditions of the Scots and the Sikhs, but people in this country do not carry knives like the characters in Romeo and Juliet—stuck through their belts so that everyone can see them. Most people conceal such weapons. I tried to address earlier—it appears that I was not successful—the problem of how one arouses suspicion and how the police will deal with this matter. Perhaps the police should have more flexible powers to stop and search people so that those who carry knives will run the risk of detection and prosecution.

I welcome the Bill and the powers that it confers, but is it enough? Perhaps in a year or two shall look back and say, "That was the major turning point for the knife culture"—not only because of the penalties, which are the Bill's biggest innovation, but because of the ability of the police to apprehend those who conceal knives on their person. Leaving that concern with my hon. Friends the Member for Sutton and Cheam and the Minister, I welcome the Bill and wish it success.

12.54 pm

Sir Michael Shersby: I join colleagues in all parts of the House in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam on her achievement in bringing her Bill to its Third Reading and taking a signal step in the progress that Parliament is making towards dealing with the difficult problem of the knife culture. The Bill is important to my constituents as to those of every other Member of Parliament, and I am sure that it will be welcomed by many head teachers and others responsible for the safety of children in school.

My one regret is that the Bill does not deal with a major obstacle in detecting whether a person is in possession of an offensive weapon—the inability of a police constable to stop and search a person unless the officer has reasonable grounds for suspecting that he will find a stolen or prohibited weapon. The introduction of the concept of reasonable grounds is the responsibility of the House, following the Brixton riots in the early 1980s and with the subsequent passage of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1994. That concept was backed by a code of practice for the exercise by police officers of statutory powers of stop and search, which set out the circumstances in which an officer can stop and search a person with reasonable grounds for suspicion.

The manuals used to educate and train probationer constables advise that the level of suspicion required to establish reasonable grounds in exercising the power to stop and search is no less than the level required before an officer arrests a person without warrant for an offence that carries such a power of arrest. The existing legislation and its associated guidance are too restrictive in providing police officers with the flexibility to use their powers of stop and search as a preventive measure, which I suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam is of utmost importance.

It is important that the House should recognise that police officers cannot use their substantial experience, knowledge, intuition and training in dealing with potential problems in a proactive way. We all admire the intuition, training, hunches and skill that police officers bring to their work in protecting the citizen, but they are restricted by the provision that I mentioned.

The current restrictive legislation and guidance can be effectively highlighted by an example that is relevant to the Bill, relating to the carrying of knives in or within the vicinity of a school. A police officer might come across a group of youths outside a school, knowing that they do not attend it. He suspects that there could be trouble if the youths remain in the vicinity of the school grounds. He could also be aware that trouble has occurred outside the school before and that knives have been brandished. Nevertheless, unless the police officer has a description that fits the youths concerned, it is unlikely that he would be considered to have reasonable grounds to justify a search. Unfortunately, as the present legislation and guidance is framed, the officer can take little or no positive or preventive action to stop and search the youths.

Since the introduction of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, police officers have been forced to be extremely cautious in their use of stop-and-search powers, which has had a detrimental and negative effect on preventive policing. That does not have to be the case. The legislation and guidance should be framed in such a way that officers are given greater flexibility to execute stop-and-search powers to prevent crime while still being responsible for their actions.

Mr. David Nicholson: My hon. Friend is enunciating the concerns that I was trying to address, and we have had conversations on the subject. Does he agree that the law is different in Scotland and that because the law is more flexible there it has had a significant effect in reducing the knife culture?

Sir Michael Shersby: I agree entirely. The Carrying of Knives etc. (Scotland) Act 1993 is an excellent example of my hon. Friend's point. That legislation relies on an officer having reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person has a prohibited article, and in Scotland the meaning of that phrase is not constrained by the guidance contained in the codes of practice introduced by order in England and Wales alone under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. On its implementation, the Scottish legislation had an immediate and positive effect on crime levels, especially in the Strathclyde area, which was undoubtedly due to police officers' ability to use the power given to them. That power is necessary in England and Wales. In terms of destroying the rapidly expanding knife culture in England and Wales, it is a pity that the Bill will not amend the current legislation and allow officers the power to stop and search, in a preventive manner, in order to protect defenceless and innocent citizens and to allow all members of the public services to perform their duties safely.

One change since the 1984 Act was very welcome and received wide support in the House. That change was contained in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, section 60 of which gives limited powers to a police officer to authorise stop-and-search powers in a specific geographical area for a specific period of time. The powers can be used to search for "dangerous instruments", which are defined as "instruments which have a blade or are sharply pointed".

"of or above the rank of superintendent"

Welcome though the Bill is, I hope that there is still time for my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam and the Government to consider, before the Bill reaches the statute book, whether the time is right to take a further step to restore to our police service the powers of stop-and-search that police officers enjoy in Scotland and which they operate without any difficulty whatever. The Government should have the courage to address the problem, difficult though I realise it is. It is important for the ethnic minority community to understand the importance of restoring to the police the powers that they had before the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and now have in Scotland, because that would be in everyone's interest.

I have one simple message: we have to trust our police. They are highly responsible individuals whose expertise and training are the envy of the world. They should not be restricted by the outdated provisions of the 1984 Act and the codes that have been drawn up under that Act and which every constable has to learn by heart as they go through training school.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam will be kind enough to consider the points that I have made today and use her good offices to see whether, even at this late stage, we might make that change. If she were to be successful, she would have made a magnificent and substantial contribution to improving the policing of this country and to achieving the objectives of this admirable Bill.

1.5 pm

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I consider it to be something of an honour to be a supporter of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) in bringing forward such an important Bill. Throughout all stages of its consideration, we have heard many cases that exemplify why the Bill is necessary. Nevertheless, it came as something of a shock last week when I read the judgment in an especially horrifying case involving some of my constituents. The case was heard at Maidstone Crown court on Thursday last week.

The case concerned four of my constituents, who went out for an evening's entertainment. They were involved in an incident in which they were all stabbed. One of them died. A 23-year-old lad called Mark Simpson, with his young brother Lee and two friends, went out for the evening. The boys were described by a detective sergeant as decent, hard-working young men.

My constituents saw a young girl being harassed by a youth outside a pub in Gillingham. In a public-spirited nature, they intervened to try to save her from harassment. As a result of the affray, all of them were stabbed and, as I said, one of them died. I shall give the House an idea of the nature of the wounds that were inflicted. As for the wounds of my constituent who died, two of the blows were delivered with considerable force, enough to pierce his breastbone and strike his heart, and he had knife wounds to his stomach, ribs and lower spine. What of the three other young lads? It was reported that Lee Simpson had been knifed in his left shoulder blade. Mr. Higgins suffered three stab wounds, one of which damaged his liver. Mr. Shea suffered wounds to his shoulder, back, arm and chest.

[Mr. Jacques Arnold]

Who delivered such grievous wounds? The accused was a certain Daniel Latham, aged 21. He was a chef in a local restaurant. Apparently, he thought it necessary to carry a knife about his person to act as a deterrent because, he said, he had been beaten up in the neighbouring town of Sittingbourne. He thought that he should carry a knife as a deterrent, to show to his mates and to anybody else that he had a knife and that he would use it. And use it he did. It left one of my constituents dead and three others badly wounded.

That incident shows so graphically what remains wrong with the criminal justice system. It shows graphically also why the House needs to pass the Bill. The young thug to whom I referred would not have been carrying a knife if the provisions set out in the Bill had been in force.

What was the sentence that befell the young thug, having been proved to have killed one of my constituents and grievously wounded three others? He received a five-year sentence. My constituents and the grieving family of the boy who died are horrified at what they deem to be a travesty of British justice. Not only did the villain receive a mere five years for having killed a man and grievously wounded three others, but he will serve a prison sentence of only 20 months, by which time he will be eligible for parole. He will serve 20 months for a life.

I strongly support my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and his announcements on honest sentencing because of such cases. Five years' imprisonment in this case patently is not sufficient. When that sentence means only 20 months, I say: how we need honest sentencing.

I was completely flabbergasted at the leniency of that sentence. Mr. Justice Wright, in Maidstone Crown court, told the accused that he, the judge, had a duty to "reflect the public revulsion" over the use of knives. He went on to say:

> "If you and those like you had the sense to realise the stupidity of such behaviour you would not find yourself in the position you now do . . . It is the kind of offence I cannot treat leniently. As a result of your folly and stupidity in carrying that weapon, a man lies dead."

Nevertheless, the sentence was a mere five years.

Could it be that, as I suspect, some kind of plea bargaining had something to do with the sentence? The villain admitted manslaughter. I should have thought that carrying a knife and killing a person was murder, but I am not a lawyer. What irritates me and so many of my constituents is that there currently appears to be some type of grand judicial game-playing in the courts and legal system, which takes no account of the interests of justice or of public protection.

I intend to write to the Attorney-General about that case and to ask him to exercise the opportunity given to him by legislation to refer the case on the ground of undue leniency.

1.11 pm

Mr. Michael: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak briefly on a helpful and positive measure, which we have supported from the start. Some of the debates on the Bill have been constructive and interesting, and have had a positive effect, as did the amendment that was tabled and agreed in Committee.

I must make one serious point about the violence that is being experienced in British society. We have heard speeches today about how violence is increasing and about how tough we need to be to tackle it, and I agree with the general thrust of those remarks. In recent months, however, we have heard from the Home Secretary, time and again, that the level of crime is going down, and that there was a drop of 2 per cent. in crime last year. He has exhibited a degree of complacency that is probably shocking to the Conservative Members who have taken part in today's debate.

We have had a serious and important debate on an important Bill, and I share the worry that has been expressed on both sides of the House about the dangers of a growing knife culture. I also share the sense of urgency with which we should seek to nip that culture in the bud.

It is particularly important to realise that each attack involves a person's injury or death. Events such as Dunblane and the death of the head teacher Mr. Lawrence bring home to us our responsibilities as Members of Parliament in getting legislation right.

The statistics make some extremely important points: last year, the level of violent crime in England and Wales went up by 2 per cent., and the figure for robberies—some of which involve the type of weapons that we are talking about today—increased by 14 per cent. That is not happening only in some parts of the inner city.

The increase in total violent crime in Kent last year was 4 per cent. and robberies in Kent increased by 23 per cent. The figures for London are also very worrying. They show an increase of 2 per cent., which is quite considerable when one considers the size of the metropolis. Robberies in London increased by 17 per cent. Such increases in recorded crimes of violence are extremely worrying. It is important to understand them and not try to brush them under the carpet.

We have debated some of the ways in which the Bill could be extended. The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam has succeeded not only in promoting an important Bill, but in having it improved without delaying its passage through the House. That is quite an achievement and I pay tribute to her for that.

I am a little disappointed that we have not managed to go a little further. We need to target those who encourage or incite people under 16 to purchase weapons. The encouragement and incitement of youngsters to become involved in violent activities does occur. Football hooliganism, gang fights and racial violence do not just happen—they come about because impressionable people, and especially impressionable young people, are encouraged to get involved in violence and are drawn into the culture of violence. We need to tackle those issues as well as implementing the Bill's provisions.

We also need to target those who advertise weapons for sale in a way that incites or condones the possession of a weapon for violent purposes. I shall not rerun our previous debate, but I hope that the Minister will reflect on what has been said today and read not only my comments, but those of my hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary, the hon. Members for Sutton and Cheam and for Uxbridge and others, which have drawn attention to the horrific nature of some advertisements.

There is still time for the Minister to persuade the Home Secretary that, when the Bill goes, as I hope it will, speedily and efficiently through its stages in another place, it should have added to it a provision to extend its scope, which would tackle the problem of the advertising of weapons.

We certainly give two cheers today—one for the Bill and one for extending it to make it illegal to sell weapons to young people under 16, as my hon. Friend suggested. I plead with the Minister to think again and extend the Bill's scope to tackle the small and preventable problem of mail order catalogues and advertising which can put dangerous and potentially lethal weapons into the hands of those who should not have them in their possession. That would be an important addition, which would protect the public, and I am sure that it would win the third cheer from both sides of the House.

1.17 pm

Mr. Kirkhope: I must express the Government's gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam for agreeing to take forward this very important Bill. I know that that gratitude is shared by the whole House. My hon. Friend has also been very much involved in considering the proposals that were added to the Bill in Committee.

It is fair to say that there is a high degree of acceptance by hon. Members on both sides of the House not only of the notion that the evil of knife carrying and other knife-related crime should be stamped on, but of the type of measures that we should be looking at to achieve that. The Government have long recognised the need to empower the police to deal with such problems.

The Prevention of Crime Act 1953 made it an offence to carry an offensive weapon in public without good reason or lawful authority. A knife is not an offensive weapon in itself, as it can have all manner of legitimate uses. It can, however, be regarded as an offensive weapon when the prosecution can prove that the carrier intended to cause injury with it. The police were experiencing difficulties in proving intent in many cases, even though common sense dictated that knife carriers were not carrying knives for use as, say, legitimate kitchen implements.

Because of that difficulty, we introduced in section 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 an offence of carrying a knife without good reason or lawful authority. In addition, we introduced in section 141 of that Act the power to prohibit the manufacture, sale and importation of specified weapons. An order made under that section specifies 14 articles, including swordsticks and knuckledusters. That is in addition to flick knives and gravity knives, which are already prohibited under the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959.

The provisions in the Bill build largely on the foundations already provided in other legislation. The proposed ban on the sale of knives to people under 16 is a new and radical measure, and one that is entirely justified. Common sense cries out that people in that age group should not be able, for the most part, to buy knives.

Let me explain about exclusions. In drawing up clause 6—which the Government introduced as an amendment in Committee—we gave careful consideration to the definition of precisely what we wished to cover in the ban on the sale of knives to people under 16. We need a workable provision and, if we introduced a long list of exceptions, I fear that that would not be achievable. We none the less recognise that certain articles covered by the definition proposed in new section 141A(2) should be excluded, and can be without undue threat to the clarity of the measure.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary proposes to exclude two articles in that way. The first is the folding pocket knife with a blade no longer than 3 in. The reasons are simple. First, buying a penknife has been a natural experience for many a child, on holiday, in souvenir shops, before going camping with the boy scouts or girl guides or for fishing. There is an argument that, if a child wants such a penknife, it should be bought for him by a parent. I do not wish to exaggerate the importance of maintaining the freedom of children to buy penknives, but I think it important to make that concession. Another reason is that penknives are not a significant part of the knife culture that many police officers are now witnessing.

I said that two articles were covered by the ban. Let me explain what is meant by a knife blade. It is simple, although unpleasant, to explain. Most of us are familiar with craft knives of the Stanley knife variety, which are extremely useful for a variety of tasks but also much favoured by young knife carriers for their slashing qualities. The blades of such knives can be easily detached and replacement blades purchased. Those blades are not covered by the definition "any knife". By themselves they are not very bulky, and they are therefore sometimes carried by young thugs who wish to evade searches on entering, for example, football grounds. Even without the handle, the blades can inflict great injury, and it would be a mistake not to include them in the ban.

Clause 6(2)(a) refers to "any . . . razor blade". What most of us understand by a razor blade is a blade used in an old-fashioned safety razor. That needs to be included in the ban for reasons similar to those that I have just given in relation to replacement blades for craft knives. Razor blades are not, however, covered by the definition "knife blade", and therefore need to be specified separately. That creates a difficulty—which brings me to the second of the two articles to which I have referred.

In Committee, I said that disposable razor blades should be excluded from the ban. By "disposable razor blades", I mean the plastic cartridges with two short blades protruding. Not much damage can be done with those, beyond the superficial injuries that may be self-inflicted by the inexperienced shaver. It is perfectly right that someone under 16 who has begun shaving should be able to purchase his own disposable razor blades.

The Bill has enormous support throughout the House. It has been presented and prepared admirably by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam. The support of the House has continued throughout the Bill's stages. I am disappointed only by the fact that, a few moments ago, the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth accused my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary of being complacent. Whatever the political grounds on which the hon. Gentleman might wish to criticise my right hon. and learned Friend, to describe him and his vigorous attacks on crime as complacent strikes me as inappropriate and very much against the general tenor of our consideration of the Bill.

[Mr. Kirkhope]

Mr. Michael rose—

Mr. Kirkhope: No, I will not give way. I have made my point, as the hon. Gentleman made his.

I noted the hon. Gentleman's remarks carefully. As I said, in certain respects the Government will continue to look carefully not only at his remarks, but at elements affecting the general area of the advertising and sale of knives.

I shall finish as I started. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam on her wonderful achievement. This important legislation will do an enormous amount of good.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Prisoners' Earnings Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Order for Third Reading read.

1.24 pm

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

It gives me great pleasure to return this short, but important, Bill to the House. This is the first time that we have considered it orally in the Chamber. The proceedings in Committee established beyond all doubt that this will be a practical and useful measure. I thank all hon. Members who served on the Committee for their thoughtful and constructive contributions and for maintaining the all-party consensus that the Bill has attracted.

I am grateful to the members of the Howard League for Penal Reform and of the Penal Affairs Consortium, to Home Office officials, who have just entered their Box, and to the many others who have supported or issued guidance on the Bill. For many years, I have felt that the practice of prisoners being unemployed and idle in prison should be reversed. They should pay their debt to society while they are in prison, and that would be an opportunity for them to prepare themselves to re-enter society as law-abiding, useful citizens. I raised this matter with Iain Macleod, a former right hon. Member of the House, when I was a mere stripling of a student. Unfortunately, he was unable to agree with me at that time, so I am glad to bring the matter to the House now.

In a publication that was kindly published by the CPC in 1992, I wrote about the importance of prisoners paying something directly to the victims of crime. That is part of the Bill.

The Bill follows a series of important reports from Woolf, Tumim and Learmont, who all called for more work to be provided in prisons and for more financial responsibility to be accepted by prisoners. In recent years, there has been a growing recognition of the need to give the interests of victims greater prominence in the way in which the criminal justice system operates. One of the Bill's key objectives is to give prisoners the opportunity and the encouragement to do something for victims and potential victims of crime. To achieve that, prisons must provide the capacity for prisoners to work hard and productively, and we need a robust system for deducting part of their earnings to help victims and for other appropriate purposes.

The Bill has three purposes. They are: crime prevention, national housework and help for victims. Victims can be divided into three categories—actual victims, families of victims and taxpayers.

The Bill is not about increasing prisoners' wages, but it allows for a modest pay increase which is necessary to motivate them. Since 1991, the Prison Service has made commendable progress in developing so-called enhanced wages schemes. In 18 prisons, 1,300 prisoners out of 9,000 are employed by prison industries and farms on this scheme. Instead of earning the ordinary wage of £7 a week, prisoners on the scheme are paid £15 or perhaps, occasionally, a little more. However, the average amount is £15. The effects on motivation and output have been quite dramatic. In one workshop output has tripled from the same number of workers. The beauty of the scheme is that all the extra pay is funded from the value of the extra output produced, so there is no net cost to the taxpayer.

The introduction of a comprehensive system of deductions has been held back by the lack of a proper legal framework, so the Bill provides a clear statutory framework for four deductions: board and lodgings, upkeep of dependants, savings and contributions to victim support and crime prevention schemes. Participation in the enhanced wages scheme to which deductions will apply is a privilege. Prisoners will earn that privilege. Only then will they be allowed to take part. If they are not allowed that privilege, the alternatives will be ordinary prison work on ordinary prison pay.

I have little doubt that the scheme will prove popular among prisoners, leading to increased levels of activity in prison workshops and to busy prisons. It will mean that prison authorities will have to find more work for prisoners. I understand people's concerns about where the work will come from. It is crucial that it should not be obtained at the expense of law-abiding jobseekers in the wider community. That is why the Prison Service is increasingly seeking to work in partnership with private sector firms seeking opportunities for import substitution, and making every effort to ensure that local jobs are not lost. The prison population is about 54,000. If we can get a high proportion of those people working productively, that will help in a small way to stimulate the economy and to contribute to growth and a reduction in unemployment.

May I share with hon. Members a few examples that illustrate those points? For a Manchester firm, bulk container bag production is in progress in certain prisons. That involves import substitutions that would otherwise come from Turkey. For a midlands firm, safe workwear is being produced by machinists in prisons after advertisements locally for machinists produced no replies. Again, no local jobs have been lost.

For Minit shoe repair shops, refurbishing of machines takes place at Wymott prison. For the Prison Service, mugs and toothbrushes are produced at Ranby prison—there is even a night shift to produce those. For another company, mozzarella and ricotta cheese are produced at East Sutton Park. If that prompts hon. Members to ask, next time they eat a pizza, where the cheese comes from, so be it.

In the course of producing the Bill and during its passage through the House, I have been asked some questions. I should like to respond quickly on a few of them. What of prisoners' dependants? Will they lose social benefits? If there is a payment from the prisoner to the family, there may be some replacement of social security benefit, but, given that one of the main causes of spiralling crime is the break-up of family life, I believe that if the Bill can retain the link between the prisoner and the dependant family so that marriages are saved, that will reduce the likelihood of an offender reoffending.

How will the Bill affect the enhanced wages scheme? It will not affect the scheme badly. Prisoners will still be better off than under the old mailbag and pocket money scheme. The enhanced wages scheme will still succeed.

Will prisons directly benefit from the Bill? That is especially relevant to contracted-out prison services. There is a yes and a no. Money from the payment for board and lodging will go directly to the Consolidated Fund and to the Treasury, so no contracted-out prison—indeed, no prison—will have any conflict of interest, but prisons will benefit because morale in them will be better and they can apply to the Treasury or the Consolidated Fund for project money, possibly from that source.

How will the money be apportioned? I have already mentioned the four destinations. Initially, it will be split simply among four objects, but over the years it may be varied accordingly to what seems relevant in a particular case.

What safeguards will there be against excessive deductions? There will be the prison rules and there will be common sense. This is a voluntary scheme that will succeed only with the will and motivation of the prisoners. In any event, we are signatories to conventions that prevent the use of forced labour which we must observe.

How will the funds be administered? The prisons will set up savings accounts and systems to send money directly to dependants and to voluntary victim support and crime prevention organisations.

Will the scheme be unfair to the unemployed? Indeed, it was put to me by a forceful journalist yesterday that prisoners should stick to breaking rocks in prison. It does not help anyone for prisoners to remain idle. It just adds to our economic burden. It is in the interests of even the unemployed that when prisoners leave prison they have a greater likelihood of going straight, not least because many of the victims of crime are themselves unemployed.

The Government have a proud record on victim support, the funds for which have been increased by 8 per cent. this year. Some £11.7 million has been paid out this year. Under the present arrangements, this Bill will add money to that. That is what the Government intend and there are no plans to change that. Compensation orders will be paid first by offenders in prison, before they become part of the scheme.

There are no losers under the Bill, only winners. Prisoners are motivated, because they will have a little more cash in hand to save for their release. They will gain self-respect from contributing to the upkeep of their dependants. Victim support and crime prevention organisations will benefit from the additional financial assistance they will receive. Society as a whole will gain in two major ways. First, prisoners will come out of prison with some work experience that will help them to resettle in society and avoid reoffending. Indeed, some evidence shows that there is a 50 per cent. greater likelihood that prisoners who have been earning properly, given responsibility and earning respect for themselves in prison will go straight and choose honesty when they come out of prison. Secondly, prisoners will be working more productively. They will be putting something back into the economy rather than just being a burden on the taxpayer.

For the sake of victims of crime, for the sake of prisoners' families, for the sake of the economy and for the sake of all of us, I commend the Bill to the House.

1.38 pm

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I welcome the Bill. The hon. Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) has taken a constructive approach to the way in which we deal with imprisonment. It is a pity that there is such a short time to discuss the Bill. I understand that the Government are desperate to reach the Constitutional Change Bill of the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker), which deals with referendums.

[Mr. Alun Michael]

The Prisoners' Earnings Bill merits a longer debate as it raises a variety of important issues. However, I do not intend to delay the House. I am afraid that, again, I shall rouse the Minister's zeal to defend the indefensible by pointing out the background against which we are debating the Bill. The Home Secretary is complacent not only about violent crime but about the chaotic state of the Prison Service. That fact has been confirmed by Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons, as well as by his predecessor.

During this Parliament, the prison population has soared from about 46,500 to about 54,000. That reflects the Government's dramatic failure to address the causes of crime. To make matters even worse, the Prison Service is having to cope with a budget cut of 14.5 per cent. in real terms over the next three years. Not only is that a difficulty facing the Prison Service but it is worrying for the public generally, because if the Prison Service is not effective, a series of offenders who have not been reformed and are likely to reoffend will come back into the community.

Prison certainly has a number of purposes. Punishment and deterrent are crucial, but rehabilitation and making recompense to victims, whether financial or in some other form, are also ways in which the offender should pay his debt to society. It is in the interests of the public for restitution to be paid. It is certainly in the interests of the public and potential future victims to give prisoners a sense of discipline, self-worth and experience of work that is likely to result in their being less likely to reoffend when they are released at the end of their sentence. There are many other issues, such as drugs in prison and the ineffectiveness of much of the psychiatric work that should be going on there, but they go well beyond the Bill's scope.

Reoffending is certainly an issue on which the House should be united. It is not best achieved by sending offenders to so-called "universities of crime". It would be far more prudent to ensure that, once convicted, all activities in which prisoners engage are geared towards effective rehabilitation. That is why we welcome the Bill and have long argued for the principle of productive remunerated work in prisons.

Before the Bill was introduced, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) said on the issue to which it refers:

> "Partnerships between prisons and industry could provide invaluable training with genuine qualifications, so that prisoners will have something to offer back to society on their release rather than improved criminal skills."

Community service schemes have rightly been applauded where they force offenders to make some recompense to their victims, but there is no reason why prisoners should not work to compensate their victims as well. We are looking at ways in which industry can be brought into partnership so that the lot of prisoners' victims can be improved, while ensuring that prisoners are less likely to offend after release.

A balance must of course be struck, because it would be wrong if offenders who ended up in prison were treated better than those in society who are also without proper employment and have not offended in the serious way that has led to imprisonment. I am sure that the hon. Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) would agree that the Government must maintain a careful balance so that prisoners are not favoured at the expense of other sections of society. Once that is accepted, the principle will be welcome.

We recognise the value of productive work in rehabilitating prisoners, and it is a shocking indictment of policy that, at the end of the 20th century, we do not have effective rehabilitative programmes in all our prisons. One ex-prisoner commented in The Guardian:

> "The boredom in prison is mindless. Facilities like education, sport or the library are very limited in terms of time and quality and more often take the role of baby-sitting rather than adult stimulation".

A disproportionately large proportion of prisoners have few or no qualifications. A facility to award genuine qualifications based on work could greatly help them to find gainful work following release. Conversely, many other prisoners are highly qualified, and we should try to make them work in prison-based employment that utilises their skills. Just as in the outside world, neither prisoners nor the community at large benefit from wasted ability.

Offenders should never be allowed to earn more money than law-abiding citizens in the community or be advantaged in comparison. I understand and have some sympathy for the proposal that a proportion of the moneys earned should be directed towards victim support schemes and crime prevention measures. We support those very strongly. Community service schemes have rightly made recompense to the victims of crime. It is high time that prisoners should be able to do the same.

However, some concerns have been raised by the Victim Support national office and I hope that the Minister will address two points in his response. First, at the moment, compensation orders are not usually made against offenders who are sent to prison because it is assumed that they cannot pay. A far greater number of prisoners should be able to pay compensation to their victims than is provided for in the Bill. In other words, is it not right that the first call on compensation if a prisoner is able to earn money should be the victim of the crimes for which he has been convicted? I would be interested to know whether the Minister feels that that principle is covered adequately and, if not, whether he will introduce measures to ensure that that principle underlies the way in which we approach a prisoner's responsibility towards the victim or victims of his crime. I am sure that the hon. Member for Finchley, the Bill's promoter, does not disagree with that principle.

The second aspect on which the Victim Support national office has expressed concern, which may go rather more to the content of the Bill, is the compulsory charitable donation. Although the Bill states that donations will be used for voluntary organisations concerned with victim support and crime prevention, there seems to be a suggestion that the main beneficiary will be victim support. If prisoners were allowed to choose the charity to which they gave money, there would be an opportunity for proper thought and discussion about the effects of crime on victims and for reparation.

As the Bill stands, the donation looks a bit like a tax on prisoners. Victim Support is worried about the implication for its Home Office funding. It has always believed that the organisation should be funded by the main criminal justice budget and that the funding should not be dependent on a levy on prisoners. That point ties well with the principle, which I put forward a moment ago, that the first call on the money should be direct compensation for the victims of the crimes that the prisoners have committed. I hope that the Minister will accept that point and the principle behind it.

The notion that some money should be diverted to the cost of keeping inmates in prison is welcome as long as, again, it is not seen as purely a cost-cutting exercise. Reductions in the Prison Service budget have already placed great strain on vital services such as education provision and basic security. As with productive work and training, education is important if we are to produce people who not only have been punished by being in prison and by the discipline of prison but come out more likely to avoid reoffending and to be reasonable members of the wider community. I hope that the Minister can respond positively on that point.

The creation of an investment fund for use by prisoners on release should greatly assist in the first few weeks following release. There are far too many cases of prisoners coming out of prison, being totally adrift and almost drifting into reoffending because their circumstances are not very positive. Obviously, they are still to blame for any offences which they commit. However, it is a foolish society that does not anticipate that danger and does not try to build in protections. For that reason, the proposal to give a prisoner something with which to plan a future on release is positive and sensible, and does not conflict with the concept of punishment for which prison is intended.

I hope that the Minister will respond to my specific questions about the way in which the legislation will be pursued. As I said, the Bill has our support. I welcome this initiative, and congratulate the hon. Member for Finchley on promoting the Bill and on bringing it successfully and simply to its Third Reading.

1.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): I do not intend to allow my remarks to range as far and wide as those of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael). Before I speak on Third Reading in general, I must say to him that, although it is of course possible not only that the numbers of inmates in our prisons have been increasing but that they will continue to increase when my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's tough new sentencing laws are in place, our discussions on the Bill have to do with how productive prisoners' lives may be when they are in prison.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) on having brought the Bill through to the point where we are on the verge of giving it a Third Reading. The fact that the Bill has made such relatively trouble-free progress through its Commons stages, and arrives back in the Chamber without amendment, is the result, I think, of two main factors.

First, the proposals themselves are eminently sensible. They open the way for some exciting developments in the way in which work is provided for prisoners in the future, and, as my hon. Friend said, they do so in a way that means that there are no losers as a result of the Bill, only winners.

Apart from the proposals themselves, the second key factor has been the way in which my hon. Friend has guided the Bill through its various stages, building and maintaining a consensus that has embraced hon. Members on both sides of the House. I know that he has also been assiduous in ensuring that outside organisations concerned with crime and the treatment of offenders were consulted, and were content with the direction set by the Bill.

As the House will know, the Prison Service, along with other parts of the public sector, is currently having to examine its operations very critically to meet demanding cost reduction targets; but Ministers and the prisons board have made it clear that we expect cost reductions to come mainly from increased efficiency, not from cuts in regime activities, especially those that can be shown to be beneficial from the point of view of reducing the risk of reoffending after release.

Constructive work clearly falls into that category, and because it actually brings income into the system to offset operating costs, it is in a unique position to maintain or increase the amount of activity provided, while at the same time reducing the net cost of the activity. The key is to get more prisoners to work, and to get prisoners working harder when they are at work. Although work is compulsory for convicted prisoners, those objectives cannot be achieved simply by coercion. As the existing wages schemes show, prisoners will work harder if there is a reasonable incentive.

The arrangements cannot simply be left at that. Prisoners do not have the same living expenses as other people, and it would be wrong for them to accumulate spending money without contributing to the cost of their upkeep, to the upkeep of their dependants or to victim support schemes. The Bill therefore establishes a sensible framework, with appropriate safeguards, for such deductions, as well as for using part of prisoners' earnings for compulsory savings to be repaid on release.

In many ways, the Bill had its origin in the Woolf report on the Strangeways disturbances, but it is also totally in line with the Learmont report, with its call for much more active industrial prisons.

There are two outstanding points. First, I confirm for the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth that a compensation order to an individual victim of course takes precedence over any other deduction, and that will continue to happen.

Secondly, I agree that Victim Support should derive its main funding from public funds. The Bill does not pre-empt the decision on the voluntary organisations to which deductions should go. Those will be prescribed by prison rules. However, I am interested in the possibility that, when the matter is decided on a local committee basis for prisons, there may be more consultation with prisoners on how the money should be allocated.

I do not want to detain the House. The measure—

Mr. Michael: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Kirkhope: Very briefly, because I do not want to detain the House.

Mr. Michael: I am grateful for the positive way in which the Minister responded on those two points. That is most helpful, and enables us to be even more enthusiastic about the Bill. As victims of the actual crimes will have priority in the allocation of compensation, will there be a change in the guidance to the courts, to take account of the change arising from the Bill?

Mr. Kirkhope: Obviously, notification of the legislation's provisions would be given to courts where appropriate. I remind the House that the question of compensation paid to a victim is always a matter for the courts. They take into account all relevant circumstances when deciding whether a compensation order is appropriate. The Bill's provisions will be made known to the relevant parties.

[Mr. Kirkhope]

I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing an excellent measure that will make a positive contribution to prison life and will be acceptable to the wider community. I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Constitutional Change Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

1.54 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am grateful to the House for giving me an opportunity to present my Bill for Second Reading today. I also place on record my thanks to the Clerks for their help in drafting my Bill.

As I stated during my ten-minute Bill speech, the Bill seeks to address the political and constitutional problems that may develop from some of the constitutional proposals being discussed currently. The Bill's objective is to provide for consultation with the people by way of referendum before implementing any constitutional change that is approved by Parliament. In other words, after a Bill has completed its passage through both Houses of Parliament, it must be put to a national referendum in order to decide whether Parliament's proposals will be accepted. There are precedents for that in the Scotland Act 1978 and in a different form in the European Communities Act 1972.

I have news for Sir James Goldsmith: my Bill is not a response to his public statements and actions. In my case, he is about 25 years too late. However, I welcome converts to my cause—even if I have doubts about the wisdom of their tactics.

My Bill, and particularly clause 1, reflects the view that I have held for most of my adult life and follows the line that I took during the public debates in the early 1970s and during the constitutional debates and discussions in the late 1970s. Although I was on the losing side in the 1975 referendum, I support the view that it was constitutionally correct and proper to hold such a referendum.

Clause 1(1) states clearly that any change, redirection or transfer of Parliament's powers agreed by both Houses of Parliament must be put to the people in a referendum. This Parliament, with all its shortcomings—it has a number—is still the finest democratic Parliament anywhere in the world. A cornerstone of the unwritten constitution is the fact that no Parliament can bind future Parliaments. In recent years, constitutional change has undermined that cornerstone. I believe that proposals now under discussion will continue that process.

I believe that Members of Parliament hold the leasehold for our unwritten constitution during their time in this place. While it is in their care, they may make changes that can be altered next week, next year, in five or 10 years or at any time in the future. However, they should not alter the constitution in such a way that it may be impossible for future Parliaments to change it back if they so wish. Hon. Members hold only the leasehold; I believe that the freehold for the unwritten constitution of the United Kingdom is the property of the people. Only the people should change the constitution. Sometimes that is called sovereignty: the power of Parliament. The right to create and repeal legislation, to raise taxes, to borrow and to spend, and the right to block supply are powers of Parliament.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), wrote in the March issue of The European Journal, the journal of the European Foundation:

"I launched the Maastricht Referendum Campaign, MARC—which ran from February to July 1993 under the patronage of Lady Thatcher. This meshed with a parliamentary rebellion of a number of colleagues and myself which involved a relentless effort to amend the Maastricht Bill. MARC organised a popular petition to the House of Commons with over 280,000 signatures—no small achievement for an organisation that had to start from scratch without the support of any political party or trade union or any other body with a ready-made national membership and administration. Although it did not succeed in its immediate objective of obtaining a referendum on the Maastricht Treaty, the campaign did generate huge media interest and began the process of swaying public opinion. This is now—The Sunday Times has shown—80 per cent. in favour of a referendum on monetary union, which is now the key issue . . . Lastly let me rebut the silly suggestion that a referendum should be advisory rather than binding. The issue to be decided, let me repeat, is whether we are to continue as a parliamentary democracy or not. That decision cannot be taken by a single parliament for all future generations, any more than a board of directors can merge a company without reference to a general meeting of their shareholders. The source of sovereignty and legitimate authority is the people."

I agree.

Nobody who has studied that which monetary union would involve throughout Europe denies that if Parliament decides to join the single European currency there would be a massive shift to Europe of areas of decision making—that if we signed up for the single currency, there would be a substantial change to the constitutional decision-making powers of this Parliament. Clause 1(1) would ensure that the people would have to be consulted in a referendum.

Part of the problem when discussing the single currency is that the debate is against the background of the UK agreeing that it would not oppose other EU member states going ahead with monetary union. I mention that because, as with many European matters, the negative as well as the positive often has an impact on what may or may not happen.

Another cornerstone of the unwritten constitution is the right of Members of Parliament to ask questions and have them answered. That right, coupled with parliamentary privilege, means that hon. Members can raise matters on behalf of constituents without the risk of action outside Parliament, and all that is done at no direct cost to constituents. Powers ceded by Parliament or given away affect that cornerstone. Again, the unwritten constitution and the citizen's rights and freedoms are affected. I will say more about that aspect later.

Another constitutional area under discussion is the proposals for or assemblies in Edinburgh, Cardiff or Belfast. I will confine my remarks to the proposal for Edinburgh, although the problems and principles apply to all three. Clause 1(1) would ensure that any proposal put before Parliament will be debated against the background that whatever is decided by Parliament will have to be put to the people in a referendum. That means that if, heaven help us, we ever had a Labour Government, its Front Benchers would be led by a Scot educated at a fee-paying selective Scottish school. It would have a Cabinet in which the majority of the key posts, such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Foreign Secretary, Secretary of State for Scotland and Patronage Secretary—who has been in and out of the Chamber all morning—will not only be Scots but be from Scottish constituencies. In addition, many of the Ministers of State will be Scots from Scottish constituencies. English Members, representing 83 per cent. of the United Kingdom population, would be right to say that the Scots were running the United Kingdom Parliament. Consequently, clause 1(1) would force that subject to be at the forefront of the debate.

The debate would probably run as follows: the Scots would be running the Westminster Parliament, yet they would also run Scotland separately. English Members would be unable to vote on matters devolved to Scotland, yet Scottish Members would be able to vote on English education, law and order, local government, transport, the environment and other purely English legislative proposals. Scottish Members would be unable to ask questions or to have debates on matters that have been devolved to the Scottish Parliament or Assembly. They would become part-time Members of Parliament and probably should be paid part-time salaries. The cry would be throughout the country: "Is that fair?" Fair, it will not be. The constitutional change would be substantial, which is why clause 1(1) would properly require the matter, after it had been decided by Parliament, to be put to the people in a referendum.

The United Kingdom constitution is not cast in stone. It has evolved since 1707 to meet the needs of the times. Its great strength has been its ability to change. It has changed because Members of Parliament have introduced change, and they have done so by consultation and agreement and in the knowledge that a future Parliament could not be bound by their decisions. There is no consultation or agreement about laws imposed on us by Europe, especially by the European Court of Justice. Is it any wonder that there is ever-increasing concern in the country?

Any proposal to change the way in which we vote in general elections may also be caught by clause 1(1). If so, any proposal for a change to a proportional representation system of voting may have to be put to the people in a referendum.

Clause 1(2) would determine the way in which the question would be asked in a referendum. Parliament would have debated the proposed change, in both Houses, and those debates—from the experience of previous constitutional debates—would be fairly protracted, lengthy and contain considerable detail. I imagine that they would have been fully reported by the media, so no one would be able to claim with any confidence that the issue was too complex to be put to the people. The people would have followed the debates with interest and, as in the Scotland Act 1978 and the Referendum Act 1975, the question put in the referendum would be

"Do you think that these changes should be brought into force?"

The changes would be clearly stated, whatever they were, so the people would be asked, for example, "Do you wish to set up a Parliament in Edinburgh: yes or no?" or "Do you wish to join a single currency: yes or no?" The clause would address the point that many constitutional experts have made about the difficulty of asking a clear and simple question. In my experience of the Scotland Act 1978 and the following referendum, it was easy to explain what that was about. I say that because I was not on the losing side in that referendum, although I was on the losing side in the 1975 referendum.

Clause 2(1) deals with the conduct of a referendum. It sets out clearly how a referendum should be carried out. There would be no problem, because we have already had the experience of the referendums that I have mentioned. I will not go into detail because the process would be fairly straightforward. Clause 2(2) provides for the conduct of the counting of the votes, and gives details of the counting officers' duties.

[Mr. Bill Walker]

Clause 3 is important. It provides that no court

"shall entertain any proceedings for questioning . . . the numbers . . . or the validity of anything done or purporting to be done under" the Bill if it becomes an Act. That is to prevent unnecessary interference through the courts.

Clause 4 cites the name of what will become the Act. The schedule sets out the form of the ballot paper.

It would be wrong of me not to draw attention to the final part of clause 1. I want to draw particular attention to it. Subsection (7) reads:

"If it appears to the Secretary of State that fewer than 40 per cent of the persons entitled to vote in the referendum have voted yes, he shall lay before Parliament the draft of an Order in Council providing for the repeal of the provisions which were the subject of the referendum."

That is important. That was set out in the Scotland Act 1978, and the provision worked superbly. About one third voted for, about one third against—with those voting for slightly more than those voting against—and one third did not vote. As we in Scotland say, "They didna' care". Of course, they had already been told that if they did not vote their potential vote would be treated as a no vote. That was explained. I think that some lessons were learnt.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister would like to say a few words about my Bill. That being so, I shall not detain the House too long. However, with constitutional change of the sort and magnitude that I have described, I have taken the precedent of the 1978 Act as my guide. It worked well at the time and I believe that it would provide the right levels of checks and balances that are normally expected when substantial constitutional change is to be workable and acceptable. The alternative might create severe political instability.

I believe that my Bill is a necessary measure. Something of its sort will have to be put on the statute book because of the instability that we are experiencing, caused largely by public debate and the pressures that have been mounted by Sir James Goldsmith and others who wish to interfere with the way in which we run things in Parliament.

I make no apology for defending Parliament. I believe that this is the finest Parliament anywhere in the world. We do not get everything right and we do not have all the correct procedures. Only a fool would suggest otherwise. I can say, however, that if my grandchildren inherit what I inherited—the unwritten United Kingdom constitution and all the protections to which I have referred—I shall have passed on to them an extremely valuable inheritance.

If we continue to allow the erosion of Parliament's decision-making powers and if we shackle future Parliaments, or if we seek powers in a way that means that Members can no longer ask questions affecting the rights of their constituents, as is happening progressively, we shall have undermined the cornerstones of our unwritten constitution. That would be foolish and unwise.

It would be foolish and unwise of the Scots, with less than 9 per cent. of the United Kingdom population, to expect to run Parliament and to run a parliament at Edinburgh at the same time, without that process producing a massive constitutional backlash. Against the background of pressures from Europe and those for constitutional change that have not been thought through adequately and fully, and the instability that could ensue and risk the break-up of the United Kingdom that I visualise if the Scots were to be foolish enough to think that they could have their cake and eat it by having the running of this place in their hands—and the running of a parliament in Edinburgh—I have introduced the Bill. I firmly believe that we need such a measure to ensure that we move forward sanely and sensibly on the basis of consultation and consent.

2.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): I am very grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) for today giving us an opportunity to consider the arguments for and against the principle of referenda as possible tools in the machinery of government that are available to the Government of the day. Regardless of how this debate might develop and of how the wider discussion of these issues may progress outside the House, I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute on a more fundamental issue.

The Bill seeks to put in place a statutory requirement for consultation through the referendum process. But consultation—a readiness to be open to the advice of the electorate and the responsibility of representing the views of the electorate—is the very business of the House and of Members of Parliament. The role of the constituency Member of Parliament is the very bedrock of the system of representative democracy that we have created in this country over very many years, and we are responsible for maintaining it as an effective and valued service.

I acknowledge—as I am sure that other right hon. and hon. Members do—the example set for us all by my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside, and the conscientious and assiduous manner with which he has represented the views, needs and aspirations of his constituents since he was first elected to the House, in 1979, for the constituency of Perth and East Perthshire. The role of the constituency Member of Parliament, as he well knows, is not an easy one—we can all testify to that—but it is a vital one if our constituents and the electorate more widely are to continue to place their trust in us faithfully to represent their views and interests.

There is no question but that the issue of referendums has been much in the minds of some people. It has, of course, been even more in the minds of an even greater number of journalists and other members of the press and media. Their efforts to talk up the role of referendums has been of more than passing interest to many of my right hon. and hon. Friends. It is therefore useful for us to have a chance to air—or in some cases, I hope, to put in perspective—the benefits that might be expected to flow from a use of referendums that is different from what we have previously known in this country.

I have been struck by the way in which hon. Members have occasionally been seduced by the propaganda about referenda. There is a tendency to think that a referendum will provide an instant "fix" when Governments are faced, as they must be on occasion, with difficult decisions. This Bill takes as its starting point the fact that the system of parliamentary democracy that the United Kingdom enjoys is somehow no longer robust enough to ensure that decisions taken in this House and in another place will properly reflect the people's consent.

It is right that I should make it clear from the outset that I do not accept such a viewpoint. Parliamentary democracy, as practised in the United Kingdom, is precisely about the need to ensure that decisions are taken by Governments in the light of and with the mandate of the population. That mandate is exactly what is tested at every general election, when the people of the United Kingdom are invited to consider clear statements of policy set out in the party manifestos. We hope that there will be clear statements of policy from the Labour party in due course.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): You'll be lucky.

Mr. Kirkhope: Indeed; as my hon. Friend says, I might be lucky.

People then make their choices and elect a representative whose job it is to represent their views and give effect to the policies that he or she was elected to follow. That is certainly a role that has been performed admirably by my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside over the years.

The process of electing representatives and, through those representatives, of formulating a Government is central to the way in which these islands are governed. The general election campaign provides the electorate with the opportunity to test the policies of competing candidates and their parties and proposals. They may do that not on one isolated issue considered apart from the realities of the broader national requirement, but on the full range of concerns which a Government must be prepared to address.

By comparison, a referendum can be a pale and limited thing indeed. That is not to say that a referendum may not engender excitement. Indeed, I see that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) is getting excited.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Not very.

Mr. Kirkhope: I must urge him not to get too excited in view of the time available.

We must be clear, however, that excitement and involvement of the people are not necessarily the same thing. The experience of the 1975 referendum undoubtedly caused a great deal of noise and excitement, as some of us may recall, but is interesting to note that the turnout at the poll did not reflect any great improvement in the extent to which the attention of the electorate was engaged. Indeed, at about 64 per cent., the turnout was considerably lower than we have come to expect at a general election and, if repeated at a general election would, I suspect, be considered a condemnation of the policies and personalities being put to the electorate.

A distinction is often made between referendums and plebiscites. "Plebiscite" is, of course, much the older term, going back—if they will forgive me—to the vote of the plebs in Rome in the 4th century BC and it was used for the popular consultations in France from 1793 onward. "Referendum" in its current sense appeared in English only in the 1880s, although the Swiss cantons had decided issues ad referendum 200 years earlier.

Eighty years ago, "referendum" was the term used by reform movements throughout the English-speaking world to denote the idea of putting issues directly to the electorate. "Plebiscite" was the term used to describe the efforts by the League of Nations to settle boundary disputes on the principle of self-determination after the first world war. It was also used by the Nazis when they sought endorsement for their hideous policies. The word "plebiscite" has tended to be applied to an ad hoc reference to the people of a specific question and, in particular, of one involving approval for a man or a regime. However, there is no agreed usage.

Referendums as a means of making government decisions or giving legitimacy to them have a history that is almost as old as democracy itself, but they have been invoked only sporadically. A few admirable democratic societies have never tried the device while some authoritarian ones have grotesquely abused it. In the populist progressive upsurge at the beginning of this century, referendums were welcomed by some as a liberating force and as a way of purifying government by enlisting the people against the politicians.

Before the first world war, the most significant development of the referendum as a political institution—[Interruption.] I am hoping that the hon. Members for Garscadden and for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) are listening carefully to this. I am sure that it will at least be instructive to them in relation to the constitutional changes that the Labour party may be foolishly considering.

Before the first world war, the most significant development of the referendum as a political institution undoubtedly occurred in Switzerland and the United States. Since 1848, and still more since 1870, the Swiss have accepted the principle that almost every major national decision could become the subject of a popular vote but, in the 1930s, Hitler's plebiscites—with their 99 per cent. affirmatives—cast a cloud over the whole idea of referring specific questions to the voters.

Of course, referendums continued to be used. They have been used continually in Switzerland as well as in California and other states in the United States of America and intermittently in places where they had become a prerequisite of constitutional change. I emphasise that, because Labour's plans for constitutional change may well mean that it will want to investigate the matter much further.

The overwhelming bulk of referendums outside Europe and the old British Commonwealth have been attempts to seek endorsement for a new regime and its constitution, or to demonstrate approval for an established one. Such attempts almost always seem to be successful. Australia stands out as the only country in which referendums have been defeated more often than not. Even in Europe, Denmark, Estonia, France, Ireland, Luxembourg, Norway and Sweden—and, of course, Switzerland—are the only countries in which there have been Government-sponsored referendums that failed to secure a nationwide majority.

Mr. John Marshall: My hon. Friend said that referendums were nearly always successful. Will he cast his mind back to 1979, when there were Government-sponsored referendums in Wales and Scotland? In Wales, a majority were against what the Government wanted; in Scotland, the number voting for the Government's wishes was far lower than the number required by the House of Commons. Does that not demonstrate that in those two countries there is no enthusiasm for the policies that Labour presented then, and still presents today?

[Mr. John Marshall]

Mr. Kirkhope: That was a marvellous intervention, which underlines the point that we are making. It will put the Labour party in an enormous quandary. If its members were sensible enough to listen to my hon. Friend's comments, they may now want to review their position and, perhaps, abandon their unwise and negligent approach to the constitution.

Western democratic states have not been eager to exploit the referendum as a serious decision-making instrument. Switzerland stands out as the only country that has become addicted to the referendum. I shall return to that point later, because it is a useful example of what is wrong with the referendum process when it is used as a palliative in place of firm government.

Apart from Switzerland, countries that have solved one problem by referendum have shown no observable tendency to use the device repeatedly. Switzerland and Australia offer evidence for the proposition that referendums are essentially conservative in nature, although the lesson from the American states is less clear. Particularly in federal societies, voters are cautious about giving new powers to the central authority. Nearly all the negative votes have been repudiations of change. The 85 per cent. vote against right-hand driving in Sweden in 1955 is the most spectacular example—I think the House requires some examples—of rejection of an innovation on which the establishment was agreed; and the way in which the establishment later circumvented that awkward vote is one of the most intriguing commentaries on the limitations of referendums—along with the helpful remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Bill Walker: I am reluctant to intervene on my hon. Friend. Let me point out, however, that my Bill is exclusively about constitutional change. Let me also point out that, given that this week we have considered a Northern Ireland Bill one of whose clauses concerned referendums, I think it legitimate for me to say that my aspirations are not unrealistic.

Mr. Kirkhope: I did not mean to suggest for a moment that I was critical of my hon. Friend or any of his aspirations. I was merely trying to give the House the historical background to constitutional reform, as I think that I am obliged to do. It is important to establish the nature of referendums, the way in which they have been prepared and proposed and the way in which they have operated.

The great majority of referendums have taken the form of a single question put to the elector in an isolated context. Occasionally, more than one question has been put on the same issue. Examples are the referendums on land reform in Denmark in 1963, constitutional change in France in 1945 and electoral reform in Ireland in 1968. But Ireland in 1972, New Zealand in 1949 and 1967 and Italy in 1978 offer the only examples of entirely separate issues being put on the same day—except, of course, for Switzerland and Australia, where a battery of questions has been common. However, even they did not reach the Californian record of 47 different propositions on a single ballot. Several separate questions can be merged into one question, as in France in 1969, and occasionally the elector has been faced with a multiple-choice question.

Of course, when a voter is asked to approve a constitution his single yes or no applies to a host of propositions about the management of his country. As I have said, in general elections under our constitution electors make a choice based upon a wide range of propositions. That is part of the democratic system that we normally pursue.

The wording of a referendum question can also be a matter of controversy. Obviously, if the question is on a large battery of issues, perhaps read for the first time by the voter in the polling booth, the phrasing can have a decisive influence on the result. But when the issue stands by itself and is well publicised—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday 10 May.

Remaining Private Members' Bills

ADOPTION LEAVE ARRANGEMENTS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 10 May.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY (No. 2) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 10 May.

DISABLED PERSONS (SERVICES, CONSULTATION AND REPRESENTATION) IMPLEMENTATION BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 10 May.

REGULATION OF FUNDING OF POLITICAL PARTIES BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [19 April].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 10 May.

REGULATION OF DIET INDUSTRY BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [22 March].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 10 May.

ACCESS TO THE COUNTRYSIDE BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 10 May.

WATER (CONSERVATION AND CONSUMER CHOICE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 12 July.

WELFARE OF BROILER CHICKENS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 10 May.

HOSTAGE RECOVERY BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 10 May.

FREEZING OF HUMAN EMBRYOS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 10 May.

Education

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

2.31 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I have instituted this debate because I strongly believe that there has been a decline in relative and absolute standards of education in our country. I remember that in 1960 when my late father went as a visiting professor to North-Western university in America, he came back and said that his students in Glasgow were two years ahead of the students at North-Western. When I was a student, my professor of history went to John Hopkins university in America and his colleagues there said that the students at St. Andrews were two years ahead of American students. I do not believe that such boasts could be maintained today.

Standards have declined both relatively and absolutely and, of course, a second factor is that education is the key to the success of our country. We have limited natural resources and depend for our future prosperity upon the skills of our people. Thirdly, education provides the opportunity for children from deprived backgrounds to leapfrog from inner-city decay and decline to successful careers. Historically, grammar schools provided the opportunity for bright children from poor homes to enter university and go on to successful careers.

There is much evidence that absolute standards have declined. For example, a study of O-level scripts in the 1980s and a comparison with GCSE submissions in the 1990s concluded that pupils' spelling, grammar and punctuation had measurably worsened since 1980. There was a comment in The Times of 9 April that prospective employers and university admission tutors have reported a growing inability among many otherwise gifted students to use appropriate English. We are talking about university admission tutors. If such tutors have reported inability to use appropriate English among the brighter members of our population, what has happened to the less bright children?

The National Institute of Economic and Social Research has estimated that British 10-year-olds are two years behind their continental counterparts. In The Times Education Supplement on 15 March, Exeter university said:

"British secondary pupils start from a lower level and then make less progress than students abroad".

An Exeter professor said:

"We do seem to be underperforming in comparison with European and Far Eastern countries . . . it is a real concern we are lagging so far behind."

Similar algebra problems were given to English and Scottish students and to those from elsewhere. They were solved by 11.3 per cent. of the British students, 12.5 per cent. of the Germans, 16.6 per cent. of the Polish and 23.9 per cent. of the students from Singapore. At the age of 14, the figures were 14.4 per cent. for Britain, 17.6 per cent. for Germany, 24.9 per cent. for Poland and 30.7 per cent. for Singapore.

In an article in The Times Education Supplement on 5 April, Brenda Leonard said:

"The spread of semi-literacy must be stopped.

Anyone who is involved in training post-16 year olds tells the same story—that every day they see evidence of children who have been failed by the education system.

Youngsters . . . have emerged at the end of 11 years of compulsory education with only the barest knowledge of the English language."

This morning, as I often do, I visited a school in my constituency. I saw that the children were doing some mathematical sums. The first thing that they were asked to do was to multiply 25 by three. They were not eight, 10 or 12-year-olds—they were 14-year-olds.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): Not possible.

Mr. Marshall: I have come straight from the school. The answer is 75, of course—I am glad that we have an accountant as a Minister. The fact that 14-year-old children could be asked to multiply 25 by three tells a story about education in this country.

Mr. Christopher Woodhead is chief inspector of schools. If St. Christopher is the patron saint of travellers, Christopher Woodhead is the patron saint of all those who wish to be upwardly mobile in our society. He has shown that pupils achieve less than they should. Half of all primary schools and 40 per cent. of all secondary schools achieve less than they should. More than half of all 11-year-olds are below expected standards in maths and English. At 14, 45 per cent. of pupils fail to meet expected standards in English, maths and science.

On 4 January, Sir Geoffrey Holland, a former permanent secretary at the Department for Education and Employment, said that education in Britain was placed 35th in the world. The Times of that day said that the results in education were

"far lower than its funding deserves."

The figure for 16-year-olds passing GCSE in maths, the national language and one science is 27 per cent. in the United Kingdom, 62 per cent. in Germany and 66 per cent. in France.

Given a simple addition and subtraction, 4 per cent. of the bottom 40 per cent. of 13 year-olds in Britain could answer correctly, but, with a far more complicated sum, 76 per cent. of German children of the same age could do so.

Sir Geoffrey Holland said that 13-year-olds in Britain are two years behind their continental counterparts. We need a change in emphasis on standards of spelling, punctuation and arithmetic. I object most strongly to those patronising people who say that those are middle-class values. A decent education is the birthright of every child. It is especially important for those who live in our inner cities, as education is the escalator of opportunity—it gives children the chance to escape from a life of mediocrity and under-achievement.

Why have we done so badly? It is not that we do not spend enough money. There has been a failure to recognise the wide variety of talent and ability. There are the very academic, the average and the non-academic, who will be blessed with other talents. For too long, we have ignored the very academic child. I remember interviewing some teachers and asking all of them, "How do you deal with the non-average child?" They all concentrated on the below-average child. God must have loved the average child, because he made so many of them. Nevertheless, other countries deal a better hand to all children.

When I visited Israel, I went first to a very academic school, rather like the traditional British grammar school, where the results were very good. I then went to the technical school at Ramat Gan, which taught children how to cut diamonds because that was the local industry. I then went to a school in Jerusalem that was training children to be motor mechanics and hairdressers. People said to us, "You may wonder why we are training children in these skills." They explained that it was so that all the children would have a job when they left school. Indeed, almost all the small garages in Jerusalem are owned by graduates of that school.

I have visited the curriculum centre in the London borough of Barnet, where people are trained to become bricklayers and motor mechanics. There is an enthusiasm among the teachers and the pupils that we do not always find in other schools. It is wrong to describe such training as education for failures; it is a recognition that it is an appropriate education for people with those particular skills. It is significant that, where people have been given such an education, truancy is low.

I asked the person in charge of the centre how many truants there were. He said that there was none because the pupils loved what the centre was teaching them and knew that they were being given a passport to a job when they left the school.

In our secondary schools, there should be greater selection, more training, more setting and more vocational training. However, the real problem can be found well before children go to secondary schools, because the primary schools have failed to recognise the need to push children as far as possible. I once asked the headmistress of a primary school whether she set homework. She said, "Homework—that is rather unfair to some children because they would not do it." Instead, she is unfair to all the children by giving them no homework. Their love of English was to be gained from "Neighbours" rather than reading a book. Their love of spelling was to come from the spellcheck of a computer. Their mental arithmetic was to come from pressing buttons on a calculator. That is not the way to educate children, but it is the path that we have gone down for too long.

I have just carried out a survey of schools in my constituency, when the question of homework was raised. Some of the schools were very good. For example, in the Menorah junior school, the children in the sixth form are set 50 minutes of homework a day. Another school said:

"The children will possibly"— possibly, not probably—

"get homework twice a week. Sometimes parents need to take holidays in school time and may ask for their children to be given homework for that period."

How does the school react to that enthusiasm for homework? It does so with the words, "This is not possible."

Another school said that homework is set only at weekends, and when another school was asked about its policy, there was silence at the end of the telephone line. Then it commented:

"We do homework as and when. We do not want to overload the children. They need some time off."

Another school said to my assistant:

"Of course we have to remember with homework that the teachers have to correct it, and we have to take account of the fact that teachers might be tired."

I would prefer to hear of pupils who were tired because they had done some homework, than of pupils who had not had the opportunity to do it at all.

We must not talk solely about academic standards. We should recognise that the children of today are entering a much more complex world than that of 20 or 30 years ago. The temptations of drugs, for example, are just as potent as the temptation of cigarettes was when some of us were slightly younger. The traditional standards by which most people once lived are under attack as never before. What does it profit a child if he obtains four A-levels and loses his soul to drugs? Education is more important than creating only academic standards. It is also important that the right ethos is inculcated in our children. Some of the denominational schools do a magnificent job, but the quality of religious education in some schools is rather pathetic.

I never thought that I would have to quote the editor of The Observer in support of a course of action, but I should like to refer to an article that he wrote on 2 March 1996, in which he said:

"The second fundamental fact of British education is its surrender to the dictates of social engineering rather than universal high standards".

The Times said that the "most important" thing that we need to do is secure

"a change of philosophy in schools".

For far too long, progressive methods of education have failed. We want an end to calculators and "Neighbours", and an emphasis on spelling, mathematics and the beauty of the English language.

We also want an end to the philosophy that schools should be expected to underperform because of the social mix of their pupils. If Office for Standards in Education figures have shown one thing, it is that some schools in deprived areas can do very well and others half a mile down the road very badly. The schools doing very well are providing the sole opportunity for their pupils to leapfrog out of the vicious circle of deprivation and decline into which they were born, into a prosperous and successful career.

We also need to look at some of the examinations. I do not know whether the introduction of the GCSE has been an unmitigated success. When I was talking to a history teacher the other day, I was appalled to hear him say that pupils who had succeeded in their GCSE examinations did not know how to write an essay, and that they needed to spend the next two years learning how to do so before they could do their A-level examinations.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State never try to tinker with A-levels. They are the guaranteed gold standard of success. We do not want that gold standard to be debased by people saying, "Well, we shall make it easier for students to pass." An examination that is made easier for people to pass ceases to be an examination and ceases to set any standards.

Lord Melbourne is reputed to have said to Queen Victoria:

"I don't know, Ma'am, why they make all this fuss about education; none of the Pagets can read or write, and they get on well enough."

[Mr. Marshall]

The reason why I have made a fuss about education this afternoon is that I believe passionately that there is a need for improvement in our education system and that that need is urgent. Otherwise, this country will go down relative to others.

Equally important, we shall condemn a whole generation, who will not be able to look forward to using their talents to the full. If we deny a generation of schoolchildren that right, we are denying it to them not just for the 11 years that they are in school, but for their many years of life after that.

H. G. Wells said:

"Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe."

I believe that we are nearing the situation in which we could lose that race. I hope that my hon. Friend will give us some optimism rather than my slightly more jaundiced approach.

2.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Robin Squire): As is conventional, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall). However, I am entitled to say that his speech was one of the best researched and best argued speeches that the House has heard for a considerable time and I am certain that it will read as well as it sounded when it was delivered. My hon. Friend has established an enviable reputation for his concerns about educational matters.

It is a coincidence that my hon. Friend and I have both visited schools in our constituencies this morning. The small difference is that while my hon. Friend was visiting those at the upper age range I, as Minister with responsibility for the under-fives, among other things, was visiting the nursery school range and I now sport the evidence—namely the paint stain on my jacket, for which I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker; I assure you that the damage is not nearly so serious as that suffered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) in a well publicised incident recently.

In the time available, I want to address a number of issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South raised and to confirm to him and to the House that raising standards, which was the core of my hon. Friend's argument, has been at the core of the Government's education policies. The reason for that is simple, and my hon. Friend alluded to it. Our economic prosperity depends on well-educated and skilled people. That has always been the case, but the challenge is growing as more and more countries raise their levels of achievement.

We have raised standards—I can assure my hon. Friend of that—and we have done it through the hard work of pupils and students, through the dedication of teachers and not least through a series of education reforms, many of which were bitterly opposed by the Opposition.

Since the first GCSE examinations—I strongly defend the quality of those examinations—the number of 15-year-old pupils achieving five or more passes at grades A-star to C has risen significantly from 33 per cent. to more than 43 per cent. We have also seen the proportion of 17-year-olds achieving two or more A-level passes more than double since the Government took office in 1979. As my hon. Friend is well aware, almost one in three young people now enters full-time higher education compared with fewer than one in eight in 1979.

What are our reforms? The introduction of the national curriculum and its assessment arrangements were and remain crucial to raising standards in our schools. We have acted to remove overload and we have placed greater emphasis on the essential basic skills of literacy and numeracy. I join my hon. Friend in agreeing utterly that those are the key areas, especially in primary schools.

We have been committed to setting schools free—free to develop their particular strengths and to give parents and pupils greater choice. We now have more than 1,100 self-governing grant-maintained schools, educating one fifth of our secondary pupils. Those schools are popular with parents because they achieve results. GM school pupils achieved higher levels in last year's national curriculum assessments than local education authority school pupils at each key stage and in every subject. At GCSE, nearly half those in GM schools achieved five good passes, compared with 39 per cent. in LEA schools.

Our emphasis on increasing diversity among schools has given parents a real and better choice in deciding the type of education that they want for their children. By allowing schools to specialise in particular subjects we have extended diversity and contributed to raising standards. City technology colleges, for instance, teach pupils of all abilities, with particular emphasis on subjects such as mathematics, science and technology. Last year's GCSE results show that they are starting to succeed in tackling underachievement in the inner cities. So it is scarcely surprising that those colleges are popular with parents, and the original 15 CTCs typically receive at least three applications for every pupil place.

The introduction of performance tables to provide clear and accurate information has supported parental choice and stimulated schools to raise standards. Research shows that tables are increasingly being consulted and valued by parents and students.

I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the sterling efforts of Her Majesty's chief inspector, Chris Woodhead, in seeking to raise standards. The creation of Ofsted and the introduction of a universal independent inspection system have been fundamental to our efforts to improve education. Since Ofsted was established in 1992, more than 7,000 schools have been independently inspected, and in his recent annual report the chief inspector said that there were clear indications that the processes of inspection and action planning were helping schools to improve teaching methods. As my hon. Friend will be aware, from this month, inspection will include the identification to the heads and teachers concerned of both excellent and poor teaching.

The inspection arrangements also now identify schools that are failing to provide an acceptable standard of education. I shall spend a little time talking about that, because for far too long schools have been able to continue failing their pupils. Legislation that we have introduced is now ensuring that those schools are finally being turned round, or where that is not possible, closed. To date, some 150 schools have been deemed to be failing. Inspectors who revisited 59 of those schools over the past two terms found that almost all had improved, four fifths of them substantially. It is vital that the House should be aware of that good news, because in some cases schools have been delivering poor quality education for several years, and it is the Government's reforms that have succeeded in turning them round.

Through our improving schools programme we are helping to raise standards for all pupils, and in particular seeking to help schools with serious weaknesses. Measures taken include providing extra resources for LEAs to target such schools in this year's school effectiveness grants for education support and training.

My hon. Friend has showed great diligence in his research on international comparisons. I shall certainly read his speech carefully, but I hope that he will accept from me that valid international comparisons can be notoriously difficult to make. It is always possible to find a survey which shows a particular country in a less than favourable light, but quality evidence is hard to find. The last major international comparison of pupils' performance took place in 1990, and covered mathematics and science. Those findings suggested that English pupils at nine and 13 were mid-ranking in both subjects, and by no means way behind our competitors. Nevertheless, I entirely accept that we must continue to raise our standards. That is why the Government have set up a more detailed study—the skills audit—into levels of achievement in four or five of our major competitors; the results will be published this summer.

More widely still, we are participating in the third international mathematics and science study, which compares the attainments of nine and 13-year-olds, again in mathematics and science, in 45 countries. Those results will be published from the end of the year, and we shall then have a much clearer picture of where we stand in relation to the rest of Europe and the world.

Although the Government's reforms have significantly raised standards and enhanced choice, I stress the fact that we are not complacent. We still have some way to go to compete with the world's best education standards, and we plan to build on our successes with a host of new initiatives.

My hon. Friend specifically mentioned levels of literacy and numeracy. The 1995 national curriculum assessment results showed that about half our 11-year-olds reached or exceeded the expected levels in English and maths, and about two thirds did so in science. Those results are disappointing, and show that we must continue our drive to raise standards in schools—a drive that has been the purpose of all our reforms, such as the national curriculum and the improving schools programme.

Time does not allow me to answer all my hon. Friend's questions at this stage, but I have welcomed the opportunity that he has provided to debate the Government's education priorities. Our record is one of which we can be justifiably proud, but we are not complacent. We shall continue to take steps to raise standards, to increase participation and to improve choice and diversity in the education system.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

House of Commons

Monday 29 April 1996

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Community and Youth Facilities

1. Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what grants have been made available to contribute towards the repair and construction of local community and youth facilities in Wales. [25632]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. William Hague): A total of £472,000 is being made available under the voluntary youth services, village halls and community centres programme for 1996-97, and a further £1.9 million from the strategic development scheme.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Does my right hon. Friend agree that these grants are a first-class investment in sustaining and promoting community life across Wales? Will he take every possible step to ensure that the public are aware of the grants?

Mr. Hague: My right hon. Friend draws attention to an important subject. Since 1994, more than £9.5 million pounds has been provided by the Welsh Office for youth and community projects. In addition, nearly £12 million of national lottery funds has been allocated to this subject. For the future, the Rural Wales White Paper confirmed that changes would be considered to existing grant schemes to assist local community facilities, and we are also studying what help and advice is available to local groups which run village halls and similar facilities.

Mr. Martyn Jones: The Secretary of State must be aware of the huge increase in crime and drug abuse that has, I am sad to say, occurred in my area. While grants are all very well, does he agree that we need regular revenue funding proposals to tackle drug abuse?

Mr. Hague: Grants are an important part of the fight against drug abuse, as are the efforts of the police throughout Wales. In addition, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has launched a campaign against drug and alcohol abuse, and we will be working on that and providing further details in the coming weeks. I look forward to working with all authorities in Wales in pushing that campaign forward.

General Practitioners

2. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will conduct a review into the current proposals for GPs' out-of-hours services (a) in Wales and (b) in Rhymney. [25633]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Rod Richards): The operation of the new arrangements in Wales is being monitored by the Welsh Office. My right hon. Friend and I have no plans to review the proposals for the Rhymney area as that is a matter for the local health authority.

Mr. Rowlands: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that patients will need to travel 26 miles—possibly at the dead of night—to the new out-of-hours service? Given that Ministers are helping to fund the schemes, should not they use their influence and support the overwhelming opposition of the local community council and patients in the areas concerned to such a service, and ensure that the voices of the patients of Rhymney are heeded?

Mr. Richards: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's concern, as he wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in March to support the community health council. I understand that the health authority is looking at the issue.

Mr. Stephen: Does my hon. Friend agree that the additional flexibility of the GP fundholding system has meant that a better service is available to patients in both Wales and England?

Mr. Richards: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. GP fundholders are at the forefront of our policy of primary care.

Mr. Morgan: Does the Minister agree that while short-changing patients in Rhymney, Gwent health authority's top management are looking after themselves very well, such as in the recent appointments scandal? Does he agree that the recent 22.5 per cent. increase voted by the directors of the new UHW trust in Cardiff shows that our health service is a bonanza for bureaucrats while penny-pinching patients?

Mr. Richards: The hon. Gentleman, as always, is completely wrong. We are spending more than £2.2 billion on health services in Wales in this financial year, and some £2.4 million on the measure referred to by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) My right hon. Friend and I are concerned about the problem in Gwent, and he has asked to be kept fully informed as to how the health authority proposes to resolve it.

Manufacturing Industry

3. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the prospects for manufacturing industry in Wales. [25634]

Mr. Hague: The Government's economic policies are delivering sustainable growth with low inflation. Wales is benefiting from this good performance. In 1995, manufacturing output in Wales grew at double the United Kingdom rate and the prospects for manufacturing industry in Wales are excellent.

Mr. Jones: May I invite the right hon. Gentleman to visit RAF Sealand in my constituency, where there are at least 1,600 highly skilled and very productive jobs, and where the work force is highly co-operative? How can he help us defeat the predatory intentions of companies such as Brown and Root of the United States and GEC, which seek under the umbrella of market testing to get the contract for the work that RAF Sealand now does? Does he agree that in the Falklands war—he may just remember it—and the Gulf war, RAF Sealand was magnificent and that if there were to be another such challenge, RAF Sealand would need to be under RAF leadership? What we want at Deeside, and what we want the right hon. Gentleman's help to achieve, is for the in-house bid to win. Will he help us?

Mr. Hague: I remember the Vietnam war. I am older than the hon. Gentleman thinks, even if I was in short trousers. I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's concern about RAF Sealand. He has expressed it to me before. The Government believe that competition is the best way to ensure value for money. That is the reason for the market test proposals. We are conscious of the anxieties which the hon. Gentleman and others have expressed. That is one reason why the market test at Sealand is being carried out within the framework of Government ownership.

Whether the in-house bid or a commercial contractor wins the competition—the in-house bid should have a strong chance of doing so, given the expertise of the work force—Sealand will continue to provide a broad capability. We expect the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 to apply and to protect the interests of the work force.

Mr. Ron Davies: Will the Secretary of State join me in sending good wishes for its campaign for manufacturing jobs to the Wales Trades Union Congress, which meets at its annual conference at Llandudno later this week? Is he entirely happy at the recent news that Ronson is transferring petrol lighter production from Korea to Gwent, apparently on the ground that Welsh workers can now undercut Korean workers by 20 per cent? Ronson's chief executive claims that as Korea is being transformed into a world-class economic player and home of international giants, it can now dispense with such low-wage jobs. Does the Secretary of State feel proud that after 17 years of Conservative Government, all that he can offer Wales is Korean cast-offs?

Mr. Hague: I am delighted that the TUC is launching a campaign for manufacturing jobs. Since December 1985 manufacturing employment in Wales has grown more than in any other United Kingdom region. I am sure that the TUC will want to campaign for the policies of Her Majesty's Government that have produced that particular success.

Mr. Morgan: Since when?

Mr. Hague: Since 1985.

The particular case to which the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) refers has been misrepresented in the media in the past few days. Wages were not the only factor that helped to draw companies to Wales. One of the very powerful additional factors was the non-wage labour costs, which in this country are £18 for every £100 of wages and in other parts of Europe are between £32 and £44 for every £100 of wages. So we must look at all the factors that draw jobs and investment to Wales. Those factors taken together are drawing jobs and investment to Wales and I want that to continue.

Investment and Job Creation

4. Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the follow-up actions he proposes to the meetings held with the hon. Member for Swansea, East, the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and local authority leaders from the Swansea area on investment and job creation in the area. [25635]

Mr. Hague: On 17 April I welcomed the opportunity to hear the views of the local authorities on how economic development in their areas can be further strengthened. I heard the views of the hon. Member and his right hon. Friend at an earlier meeting. I will continue to encourage the Welsh Development Agency to meet the targets that I have set for securing inward investment projects in the more westerly area of Wales—south, mid and north. My Department will also do all that it can to encourage the growth of indigenous Welsh companies.

Mr. Anderson: Will the Secretary of State confirm that at these two meetings the message came across loud and clear that although the representatives of west Wales are glad that Cardiff bay is prospering, there is a feeling of anger and unfairness at the imbalances that are being further financed by the Welsh Office? For example, west Wales has 25 per cent. of the population of Wales but in 1994-95 it had only 15 per cent. of the projects, 13 per cent. of the jobs and a mere 5 per cent. of the investments. What specifically is the Secretary of State proposing to do to get over this? Will he ask the Welsh Development Agency to publish the targets? What will he do about the regional benefits?

Mr. Hague: Government policy applies equally to all parts of Wales, including westerly parts of Wales. The area about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned benefits from assisted area status and other Government projects. There are a lot of specific actions that I will continue to take to try to assist the economy in the Swansea area. It is important for the Welsh Office and the Welsh Development Agency to work with the local authorities, and I was pleased with their willingness to do so at the meeting that I had with them.

I will continue to expect the WDA to meet the targets to which I referred earlier. I shall continue to encourage inward investors, on every possible occasion, to look at a wide variety of the sites that may be available to them in all parts of Wales before deciding where to make their investment. The best thing for the Swansea area is for us to have an economy that continues to grow and prosper. As long as we maintain our current policies, that is what is likely to happen.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is not co-operation between the Government and local government one of the many ways in which considerable success can be achieved? What does my right hon. Friend think of the recent announcement of the Welsh Local Government Association that it will refuse to meet him in the future?

Mr. Hague: I thought that that was a rather strange and silly announcement. Last week I was surprised to see the press release from the Welsh Local Government Association, which said:

"Hague is on his own and we will boycott future meetings with the Secretary of State."

Two days later I was equally surprised to receive a letter from the chairman of the Welsh Local Government Association, which said:

"I and other leaders of the Welsh Local Government Association are very keen to discuss your intentions for 1997-98 with you at the earliest possible opportunity. This is too important a matter to delay a meeting."

I shall consider that request for a meeting.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Is the Secretary of State aware that west Wales—that is, Swansea, Llanelli and the surrounding area—has considerable expertise in the car industry, particularly in manufacturing engineering? However, despite that, there has been no major inward investment in the area in the past 10 years. One belief is that the Welsh Office and the Welsh Development Agency are missing out every time to the Invest in Britain Bureau and to the Department of Trade and Industry which have managed to achieve investment in the north-east of England. What is he going to do about that?

Mr. Hague: The WDA has turned in a great achievement over the past year. As all hon. Members know, it is more difficult to persuade inward investors to go to the more westerly parts of Wales because they are geographically further away from the main centres of population in the United Kingdom. As I have already explained, there are a number of things that we can do about that—and we are already doing them.

Inward Investment

5. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about inward investment into Wales. [25636]

Mr. Hague: The Welsh Development Agency recorded more than 120 inward investment projects for 1995-96, which promised more than 12,000 new and safeguarded jobs and investment of more than £970 million. These are excellent results that include Ford's £340 million expansion at Bridgend, and Newport Wafer-Fab's £230 million expansion near Newport.

Mr. Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State agree that his success in attracting new industry to Wales is due to the fact that we have not signed up to the social chapter, that we do not have a national minimum wage and that we do not have corporate taxes? Will the people of Wales not contrast my right hon. Friend's success in fostering new investment with the complaint by the shadow Secretary of State that he has been too successful in getting industry from Korea?

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend is right—and he made his point so well that he even drew a cheer from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). That must be something of a first in this context.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, one of the most attractive aspects of the United Kingdom for inward investors is our flexible labour market. In that regard, there is a considerable contrast between the UK and other parts of the European Community. The awkward, tragic part of Labour's policy is that, in the name of trade union rights, Labour would deny jobs to thousands of people.

Mr. Wigley: I apologise for my late arrival, which was again due to problems with trains.

Does the Secretary of State agree that, although there has been a modicum of success in attracting inward investment into the M4 corridor in south-east Wales and into parts of north-east Wales, considerable difficulty is being experienced in attracting inward investment and other projects to western parts of Wales, including the old county of Dyfed and Gwynedd? Given that Ireland has had enormous success in attracting inward investment to an area even further west, how does the Secretary of State intend to change the strategy in order to overcome the clear problems that exist in west Wales?

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman did the Welsh Office and the Welsh Development Agency a bit of an injustice in saying that we had enjoyed a "modicum" of success. The figure that I have announced today—12,000 new and safeguarded jobs last year—exceeds the target set for the WDA, and we should all congratulate it.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is more difficult to persuade inward investors to go to the westerly parts of Wales. He will have heard me say that in response to earlier questions. The answer is for the Government, the WDA and local authorities to work together to identify sites and attract investors, and to ensure that inward investors consider all potential sites, including those in more westerly parts of Wales. I am very much committed to taking all those steps.

Mr. Hain: Why, under the present Government, has there been no inward investment in Neath?

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman will have heard me refer to the huge inward investment that has taken place in many parts of Wales. I am sure that, as the hon. Member for Neath, he will want to portray an image of this country and his constituency that is as friendly as possible to enterprise and the promotion of business, and no doubt that will be of great help.

GP Fundholders

6. Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many general practitioner fundholders there are in Wales; and what percentage this figure represents of all general practitioner fundholders. [25637]

Mr. Richards: Fifty per cent. of Welsh general practitioners are fundholders, covering about 52 per cent of the population. That involves 863 practitioners in 210 practices. The Welsh Office does not hold information on comparative English, Northern Ireland or Scottish data.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I congratulate my hon. Friend on that record, but does he agree that the Government's purpose in Wales should now be to press further and harder in their attempt to make more practices fundholding? Fundholders have achieved success both in the delivery of service to patients and, more particularly—we hear complaints from the Opposition about this—in reducing expense and bureaucracy by striking tougher contracts, causing trusts to reduce their costs. Does my hon. Friend agree that we should now trumpet the idea that the Labour party will get rid of fundholders and destroy the advances that we have made?

Mr. Richards: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. GP fundholders are at the forefront of quality, improvement and new services, in particular in reducing waiting times and improving outreach services—for example, the provision of consultants. He is also correct to draw attention to the dangers of Labour party policies. New Labour is no more than a wooden horse called Tony the phoney pony, whose mission is to deceive the British people into believing that the marauding socialists have disappeared.

Mr. Llew Smith: As I am sure the Minister knows, in Blaenau Gwent we have some of the worst health problems that have been experienced in any parliamentary constituency in England or Wales. We want more doctors rather than fewer. Would the Minister care to comment on Gwent health authority's decision to remove one of the only two doctors in Cwm, and will he support the local community in demanding that the health authority reverse that decision and, if it refuses, that its members resign?

Mr. Richards: We are aware that Gwent health authority is about to remove a doctor which, of course, is a matter for it. The number of general practitioners in Wales has gone up by 28 per cent. since 1979. In the hon. Gentleman's constituency, between 31 December 1994 and 31 December last year, the number of people waiting more than sixth months for a first out-patient appointment fell by 90 per cent. and the number waiting more than 12 months for in-patient day case treatment has fallen by 17 per cent.

Roads

7. Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total spending by central Government on roads in Wales since 1979; and how many miles of motorway and trunk road have been laid since that year. [25638]

Mr. Hague: Since 1979, total spending by central Government on the roads programme in Wales is more than £2.9 billion, including £510 million transport grant. Twenty-eight miles of motorway and 167 miles of trunk road have been completed or improved. Eight major improvement schemes totalling another 28 miles are under construction.

Sir David Knox: Does my right hon. Friend agree that considerable progress has been made in improving the motorway and trunk road network in Wales since 1979 and that that has been of great help in attracting inward investment to Wales?

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend is right. One of the additional attractions for inward investors, on top of the flexible labour market, the work of the Welsh Development Agency and the lower non-wage labour costs to which I referred, is the improving infrastructure in Wales. We have done much to improve the strategic east-west routes in Wales. That work is continuing with the proposals that I have published for the M4 and for the A465 Heads of the Valleys road. It makes a tremendous difference.

Dr. Howells: Does the Secretary of State recognise the chronic traffic congestion on the A470, the main north-south route in Wales, especially at its most southerly point, where the Coryton interchange is subject to constant long traffic jams that do nothing for the competitiveness of industry in Cardiff or my constituency? Can he confirm that the Welsh Office has plans to bypass that interchange and say which route the bypass will take?

Mr. Hague: I have no announcement today for the hon. Gentleman, but I will, of course, consider his representations—and all representations—on the subject. We plan to start one scheme on the A470 in the coming year but I shall be happy to give him further details in writing if he wishes.

Road Warning Signs

8. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to clarify road warning signs in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [25639]

Mr. Richards: Road warning signs are covered by the Traffic Signs (Welsh and English Language Provisions) Regulations and General Directions 1985 and the Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions 1994. The Welsh Office is developing proposals for public consultation on the updating of the 1985 regulations.

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend will know that I am a frequent visitor to the land of my mothers. Indeed, I was there on Saturday night when I had the honour of addressing the dinner of the Welsh National Young Conservatives. I shall be visiting Wales on many other occasions, as I received several invitations after that. Is my hon. Friend aware that my and other visitors' journeys to Wales are jeopardised by the warning road signs on Welsh roads? When one approaches such signs quickly, it is often difficult to see information in Welsh or English. As he has said that he is reconsidering the format of signs and having English signs in one colour and Welsh signs in another, will he be consistent in having one language above the other, whichever way round it might be?

Mr. Richards: The Bowen committee in 1970 concluded that there was no evidence that bilingual road signs adversely affect road safety. I had heard from the national press that my hon. Friend had found his way past the bilingual signs to Cardiff and made a brilliant speech to a galaxy of young Conservatives. We are looking forward to having them with us after the next general election instead of the deadwood of the Opposition.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

9. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what talks he has had with representatives of the farming and meat industry in Wales concerning BSE; and if he will make a statement. [25640]

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), and I have met representatives of the farming and meat industry on a number of occasions and my hon. Friend met representatives of the abattoir industry and Welsh Food Promotions Ltd. on 17 April. My hon. Friend is today attending the Agriculture Council in Luxembourg with my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Jones: Will the Secretary of State confirm that, even though the carcase disposal scheme for cull cattle was due to start today, there are as yet no licensed abattoirs and there are no designated centres for collection yet? The farmers in Wales are confused and angry that the Government's inaction and incompetence are clearly the main reasons why the beef ban still remains. Three weeks after the European Union agreed to pay for the scheme, there is no sign of it being implemented.

Mr. Hague: The 30-month scheme will start this week, as was intended—it is likely to start around the middle of the week. It has been necessary to have an extensive consultation process—the industry would not have wanted it any other way. It is a complicated scheme and it is important that it commands confidence and general support. Our priority is to restore market confidence at home and abroad, and we shall continue to do that, in frequent and close consultation with the industry in Wales.

Mr. Biffen: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many farmers who are privileged to be Welsh use Oswestry market? Is it his judgment that the Government's slaughter programme—covering cull cows and other categories—consigns to death and incineration an enormous number of cattle that show no sign of BSE? How does he think that that will restore public confidence in beef eating?

Mr. Hague: My right hon. Friend will know that many of the actions that the Government are taking are based on scientific recommendations. In the case of the scheme that my right hon. Friend mentioned, the Government are going further than the scientific recommendations—indeed, that is the cause of his anxiety. It is clear from what scientists have said to us that BSE is most likely to occur in older cattle, so the removal from the food chain of cattle of 30 months and older is a confidence-building measure—it was specifically asked for by the National Farmers Union.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: I congratulate the Secretary of State on acceding to representations from Opposition parties for a Welsh Office ministerial level representative to attend today's meeting of the Council of Ministers in Luxembourg, which is good news. Farmers are extremely worried about the delay in the implementation of the slaughter policy scheme.

I shall remind the Secretary of State of two fair questions posed by the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones). First, when will we be told about the designated collection points, bearing in mind the geographical difficulty of taking animals to those points in many parts of rural Wales? Secondly, how many abattoirs in Wales have been licensed for the procedure? It is crucial that there should be no further delay in giving the farmers the information that they need so that the schemes can be fully implemented as soon as possible.

Mr. Hague: I take the hon. Gentleman's point about the need for farmers and others in the industry to know further details of the schemes as soon as possible. However, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that it is better for the schemes to be introduced properly than to be introduced in such haste that they do not work properly. Officials in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Welsh Office are working hard, in consultation with the industry, to ensure that all the information for which the hon. Gentleman asks is given as soon as possible. They will continue working extremely hard until that information is available.

Mr. Ron Davies: The Secretary of State's answers have no credibility. He said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) that the scheme would be operating mid week. He has just said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) that he hopes to be able to make the announcements. How can he expect the agricultural industry and associated industries in Wales to respond to a scheme that is due to start on Wednesday or Thursday this week if he has not even taken the basic steps of identifying the collection centres and licensing the abattoirs? His answers have no credibility.

The right hon. Gentleman clearly does not understand that the Government's confusion and delay in handling the BSE issue is one of the reasons why they are now viewed with such distrust and derision by the country at large. Does he seriously expect co-operation from Europe in lifting the export ban when domestic policy is in such a shambles and when the Foreign Secretary is writing around soliciting individual Cabinet members to produce schemes to disrupt the Union? Is it not the case that Ministers are now too busy appeasing warring factions within the Conservative party to provide effective and decisive government? Why on earth should the country's vital economic interests be sacrificed because of internal wrangling in the Conservative party?

Mr. Hague: It is a bit rich for Labour Members to criticise the Government over the BSE issue when the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) did so much wanton damage to the beef industry. The group that is greeted with the most derision and distrust by farmers comprises one or two Opposition Members who have performed in the same way as the hon. Lady.

The hon. Gentleman would not want us to carry through the process without consulting the industry closely, and I am sure that he would not want it done in such haste that it did not work properly. That is why the consultations have been carried out.

Public Transport

10. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to encourage a fully integrated public transport system in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [25641]

Mr. Hague: Planning policy guidance to be issued soon will encourage local authorities to develop public transport facilities. I will also publish a transport policy statement later in the year.

Mr. Llwyd: That is, at least, a fairly encouraging answer. The Minister referred earlier to the £2.9 billion that is to be spent on roads in Wales. Would not some of that money be better spent providing a fully integrated public transport system? When, if ever, will the Government take notice of the Welsh Affairs Committee report, which suggested that investment should be pumped into the railways to enable someone to travel from the north to the south of Wales in three and a half hours? When will we have a proper transport authority in Wales in order to ensure that the public transport system is attractive—the current system is no use to anyone?

Mr. Hague: It is clearly important to continue to develop transport infrastructure in Wales. It is important also that, wherever possible, people have a choice of means of transport. As we have discussed already this afternoon, we have improved road infrastructure and we have provided substantial assistance to the railways throughout our time in office. Air transport—at least at Cardiff Wales international airport, with its enhanced passenger throughput—has also improved in recent years.

We must continue to improve all those forms of transport while taking account of how to protect the environment. When I put together my policy statement later in the year, I shall consider all the representations made to me—including those from the hon. Gentleman.

Retail Developments

11. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to curb the growth of large out-of-town retail developments. [25642]

Mr. Hague: I shall issue shortly planning guidance recognising the importance of town centres, including a strong retail base, and encouraging development within town centres rather than at out-of-town sites.

Mr. Sweeney: In welcoming that statement, I express my gratitude to my right hon. Friend for visiting Cowbridge and for making an excellent speech at the Bear hotel on Saturday. During his visit, my right hon. Friend no doubt walked around Culverhouse Cross and saw for himself the congestion that is caused by out-of-town retail developments. I ask him to bear that in mind in bringing forward his proposals.

Mr. Hague: I have seen a great deal of Culverhouse Cross and I was pleased also to visit the Bear hotel on Saturday. We shall set out a sequential test for new development in the new guidance: town centre sites where available, then edge-of-centre sites and, only when those sites are unavailable, out-of-town sites. We shall also state that out-of-town food stores should not be allowed if they are likely to lead to the loss of general food retailing in the centres of smaller towns.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I thank the Secretary of State for his reply, but we shall withhold our full congratulations until we have seen the details. Can he tell us the reason for the wasted years of the Wokingham regime? Was the change of mind due to his own policy initiative or has he sacked someone in the Welsh Office?

Mr. Hague: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is withholding his full congratulations, but I look forward to receiving them in due course. In pursuing and putting together the planning policy guidance that will be published shortly, I have been developing the thinking of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and largely continuing what he originally intended. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the guidance when it is published.

Orimulsion

12. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the net effect on local employment in Pembrokeshire if orimulsion is used as proposed in the production of power. [25643]

Mr. Richards: None.

Mr. Hughes: Well, I suggest that the Minister should. Will he reflect on the fact that, if the current plans for an orimulsion plant in Pembrokeshire—which I understand are waiting for one final authorisation—go ahead, although the prospect is presented as advantageous because it may produce a few jobs, there is a wide general view that the disadvantages environmentally and in terms of tourism of that beautiful part of south-west Wales having at its heart an orimulsion plant will grossly outweigh any short-term small employment advantages? Will the Minister undertake to carry out a full proper employment and environmental assessment on the economy of Pembrokeshire?

Mr. Richards: The application for consent to burn orimulsion at the Pembroke power station is still under consideration by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. Until my right hon. Friend has received the views of all the regulatory authorities, no decisions will be made, including whether there is a need for a public inquiry.

Mr. Rogers: Surely everyone recognises that orimulsion is one of the dirtiest fuels that is available for combustion in power stations and contains an enormous amount of heavy metal toxic material compared with other fuels. In view of the recent disaster that has halved the income of the people of Pembrokeshire from tourism—reducing it by some £100 million—what proposals do the Government have to compensate people for that loss? What proposals do they have to cut the pollution caused by the burning of that dirty fuel?

Mr. Richards: My understanding is that the hon. Gentleman was referring to the Sea Empress disaster, in which case I cannot possibly comment until the report of the marine accident investigation branch is published.

Mr. Dafis: May I emphasise that, unlike the Labour party in Pembrokeshire, my party supports the demand for a full public inquiry into the orimulsion application? As well as urging the President of the Board of Trade to set up a public inquiry, the Welsh Office should consider what longer-term employment opportunities might be created in Pembrokeshire through a proper energy conservation programme. Is not that the way ahead? What is the Welsh Office doing to ensure that the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995 is implemented in Wales as soon as possible so that the jobs can be created and environmental gains made?

Mr. Richards: As I said a moment ago, the decision on a public inquiry will not be made until all the facts are available. With regard to jobs in that part of the world, the hon. Gentleman knows that I and my right hon. and hon. Friends have taken a close interest in the west Wales task force which, I believe, was set up by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt). We are conscious of the particular economic problems of the area and are doing our utmost to attract new investment.

Male Unemployment

13. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the figure for male unemployment in Newport and Wales at the latest available date and expressed in percentage terms. [25644]

Mr. Richards: In March 1996, the unadjusted number of males on the claimant unemployment count in the Newport travel-to-work area was 5,977. That is 10.6 per cent. of the male work force. The corresponding figures for Wales were 83,039 and 11.2 per cent.

Mr. Hughes: Is the Minister concerned about the huge disparity between male and female unemployment inasmuch as many more men are out of work because the jobs lost in heavy industry were never replaced? Does not that suggest that the Government's jobs policy, far from being the success that they claim, is a huge disaster?

Mr. Richards: On the contrary, most of the jobs in the traditional heavy industries of south Wales have been replaced. In the hon. Gentleman's own constituency, unemployment fell by 221 in the 12 months to March this year. Since 1990, 11 plants have opened in the hon. Gentleman's constituency with 502 jobs gained. There are 10 foreign-owned manufacturing plants in the hon. Gentleman's constituency employing 1,875 people. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would stop being a Job's comforter.

Hospital Waiting Lists

14. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on out-patient and in-patient waiting lists (a) in Wales and (b) in the Cynon Valley. [25645]

Mr. Richards: Hospital waiting lists have fallen significantly in Wales recently. In the calendar year 1995, the number of out-patients waiting for a first appointment fell 14 per cent. while the number waiting for admission for treatment in hospital fell 9 per cent.

Separate figures are not available for the Cynon Valley, but the Merthyr and Cynon Valley unit, now the North Glamorgan NHS trust, reported a fall in out-patient waiting lists of an impressive 36 per cent. in 1995. The fall in the in-patient and day case waiting list was 3 per cent. To put that last figure into perspective, I should add that, currently, no patient has to wait longer than 18 months for admission to the trust for treatment.

Mrs. Clwyd: That is not quite as splendid as it sounds. More than 2,000 people in the Merthyr and Cynon Valley area have been waiting more than one year for admission to hospital, and some of them are in considerable discomfort and distress. Is that situation due to the fact that 2,500 beds have disappeared from Wales since 1990 and that hospital consultants spend much of their time re-admitting people to hospital who should never have been discharged in the first place—but were, because beds were not available?

Mr. Richards: I wish that the hon. Lady would stop knocking the national health service—just as her colleagues do—thereby trying to undermine morale in the NHS. Of all Opposition Members, the hon. Lady probably knocks most. I wish also that the hon. Lady would give the new North Glamorgan NHS trust a chance, given that it has been in existence only a few days and I have only recently appointed a chairman.

ATTORNEY–GENERAL

Export Control

28. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Attorney–General what prosecutions have been initiated against alleged breaches of export control law regarding sales to Iraq or Iran since the publication of the Scott report. [25661]

The Attorney–General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I am informed by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise that no prosecutions have been commenced in relation to export licence violations to Iran or Iraq since the publication of the Scott report.

Mr. Smith: Will the Minister comment on the statement on page 851 of volume II of the Scott report:

"If it is right, and I think it is, that Government policy on exports to Iraq was to some extent undermined by the use of Jordan as a diversionary route, the decision that that was a price that was worth paying in order to preserve the political advantages"—

Madam Speaker: Order. I had not realised that the hon. Gentleman was quoting. In Question Time, hon. Members should not quote directly, but paraphrase. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will do so—or give an indication of the matter to which he is referring—and I am sure that the Minister will respond.

Mr. Smith: Does the Minister think that it is right that third countries should be used by military exporters to circumvent the rules on arms exports?

The Attorney–General: No, that is most unlikely to be right—but the part that it plays in any individual prosecution will depend on the facts.

Sentencing

29. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney–General how many appeals he has made against unduly lenient sentences. [25662]

The Solicitor–General (Sir Derek Spencer): Since 1989, 294 cases have been referred in England and Wales, and 15 have been referred in Northern Ireland. Twenty-two of those cases were subsequently withdrawn. Of the cases heard to date by the Court of Appeal, 85 per cent. have resulted in an increase in sentence.

Mr. Marshall: May I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer, which demonstrates the irresponsibility of those who opposed the introduction of that power? His answer will be warmly welcomed by the many people who believe that some judges no longer sit on this planet.

The Solicitor–General: To convert my hon. Friend's sentiment into concrete cases, 201 persons whose sentences have been increased would have escaped justice had the Opposition got their way. Among the persons who would have escaped justice are those who have committed crimes of manslaughter, rape, robbery and others of the most serious crimes in the criminal calender.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Before the hon. and learned Gentleman congratulates himself too much, may I ask him how many of those cases relate to rape? There is very worrying evidence that sentencing in such cases is becoming lighter and that fewer people are sent for trial than was the case even five years ago.

The Solicitor–General: The hon. Lady is mistaken in suggesting that sentences for rape have fallen; the reverse is the case. Since the guideline case of R v. Billam, sentences for rape have increased quite markedly. The starting point for sentencing in such cases is five years, in cases in which there is one or more aggravating features the starting point is eight years; in the worst cases, double figure sentences are reached. I can tell the hon. Lady that we have referred 31 cases of rape since the jurisdiction was conferred on us, which is 11 per cent. of the total. Rape cases are the fourth most likely type of case to be referred by us. The most likely cases to be referred are robbery, those under section 18 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and death caused by driving. Rape comes somewhere down the list.

Mr. John Morris: The Solicitor-General will be aware of the Home Secretary's concern that the actual term served in prison is too lenient. Does the Solicitor-General agree with Lord Justice Rose's view that there is "tangle and confusion" in court sentencing powers, a tangle that flows directly from—and as recently as—the Government's Criminal Justice Act 1991? Has the Attorney-General been consulted by the Home Secretary about his determination to reduce judges' discretion and to compel them to impose minimum sentences? Will he tell the House what are the Attorney-General's views?

The Solicitor–General: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will, indeed, be off this planet if he takes the view that the vast majority of the British public are not completely behind my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary in the proposals that he has introduced. In his remarks, Lord Justice Rose was referring to the impact of sentencing provisions on a juvenile case at a particular time. Those provisions are no longer in force.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Is it right that one of those "tangles" was sorted out in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, and that the most important action that can be taken to ensure that unnecessarily lenient sentences are corrected is to adopt the proposals of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary—particularly in the sphere of rape, to stop those who rape repeatedly from raping again until such time as they are fit to be released into society?

The Solicitor–General: My hon. and learned Friend is quite right. We have referred a number of rape cases in which the defendant has raped once before, has been given a substantial term of imprisonment, has been released and, before long, has committed a further rape. In some such cases, the defendant has been punished by a further determinate sentence. It would be quite unrealistic to view such a defendant as being safe to be released into the community on a particular day but, under current sentencing provisions, there is nothing that can be done about it. Surely something should be done to put that matter right.

Criminal Prosecutions

30. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Attorney–General what progress is being made in achieving a higher level of criminal prosecutions. [25664]

The Attorney–General: The Crown Prosecution Service and the police are working together on a number of initiatives to bring the right cases promptly to court. They include the introduction of further charging standards, guidance on case preparation and measures to assist the police with early advice.

Mr. Arnold: My right hon. and learned Friend will remember that, when the CPS was introduced, the confidence of the public and many policemen was damaged by the extent to which court cases did not even get to court, let alone achieve a successful conviction. Can my right hon. and learned Friend tell us about the improvements that have been made, because the public want villains to be caught, to appear in court and to be sent to prison?

The Attorney–General: The public, my hon. Friend and I are at one with the police and the CPS in wanting wrongdoers brought promptly to trial and, if convicted, properly sentenced. I can tell my hon. Friend that, since its early days, when the CPS was undermanned and it was difficult to find staff, it has made enormous strides. It is now working closely with the police, there is mutual help from each side and, as my hon. Friend will know, there is now an experiment under which Crown prosecutors are put into busy police stations so that they can give immediate advice where required. I believe that that will help to achieve exactly the result that my hon. Friend would want.

Mr. Skinner: Should not the Government accept some of that advice—because they have practised fraud on the British people for the past 17 years? That has been made worse because, during the past few days, it has become apparent that members of the Tory party, who are supposed to sign the Register of Members' Interests, are intent on misleading—it could be described as fraud—because they intend to tell the British people and the commissioner that they will not reveal how much money they are making from moonlighting. If they intend to practise the art of deception, surely other people outside the House are bound to copy them.

The Attorney–General: The British people would be wise to watch and listen to everything that the hon. Gentleman says, given the fellow feelings among his hon. Friends on the Opposition Benches. While they are looking at the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), they might also glance into the woods, to right and left, to see what is lurking behind him.

Crown Prosecution Service

31. Ms Abbott: To ask the Attorney–General if he will make a statement on the Crown Prosecution Service. [25665]

The Solicitor–General: Among other things, the Crown Prosecution Service and the police are taking steps to improve the quality and timeliness of case preparation by reducing the volume of paperwork in police files and piloting the use of CPS lawyers giving on-the-spot advice in busy police stations.

Ms Abbott: Is the Solicitor-General aware of the case of Stephen Lawrence, who was cruelly murdered by a gang of white racists three years ago, and whose parents brought a private prosecution in the absence of any action by the CPS? Is he aware how hopeless and grief-stricken his parents feel today? One of the causes of their anguish is that none of the evidence, including videos of the young men concerned boasting about killing and maiming black people, videos of them practising stabbing people with knives, the alleged murder weapon and forensic evidence, came before the jury because the judge deemed that the eyewitness was not reliable? Without any criticism of how the judge handled the case, can the hon. and learned Gentleman understand how brokenhearted the Lawrences are? Can he understand that they must now feel that, although the case ultimately fell down in court, the judge deemed that the case had been properly brought, and if the CPS had acted earlier—instead, the case had to wait for three years before it came to court—the Lawrences might have seen justice done?

The Solicitor–General: We all have the deepest sympathy for the Lawrence family in their grief. I am well aware of the facts of the case because my right hon. and learned Friend and I have looked at it a number of times with counsel and senior members of the CPS. I have to say to the hon. Lady that it is of overwhelming importance that the rule of law be upheld. The plain fact of the matter is that, at the end of the day, the judge ruled that the evidence was inadmissible and, in doing so, he came to exactly the same conclusion as had been reached by the CPS much earlier—as a result of which it had declined to prosecute. In substance, the bottom line is that the judge and the CPS were of one mind.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that we all welcome the improvements to the CPS that he and the Attorney-General have mentioned today, but is he further aware that there is still an impression among policemen and many members of the public that the Crown Prosecution Service will not take action unless it is almost certain to achieve a conviction? Will he do everything he can to encourage the service to take action in the interests of society when there is a reasonable chance of a conviction?

The Solicitor–General: Those who think that the CPS requires certainty or near certainty before it will institute proceedings are utterly wrong. In 1995, 77.3 per cent. of contested cases before magistrates courts resulted in guilty verdicts, and 22.7 per cent. resulted in verdicts of not guilty. Such a dismissal rate gives the lie to the allegation that only certainties are prosecuted. The test is laid out clearly, in the code for Crown prosecutors, for everyone to see: if there is a realistic prospect of conviction, proceedings are started.

Magistrates Courts

32. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Attorney–General what percentage of cases in magistrates courts are prosecuted by (a) the in-house Crown Prosecution Service and (b) agent lawyers; and if he will make a statement. [25666]

The Solicitor–General: During the year ending March 1996, 90 per cent. of magistrates court sessions were covered by Crown Prosecution Service lawyers and 10 per cent. by agents.

Mr. Llwyd: That is a rather fantastic statistic, given that the CPS is now up to complement in most areas. When I worked in private practice—firmly on this planet, I might add—agents were usually used to cover up for cases badly prepared by the CPS. I do not know whether that is still the reason; I just wonder why as many as 10 per cent. of cases are covered by agents.

The Solicitor–General: It is done so that the CPS can conduct its business as efficiently and economically as possible. It is out of the question to expect the service to deal with every single case in every court, irrespective of the volume of work that has to be handled. I was in private practice until 1992, and I still appear in the courts so, like the hon. Gentleman, I have some experience.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Finance Act 1996

Education (Student Loans) Act 1996

Audit (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1996

Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996

Rating (Caravans and Boats) Act 1996

Orders of the Day

Housing Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Ordered,

That the Bill, as amended, be considered in the following order namely, New Clauses relating to Part I, amendments relating to Clauses 1 to 6, Schedule 1, Clauses 7 to 49, Schedule 2, Clauses 50 to 53, Schedule 3, Clauses 54 to 62, New Schedules relating to Part I, New Clauses relating to Part II, amendments relating to Clauses 63 to 76, New Schedules relating to Part II, New Clauses relating to Part III, amendments relating to Clauses 77 to 79, Schedule 4, Clauses 80 and 81, Schedules 5 and 6, Clauses 82 to 85, Schedule 7, Clauses 86 to 92, Schedule 8, Clause 93, Schedule 9, Clauses 94 to 100, New Schedules relating to Part III, New Clauses relating to Part IV, amendments relating to Clauses 101 and 102, Schedule 10, Clauses 103 and 104, Schedule 11, New Schedules relating to Part IV, New Clauses relating to Part V, amendments relating to Clauses 105 to 121, Schedule 12, Clauses 122 to 136, New Schedules relating to Part V, New Clauses relating to Part VI, amendments relating to Clauses 137 to 149, Schedule 13, Clause 150, New Schedules relating to Part VI, New Clauses relating to Part VII, amendments relating to Clauses 151 to 183, Schedule 14, Clauses 184 and 185, New Schedules relating to Part VII, New Clauses relating to Part VIII, amendments relating to Clauses 186 to 189, Schedule 15, Clauses 190 to 194, Schedule 16, Clauses 195 to 200, New Schedules relating to Part VIII, remaining New Clauses, remaining New Schedules.—[Mr. Curry.]

New clause 14

CRITERIA FOR REGISTRATION OR REMOVAL FROM REGISTER

'.—(1) The Corporation shall establish (and may from time to time vary) criteria which should be satisfied by a body seeking registration as a social landlord; and in deciding whether to register a body the Corporation shall have regard to whether those criteria are met.

(2) The Corporation shall establish (and may from time to time vary) criteria which should be satisfied where such a body seeks to be removed from the register of social landlords; and in deciding whether to remove a body from the register the Corporation shall have regard to whether those criteria are met.

(3) Before establishing or varying any such criteria the Corporation shall consult such bodies representative of registered social landlords, and such bodies representative of local authorities, as it thinks fit.

(4) The Corporation shall publish the criteria for registration and the criteria for removal from the register in such manner as the Corporation considers appropriate for bringing the criteria to the notice of bodies representative of registered social landlords and bodies representative of local authorities.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.32 pm

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 65 to 67 and 71.

Mr. Curry: A large number of amendments to this part of the Bill are Government amendments that reflect commitments which I gave to Members who served on the Committee. There are also a number of Opposition amendments, but not in this group.

The Government amendments honour commitments made in Committee to require the corporation to consult relevant parties on the criteria for registering and deregistering social landlords, and before issuing a general consent on the disposal of land by a registered social landlord. The new clause, I am sure, will be welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): As the Minister has made clear, new clause 14 has been introduced in response to amendments that we tabled in Committee. Those amendments sought to achieve greater clarity in the role of the Housing Corporation in registering and deregistering social landlords and also in the relationship of the Housing Corporation with local authorities and social landlords, including its consultation obligations.

We welcome new clause 14 and the amendments, which give effect to the undertaking that the Minister gave in Committee.

Mrs. Diana Maddock (Christchurch): I especially welcome new clause 14, which will provide that the Housing Corporation will have to consult not only the National Federation of Housing Associations, but local authorities. That is in line with amendments that I tabled in Committee. I also welcome amendment No. 67 because it is in line with amendments tabled by me in Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 5

PROTECTED AREAS

'—(1) For the purposes of section 15 a protected area is a local authority area, or sub-division of such an area, which has been approved as a protected area by the local housing authority within whose area it falls, in accordance with subsection (2) below.

(2) An area may only be declared a protected area where—

(a) there is a high level of housing need demonstrated by the local authority's housing register and other relevant evidence, and

(b) it can be shown that dwellings in the social rented sector acquired under the right to buy could not easily be replaced within a reasonable timescale.

(3) After an area has been declared a protected area for a period of two years the local authority concerned must consider whether that area still meets the criteria of subsection (2) above, and, unless it is considered that those criteria are met, its status as a protected area shall lapse.

(4) Before declaring a protected area under subsection (2) above and in assessing whether the criteria of that subsection are met after the period of two years referred to in subsection (3) the local authority shall consult—

(a) all electors residing within the area, and

(b) all registered social landlords who own dwellings in that area, and shall allow them a period of 28 days in which to object.

(5) If—

(a) a majority of electors residing within the area, or

(b) registered social landlords owning between them a majority of the dwellings which would be affected by the granting of protected area status, object to the granting of protected area status within the specified period then the Secretary of State shall be empowered to rule whether the declaration is reasonable within the criteria specified in subsection (2).'.—[Mrs. Maddock.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following: New clause 6—Limitation on right of tenant to acquire dwelling—

'. The right conferred by section 15 on a tenant to acquire his dwelling shall apply only to areas where the Secretary of State can satisfy the local housing authority that it will not lead to a long-term increase in housing need in the area.'.

Amendment No. 1, in clause 15, page 10, line 7, after '(1)', insert

'Unless he lives in a protected area,'.

Amendment No. 2, in page 10, line 43, at end insert—

'(5) The right conferred by this section shall not arise where the dwelling is subject to any restrictive covenant or agreement or charitable trust, which requires its provision and future use for affordable housing, excluding any nomination agreement which is not part of an agreement under section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 or a similar covenant.'.

Amendment No. 10, in clause 16, page 11, line 2, at end insert—

'(c) designate dwellings or descriptions of dwellings subject to a planning obligation under section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 created in pursuance of the affordable housing policy in a local authority's local plan, to which the right conferred by that section does not arise.'.

Amendment No. 36, in page 11, line 2 at end insert—

'(1A) A registered social landlord may designate any of its dwellings subject to a planning obligation under section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 created in pursuance of the affordable housing policy in a local authority's local plan, to which the right conferred by section 15 does not arise.'.

Amendment No. 147, in page 11, line 2, at end insert—

'(1A) Where a tenant of a registered social landlord has the right to acquire the dwelling of which he or she is a tenant under section 15 and where under criteria established by the Housing Corporation with the approval of the Secretary of State there are good management grounds for excluding such a dwelling from the right to acquire, the registered social landlord shall provide an alternative dwelling from its housing stock for the tenant to acquire which provides equivalent facilities and is at an equivalent valuation if the landlord wishes to exercise the exclusion.'.

Mrs. Maddock: Liberal Democrats have long recognised the value of mixed communities, and I shall say a little about why they are so important. We also recognise that owner occupation can provide a stimulus to individual households and to areas. In moving new clause 5, we are not saying that we are against people in housing association properties buying the homes in which they live and nor, from my experience, are most housing associations in principle. But the reason why that is not generally happening up and down the country is that any housing association that chooses to sell to its tenants has to give the proceeds back to the Government, rather than being allowed to invest them in building replacements.

The Government have attempted to change the situation and I welcome that, but I still believe that we need to be very careful about what the sale of such properties will actually do to communities. Along with others, we want to see urban villages with a good mixture of housing, and we want to see that in the inner cities too. We want to move away from the huge public sector housing estates, which can easily become ghettos. We are therefore in favour, in principle, of tenants of housing associations being able to buy their own homes, but only if it is their free choice, only if they can afford to, and only if the loss of those homes from the social sector will not cause serious problems for other sectors of housing in the area. The new clause seeks to address the last condition in a number of ways.

[Mrs. Maddock]

New clause 5 is similar to a clause that I tabled in Committee, but I have added new conditions to ensure that the right to create areas protected from the right to buy is not abused by local authorities. New clause 5 is about empowering local authorities to take decisions about what is best for the people in their areas, including both housing association tenants, who might wish to buy their homes, and people in housing need.

I am keen to allow local authorities to have the right of initiative to set up protected areas because I firmly believe that local authorities are the best bodies for assessing local housing need and local housing priorities. Local authorities are democratically accountable, they are on the ground where the problems exist and they are in a far better position than Ministers and civil servants to judge the merits of sales against the need to preserve an adequate stock of affordable homes for local people in housing need.

I have had numerous letters from parish councils, local councils and other organisations. We all received many letters when we were in Committee, and even in the past few days I have received more. I was interested to receive a letter from Cranbrook parish council and I was personally interested because I was christened in the church there. I was a little surprised to receive the letter, but the council sent copies to its local Members of Parliament as well as to myself and other Opposition Members. In the closing paragraphs of the letter, the council points to the two real issues. It states:

"Why is the choice to be left to housing associations or a Minister rather than to local councils?"

I agree with the council on that point. The council then asks how the section 106 agreements will be of any use if the Bill does not tie up with them.

To move nearer to my constituency, Purbeck district council sent a delegation to the Department of the Environment to express its concerns. Purbeck is an area of outstanding natural beauty. There are many reasons why it is difficult for the council to provide the right mix of housing, including social housing. Some ministerial proposals are extremely bureaucratic and lengthy. We could move away from that bureaucracy if local authorities could decide such matters for themselves. The issues that Purbeck district council has raised would be difficult to include in ministerial criteria. I believe, however, that they would come within the new clause.

The new clause provides that any local authority may declare all or part of the area for which it is responsible to be a protected area, where housing association tenants will not have the right to buy their homes. Such a declaration would be made only where a local authority could show a high level of housing need in a certain area. The authority would be required to show that homes sold off could not easily be replaced within a reasonable timescale.

There are several safeguards set out in the new clause. For example, if the registered social landlord holding the majority of social rented properties in the area to be designated as protected objects to the Secretary of State, the latter will have the right to rule on the legitimacy of the local authority's decision. That would be done in accordance with the criteria. Another safeguard is in the hands of the local electorate. If a majority of local electors object to the granting of protected area status, the Secretary of State will be empowered to rule on whether designation is genuine and falls within the criteria. A further safeguard is that the decision of the local authority must be reviewed at least every two years.

The new clause sets out commonsense measures that are designed to create a balance in housing association right to buy. Its provisions would provide flexibility. People would have the right to buy their homes where that could reasonably be done. The new clause has the support of many councillors throughout the country.

New clause 6 would provide a different approach by placing the onus on the Secretary of State to satisfy the local authority that the right to buy for housing association tenants will not lead to severe housing shortage. I am always concerned about giving powers to Ministers. The clause is not perfect, but it would place an obligation on the Secretary of State to justify the right to buy to the local authority.

Amendment No. 1 is linked to new clause 5. Amendment No. 2 would allow exemptions to the right to buy in terms of section 106 agreements and the planning system.

Many local authorities grant special planning permission for social housing because there is a shortage of affordable rented homes and virtually nowhere to build them. The Government, through planning law, have pushed for that to happen. I fear, however, that unless we arrive at a sensible decision, all that the Government have been trying to do through section 106 agreements—that is social housing provision in areas where it is needed—will be undone.

Amendment No. 36 is designed to protect section 106 agreements by allowing housing associations to exclude homes from a purchase grant scheme if they are built with planning permission with section 106 agreements. The amendment arises from discussions I have had—and I am sure the Minister and many others have had—with the National Federation of Housing Associations and it has its full and active support. I also welcome the constructive amendment tabled by the Leader of the Opposition—amendment No. 10—and amendment No. 147 tabled by the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke).

3.45 pm

Amendment No. 10 would give the right to grant exemptions from the right to buy to the Secretary of State where section 106 agreements are in place. Hon. Members who served on the Committee may remember that I am reluctant to support the granting of extra powers to the Secretary of State. I do not believe that that is the best way in which to tackle the situation, but if the amendment is pressed to a vote, I shall give it my support on the ground that I believe that section 106 planning agreements should be allowed to include exemption from the right to buy. Anything that will go some way towards backing up that proposal is important even if it gives further powers to the Secretary of State.

I also support amendment No. 147 although I do not believe that it would achieve anything more than more selective criteria for the right to buy, accompanied by the existing provisions of the tenants incentive scheme. Nevertheless, I am pleased that the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South has tabled the amendment.

This may be one of the key debates on the Bill. It is an important debate and the Government should look carefully at how it ties in with previous statements they have made and previous legislation. There is an army of people outside the House who are anxious that we do not undo the good work that has been done in creating communities where there is a variety of housing. There are severe problems in our rural communities. I know that the Minister has moved on the matter, has consulted and has said that areas with fewer than 3,000 people will be exempt. However, many people feel that that is a rather crude measure and that the Minister's other proposals on the matter are rather complicated.

New clause 5 and some of the amendments would make the matter simpler. They go along with the principle that I and other Liberal Democrats support, which is that we have faith in local councils and local communities to decide what is best in their area.

Mr. Raynsford: I rise to speak specifically to amendment No. 10. It relates to clause 16, so if it is pressed to a vote, that will happen rather later in our proceedings. I hope that that may be possible. It is right to spell out now why, in practice, there should be specific exemptions from the right-to-buy provisions relating to areas of housing that have been developed under section 106 agreements.

The amendment would give power to the Secretary of State to designate categories of dwellings subject to section 106 agreements for which the right to buy for housing associations would not apply. It would amend clause 16 under which the Secretary of State already has power to designate rural areas with a population of fewer than 3,000 which will be exempt from the right to buy. The amendment is thus an extension of an existing power in the Bill.

Labour strongly supports the opportunity for tenants of housing associations to buy their homes, subject to proper safeguards to ensure that housing remains available for people in need who do not have the option to buy, especially in areas where the replacement of housing is well nigh impossible, and safeguards to ensure that the development of new housing for social need, as part of mixed developments, can continue. That is why we argued for specific exemptions following the publication of the White Paper last summer. We are glad that the Government have agreed to exemptions for rural areas with populations of fewer than 3,000 people. I suspect, however, that there will be some definitional problems. The Minister has produced a huge schedule, listing all the parishes in the country where the exemptions will apply. Unfortunately, the debate will continue about precisely how many people live in the parishes concerned and whether these should or should not be included in the register. The Opposition, however, entirely support the principle.

Section 106 agreements raises similar principles. It may be helpful if I outline the main provisions of section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. The Government's planning policy guidance note 3 encourages local authorities to prepare local development plans and to make provision for affordable housing to be included as part of developments in areas where there is a clear need for such housing. PPG3 makes clear that the need for affordable housing is "a material planning consideration which may properly be taken into account in formulating development plan policies."

A local authority can therefore include an affordable housing policy in its local plan where a shortage of affordable housing has been identified. Such a policy enables the local authority to negotiate with developers seeking planning permission for residential developments. The authority can negotiate to ensure that the developers include an element of affordable housing on suitable sites. The Government's guidance suggests that the affordable housing provided by such a policy should be available "in the long term". PPG3 states that the authority must ensure that the benefits of affordable housing are "enjoyed by successive as well as by initial occupiers of property".

The problem with the right-to-buy scheme is that where that right exists with discounts, the affordable housing provided as part of a balanced development to ensure that there will be continued provision for successive as well as initial occupiers of the property will be entirely subverted. The initial occupiers with the right to buy could well seek to exercise that right, whereupon they become the outright owners of the property. They will then be free to sell it at a market price. So the purpose of the planning policy—to enable some affordable housing, usually 25 per cent. or less of the total development, to be provided as part of a mixed development to produce balanced communities and to ensure that there will be opportunities to obtain affordable housing in the future—could be subverted if the right to buy were to apply without exemptions.

There are more serious implications. Landowners who have been prepared to consider handing over land for development at less than the market rate to enable affordable housing schemes to be developed, and developers who have been prepared to provide sites or, in some cases, to build houses at lower than market rates to facilitate the application of the policy might well decide that they will no longer do so.

That is not scaremongering on the part of the Opposition. I must pray in evidence one of the largest commercial companies in this country, which has, on the whole, a record of support and sympathy for the Government—the Hanson group. The group, one of the countries' largest developers, has threatened to pull out of a deal to provide 1,500 homes for low-income families as part of a development near Peterborough. These houses will be part of a much larger development. The company argues that the proposals to extend the right to buy will amount to a "slap in the face" and "a serious disincentive" to future developers. The reason why it says that is simple, and was outlined in a letter sent earlier this month to the chief executive of Peterborough council by the relevant director of the Hanson group.

He said:

"To find that our residential tenants, who will already be benefiting from substantial housing provision, will be able to make a tax-free gain at our expense will be seen as a slap in the face and a serious disincentive to future developers . . . I shall review the situation next year when, hopefully, the Government will have revised its position."

[Mr. Raynsford]

We hope that a Government will have revised the position next year, whether this Government or another one. Mr. Hopkins, the managing director of Hanson Land goes on to say:

"Otherwise, I feel it is inevitable that we shall have to renegotiate our agreement with you."

There we have a large private developer saying that if the measure goes through it will undermine the basis on which the company has been prepared to provide affordable sites as part of a development and that it will renegotiate. There we have in a nutshell one aspect of the problem.

As I have said, the other aspect of the problem is the loss of housing as it is sold over time and becomes market housing rather than affordable housing. Against that background, it is clear that we need safeguards to ensure that such developments can continue to be built. We also need safeguards to ensure that the Government's planning policies can continue to operate. There is a clear contradiction between the impact of the right-to-buy policy and that of planning policies. Our amendment is designed to overcome that conflict.

The effect of the exemption will not be enormous. We are not talking about large numbers of people being denied the opportunity to buy their homes. Department of the Environment research suggests that 250 to 300 schemes have been developed under the planning guidelines since the 1980s, providing about 11,000 affordable homes. We are talking about a relatively small number of homes, but we must ensure that they continue to be available in perpetuity for people in housing need.

Our approach differs from that of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock). I understand her concern. It is identical to ours. Her approach is to allow local authorities to declare their areas off limits for the right to buy. That does not seem to us to be the correct way to go about it. It could result in arbitrary distinctions between areas. One local authority might designate a protected area while the next one might not. Individuals would not be able to exercise their rights with any confidence. There would be anomalies between areas. Many individuals would feel a sense of injustice. For all those reasons, we do not believe that the hon. Lady's proposal is the best way to tackle the problem.

We propose instead to give the Secretary of State powers to designate the categories of developments under section 106 agreements which would be exempt. That would ensure a standard national policy. There would be no scope for individual local authorities or landlords to adopt different policies. There would be no scope for them to seek to frustrate the wishes of tenants to buy their home in those areas. It would ensure a consistent national framework similar to the national framework already agreed by the Government for rural housing.

So we have here a modest amendment designed to ensure the continuation of a planning policy which was introduced by the Government, which we support, which can ensure the creation of balanced communities and which can ensure that the affordable housing generated by those developments continue to be available.

It makes sense and it is a necessary safeguard that will ensure the success of the right to buy for housing associations—a concept that we support—without creating unfortunate consequences that could undermine appropriate developments, such as the Peterborough example that I have given, and without creating a position where the balanced communities that we hope to see achieved are eroded over time as all the property transfers into owner occupation. I hope that the Government accept the amendment because it makes an enormous amount of sense and it is consistent with their planning policies.

4 pm

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): I support the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford)—that is, amendment No. 10. I support the proposal that the Secretary of State should be able to specify properties where section 106 agreements have been reached and should be able to ensure that they are excluded from the right to buy. In all the discussions in Committee about the right-to-buy properties for housing association tenants, we have said that we support the general approach and the general principle of the right to buy.

We support the right of housing association tenants to be on a similar basis to local authority tenants. On a number of occasions we have made it clear that we are not prepared to support exemptions where there are not exemptions for local authority tenants. We believe that housing association tenants have the same entitlement and we want to see it written into the Bill.

In speaking to amendment No. 10, my hon. Friend said that there is a possibility that the policy will lead to problems in rural areas, including a lack of social and affordable housing. We pressed for the development of a policy that will give protection to that sort of housing in those areas and we pressed for some exclusions from the rights that are generally available to housing association tenants. That is precisely why we have come to look at section 106 agreements.

We believe that the Minister should have the power, in certain circumstances, to exempt certain properties because of the potential for removing the availability of affordable social housing from certain parts of our community. If the right-to-buy policy were allowed to stand without any of the safeguards that we are trying to write into the Bill, there could be problems in terms of a lack of social housing in rural areas.

I shall illustrate my support for the amendment by referring to part of my constituency. There is an area in my constituency that is essentially a new town. It was brought into Sheffield at the beginning of the 1970s from Derbyshire for the purpose of allowing an expansion of Sheffield's community which could not expand within the given city boundaries of the time. The plans for the area were worked out in great detail, with public consultation and general support, and they included a balance of housing to buy and housing to rent. There has been a substantial change of housing policy in this country since the inception of those plans. The early townships had a balance of communities—they had houses to rent and houses to buy—but only housing to buy has been possible in later years.

The Government often attack the large council estates in our country—sometimes unfairly and sometimes indiscriminately. However, they bring out the fact that it is unwise to have large areas in any city that are of the same tenure and that have no social mix. I contend that it is unwise to have large areas in our cities with only houses to rent and with people perhaps coming from a similar socio-economic background, but that it is equally unwise to develop large areas in our cities—such as Sheffield—where there are only houses to buy. People who choose to rent or who have no alternative but to rent do not have the opportunity to live in those communities.

There are areas in my constituency where people who cannot afford to buy or who do not want to buy are excluded—for example, people who want to rent a small flat. For example, I refer to younger people and to older people—who may have owned a house but who choose to move into rented accommodation later in life. Constituents who come to my surgery tell me, "I live in this area and own my property. Can you enable mum and dad to live near me? By the way, they want a council property or housing association property to rent. We do not really mind which, as long as there is a social landlord." The answer to such people is "No. We are very sorry. We can find somewhere, but it is three miles away." That is all right if the person concerned has a car in which to visit mum and dad, but it will not be so easy for mum and dad to visit in return, and they will lose some independence because no property is available to rent in the area.

It is also important to achieve a balance between communities. It used to be possible for local authorities to build suitable properties, but they cannot do so any more. In Sheffield we developed a very good partnership scheme enabling councils and housing associations to work with private builders. The Government have now stopped that scheme, but it has already put some rentable houses into the area.

We want to make housing association developments possible. In particular, we want to enable housing associations to afford to buy the available land. Section 106 agreements are a valuable asset, as they can be defined as part of an overall planning policy. I have just been talking about the planning arrangements for the Mosborough area in Sheffield. As part of their overall planning policy, local authorities should be able to wield a particular weapon: the ability to designate parts of a new community as areas where social housing will be provided. It is not sufficient to designate those areas in the first place, however; it is equally important to ensure that they remain areas for social housing in the longer term. The initial provision of a balanced community will be of no great benefit in 20 or 30 years' time if all the houses that were built for rent—often in attractive and desirable locations—suddenly become subject to the right to buy, and are sold. The initial planning policies that recognised the desirability of affordable housing must be maintained, and the amendment would empower the Secretary of State to ensure that they are.

Local authorities must not take such a use of planning policies lightly. In general, if areas are allocated for housing under planning policies, any sort of housing can be developed. Section 106 has a special function: as my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich said, it is used by planning authorities in the light of a particular local need, when that is the best—often the only—way in which to ensure that suitable housing is built.

I am currently discussing the matter with representatives of the North British housing association, which has provided quite a few properties in the Sheffield area. It is now paying particular attention to the Mosborough area, and wants to talk to the local authority about the use of section 106 powers and the possibility of building properties in the area without the need for housing association grant from the Government. Naturally, the association fears that if it goes ahead using its own resources and other private funds that it can secure, the properties that it builds for specific purposes may be removed from the social rented sector soon afterwards.

Amendment No. 10 does not say that all section 106 properties will be exempt in all circumstances; it says that the Secretary of State should have a right and a power to remove properties from the right-to-buy scheme in some circumstances, when they are provided under section 106 powers and when they have clearly been provided to meet a local need that still exists. When the need has been assessed and identified, when it is clear that the houses were built to meet that need under section 106 and when it is still necessary to ensure that people are able to live in their communities when they can only afford to rent, the Secretary of State will be able to exercise his judgment and make certain that those properties remain available for social renting. I hope that the Secretary of State will recognise that this modest amendment could have a real impact on some people in some communities.

Mr. Peter Brooke (City of London and Westminster, South): I rise to speak on my amendment No. 147, to which the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) referred. In Committee, we debated the general subject of this group of amendments, and I raised the issue with which the amendment deals with my hon. Friend the Minister. He implied that he understood the issue and would consider it. It is therefore a probing amendment, designed to provide a hook on which he can hang the outcome of his consideration.

Before I come to the amendment, I wish to say a word about the balance of inner-city housing. In Committee, I noted that social housing in inner cities was needed to enable the people who provide the key services that any city requires to live close to the centre. I recognise the Bill's potential implications for the existing provision of social housing and for any new housing that is provided. I argued that it would be wrong to build in any special purposes, beyond raising the issue of management in such areas.

I am conscious of the problem because we have some prior evidence. A housing association in my constituency manages housing that came to it following the abolition of the Greater London council, where a number of GLC tenants had exercised the right to buy before the block came into its hands. I dare say that it is partly that experience of mixed use in the housing that it currently has to manage that prompts its thoughts.

It is unquestionably the case that several tenants who exercised the right to buy in the middle 1980s have sold on, as the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) said. It is therefore arguable that the housing is no longer being used for the purpose for which it was originally designed. The problem about the subsequent ownership into which such housing comes is the same as that which applies in respect of leasehold enfranchisement. There can be passionate arguments in favour of securing the right to leasehold enfranchisement, but, after it has been exercised, the house can be sold on to foreigners who were not part of the original debate and had not argued for the change.

[Mr. Peter Brooke]

To return to the issue that I raised in Committee and which I want to raise with the Minister, the problem of housing associations in inner-city areas is that they are likely to have pockets of housing in many different buildings. Their capacity to manage them efficiently is enormously enhanced if, as far as possible, mixed use can be avoided and the style of ownership in particular blocks or pockets can be consistent—homogeneous rather than heterogeneous.

My amendment would enable housing associations to argue that management problems would be caused by certain properties passing into the hands of those who wish to purchase them. In such circumstances, provided they could prove that, they should have the opportunity to offer an alternative flat—in central London, it is likely to be a flat rather than a house—to the tenant who wished to buy. The housing association and both its tenants and leaseholders would be protected from the possibility of rents and service charges rising simply because the cost of management had increased because of the mixed use that it was being required to maintain.

4.15 pm

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Over a good many years, I have taken an interest in the effects of right-to-buy arrangements that were introduced on to the statute book through the Housing Act 1980. Although I have always been a great enthusiast of the right to buy, I have been anxious that, in some areas of the country, the full effect of an open market on rented property should not apply to the right to buy.

I start by declaring—as I have in the Register of Members' Interests—that I own some rented housing, but none of it is in areas such as the national parks, about which I want to talk this afternoon.

Over the years, I have done my best—both from within and outside Government—to try to ensure that the effects of right-to-buy arrangements did not, in areas such as my constituency in the Lake district, make an already difficult housing situation infinitely worse. For all the years that I have been in the House—nearly 32—I have been extremely concerned about what happens in regions such as my constituency, where there is a huge demand from people from outside the area who wish to have retirement or holiday homes and who buy up properties. They drive the prices up to such a level that the local people who have been born, brought up and want to work in the area can no longer afford to live in it because of the serious escalation of house prices.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): That is by no means confined to the Lake district. Some of the lovely rural areas in my constituency are handicapped by the same process, which is why it is essential to keep some properties for indigent people, and their sons and daughters.

Mr. Jopling: That is right. My hon. Friend, whose constituency joins mine and who is a distinguished former Member of the European Parliament—for my constituency as well as her own—has put her finger on an important point.

I was always concerned that the right-to-buy arrangements could, if allowed to develop in an uncontrolled way, drive council houses out of the hands of locally born and locally employed people. I was concerned that the arrangements could drive those houses into the realm of people who wanted retirement or holiday homes.

When the 1980 Act was passing through the House, we put pressure on the Government—I did so from within Government—to curtail the power of new owners who had exercised their right to buy to resell their properties on the open housing market. I think that it was the House of Lords that eventually nudged the Government into rightly curtailing the resale of those houses after the right to buy had been exercised. They restricted that right to reasonably locally based people, which was a good move.

In my constituency—my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) is right to say that the same thing applies to many other parts of the country, particularly the national parks—council house tenants bought their council houses and found that it paid to let them as holiday homes. The massive profits they made allowed them to pay a mortgage on other houses in nearby towns where they went to live. They were running small cottage industries using their council houses. We were able to halt that practice in about 1988.

I was involved also in steps, which the Government supported, to prevent abuses involving houses that had been earmarked as joint ownership properties. Owners who could not afford to pay 100 per cent. of the property price were able to enter into a shared ownership arrangement with either the housing association or the local authority, and then try to staircase their ownership. We took steps to prevent those houses from coming on to the open housing market thereby ceasing to qualify as joint ownership properties for those who wanted to own their homes but who could not afford to pay the whole price.

Last summer, the Government announced in their White Paper that properties in rural areas owned by housing associations would be exempt from the new right to buy. The tenants would also be exempt from the right-to-buy provision in those circumstances. I welcomed that move. I thought that all was going well until I heard recently from the Country Landowners Association—of which I am a member—which expressed continuing concern about the situation. In winding up the debate, I ask the Minister to answer some questions that bother the CLA.

It wonders whether the Government have done enough in the Bill to restore certainty and enable the future development of affordable rented housing schemes. First, the CLA asks the Government how providers of land can be certain that low-cost housing will not be lost to the open market in future if, as the Government have said, the boundaries of rural area exemption are to be subject to reviews in the Bill. That is a danger to future confidence.

It leads to the CLA's second question: how will the Government deal with special cases involving, for example, small towns in national parks—I have talked about that problem in my constituency and in other areas—which exceed the 3,000 population threshold but which do not have alternative housing options? That is a problem in my constituency, and it concerns other hon. Members, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and those whose constituencies encompass national parks.

Thirdly, the CLA asks how planning authorities can have the confidence to make section 106 agreements on exceptions sites in small towns such as those that I described, when the low-cost housing involved is not part of the rural areas exemption, or is likely to not be exempt in five or 10 years. They are important questions, and I shall listen very carefully to the Minister's response. The CLA tells me that it believes that there would be greater certainty if the Bill provided a once-and-for-all exemption for schemes in existence at the point of Royal Assent or at the date of planning permission for subsequent developments. It believes that there would be greater certainty if the Bill extended the definition of rural areas to cover special cases where the exercise of a right to buy would harm the interests of future generations.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the CLA, and I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say. Let me say in the friendliest way that the House of Lords gets very excited about exactly such issues: I strongly recommend that he gets his act together tonight, as that will save him a great deal of trouble when the Bill goes to another place.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) has issued a firm warning. The Minister would be wise to take note of what the right hon. Gentleman had to say, because of his experience as a Cabinet Minister responsible for housing. He made it clear that there are anomalies in the drafting of housing and planning legislation, and concern has been expressed by Members on both sides of the House about the possible consequences.

I want to draw attention to a local concern and the views expressed by people responsible for housing matters in West Yorkshire and Humberside. Mr. Steve Close, the chief executive of the Chantry housing association in Wakefield, wrote to me to the effect that the Chantry housing association and the National Federation of Housing Associations remain concerned that, without some changes, the proposed grant scheme for housing association tenants would undermine the provision of affordable housing in areas where replacement is impossible.

Local authorities in the industrial and urban conurbations of West Yorkshire are finding it difficult to replace the affordable social housing that was sold under the right to buy. That affects the provision of affordable housing to meet specific needs. I can say without a shadow of a doubt that, in my constituency, there are areas with a specific need for social housing and for houses that people can afford to rent. The private sector does not provide such accommodation. Amendment No. 10 gives the Minister an opportunity to regulate matters, so that properties that were built for specific purposes under section 106 will continue to be available to those who require low-rent properties.

In Committee, we asked about houses that had been built specifically for certain purposes under certain conditions, particularly for the elderly or the infirm. Ministers have said that that practice will continue and that such properties will continue to be available to specifically designated people. We want to look one step beyond the assurance given by the Minister in Committee, to ensure that section 106 housing will remain in the market for people in need of social properties at affordable rents.

The Government have acknowledged the need for affordable housing. Ministers require every local authority to prepare a local development plan that conveys proposals and objectives for the area, and Wakefield has conformed.

4.30 pm

The Government's planning policy guidance No. 3 issued in 1992 stated:

"a community's need for affordable housing is a material planning consideration which may be taken into account in formulating development plan policies."

One purpose of new clause 5 is to secure the Government's acknowledgement that there is a need for affordable housing. We want the Minister's reassurance on that point, and an undertaking that properties that are considered by housing associations or local authorities as necessary under new clause 5 will remain available to people in need of social housing at rents that they can afford.

Affordable housing is defined as subsidised housing and low-cost market housing. I am pleased that the Minister nods in agreement—it appears that he is drawing nearer to meeting our request.

A local authority may include an affordable housing policy in its local plan where a shortage of such housing has been identified. In Wakefield and other areas where the mining industry was once predominant, social housing was provided under the former coal mine agreements. With the closure of the collieries, such estates have been demolished and replaced by high-price properties that local people cannot afford, and little low-rent properties remain apart from local authority or housing association homes.

Under the right to buy, the number of local authority properties available for rent is decreasing considerably, and as the Bill makes provision for the right to buy to be extended to housing association tenants, one can anticipate that people trying to obtain an affordable tenancy will have further problems unless changes are made to the Bill. If local authorities continue to include an affordable housing policy in their local plans where a shortage of such housing has been identified, that will enable authorities to negotiate with residential developers, to include an element of affordable housing on suitable sites.

I again draw attention to the situation in mining areas, where there has been a total clearance of social housing because of the mining industry's closure. Provisions for designating certain areas for social housing and including affordable housing need to be strengthened, which I hope that the Minister will consider today.

Government guidance suggests that affordable housing provided through a planning policy should be available in the long term, and states that local authorities must ensure that arrangements are in place to ensure that the "benefit of affordable housing will be enjoyed by successive as well as by initial occupiers of the property."

That point is reiterated in the amendments.

[Mr. William O'Brien]

It is important for the Minister to assure us that, when new properties are available under section 106 or when agreement has been reached with local authorities and developers, those properties will be available for future generations. The destinies of people who will rely in future on social housing at affordable rents will be determined by the decisions that we take today.

Against that background, I support amendment No. 10. I believe that it is a constructive amendment, that it will be of great benefit to many people in future, and that the Minister should support it. If we pass it, we will demonstrate beyond any shadow of doubt that this is the type of social and affordable housing policy that the Government believe in.

I ask the Minister and all hon. Members to support this group of amendments, because they are constructive and will help to enhance the Bill's benefit.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): My hon. Friend the Minister will appreciate that Ludlow is a very rural constituency. I endorse the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), who has put the case for beefing up this legislation, so that all those who have entered into the spirit of providing social housing in the countryside since the change in the legislation some years ago will not feel that they have been let down, but believe that there is some certainty about the future.

Before I say any more, I should emphasise that I believe in the right-to-buy policy. It has been one of the most successful political policies of all time, and enabled thousands of people to achieve their lifelong ambition—to live in the property they own—which is entirely consistent with the policies of a Conservative Government. Having said that, I trust that the Minister will appreciate that it is very much a question of horses for courses.

Rural housing was one of the first matters that I became aware of as a problem in my constituency after I was elected as a Member of Parliament in 1987. The Minister will be able to understand why it is a problem. A brief explanation is that every property in my constituency is regarded as desirable, and that it is regarded as doubly desirable by those who do not currently live in my constituency but who would like to live there.

People move into my constituency from more affluent areas. They have a bigger purse and deeper pockets than the indigenous population, and they are therefore able to buy up every property, no matter what its condition or size.

Therefore, I hope that the Minister, who I am sure is paying close attention to this debate, will recognise that there is a world of difference between introducing a right-to-buy policy in an urban area, where it is entirely appropriate, and introducing it in a rural area, where, in my submission and that of many of my constituents, it is entirely inappropriate because of the circumstances I have described.

We have already altered the law to enable social housing to be provided in rural areas, and everyone in the jigsaw supports our policy. It is therefore important that we give those people a sense of stability, and a guarantee that they continue to operate the current system. I am talking about the landowners who have made land available at less than the commercial price, the housing associations that are involved, and, not least, the planners who grant planning permission outside the village enclave.

It would be a mistake if we missed the opportunity to reassure those people that the current regime will continue to operate. For that reason, I seek a specific assurance from the Minister that he will accept the terms of the amendment.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): I must apologise to the House for participating rather late in the debate, but I am glad that I had the chance to hear the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) speak in favour of amendment No. 10, which I too support. I should like to inquire of my hon. Friend the Minister about certain issues.

In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), I enthusiastically support the right-to-buy policy. I regard it as one of the great achievements of successive Conservative Governments. I also regard the creation of the housing association movement as one of the jewels in our crown.

This morning, I received a letter from the chief executive of the Swale housing association, which has been immensely successful. I take its representations seriously. That housing association in my constituency has control of between 6,000 and 7,000 houses under a total transfer scheme from the public sector. Its successful operation makes it an example that should be emulated right across the country.

The chief executive stresses that the housing association supports

"right to buy and other purchase initiatives" and that it

"shall operate fully the purchase grant scheme which extends the right to buy scheme to new tenants not just those who transferred from Swale Borough Council".

Given that support, when he went on to suggest that amendments Nos. 10 and 36 should be considered seriously, I therefore wanted to make representations to the Minister to find out how the Government propose to deal with houses that have been built under section 106 agreements.

I will not labour the point, which has already been well made, and I am sure that my hon. Friend is well seized of it, but an element of contradiction seems apparent. If we encourage, and rightly so, local authorities to make section 106 agreements to deal specifically with the problems of housing need and affordable housing in certain areas, it is inconsistent to say that those self-same houses can be sold.

It is my understanding that this specific problem is not a great one—I am taking that information from the briefing of the National Federation of Housing Associations, and I apologise if those points have already been made. None the less, I note that Department of the Environment research suggests that 11,000 such homes have been built since the late 1980s, mainly in the south-east and in south Wales.

According to that briefing:

"Of three large associations, one had 10 dwellings out of 400 that would be affected, one had only 2 schemes and the other just 1 scheme."

I have no wish to undermine the general concept of the proposal, and I am not calling for large-scale exemptions. An argument has been responsibly made, however, about a specific number of section 106 agreements in areas such as mine, where a small number of houses meet a specific need. I would welcome the Minister's comments on that. I have no idea whether the amendments are sensible or right, but I would welcome some words of assistance from my hon. Friend to meet my philosophical argument.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I should like to echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) has said.

I welcome the Government's initiative to exempt those communities of fewer than 3,000 people, but I too represent a rural constituency, 80 per cent. of which is designated for planning purposes of one sort or another.

If the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow is desirable, my constituency in the Cotswolds is equally, if not more, so. Houses there are even more expensive than in my hon. Friend's constituency. The incentive for people to try to get on the ladder for low-cost housing and then try to get the right to buy that property is all the greater in my constituency. My fear is that, when the low-cost housing that has been provided is whittled away by the right to buy, there will be ever more pressure for even more land to be provided at a low cost.

Although a section 106 agreement may be entered into when an estate is built, the pressure will grow for even more low-cost estates. That would have two consequences. First, ever more land would be used up in a rural area. Secondly, and perhaps a more important consequence, a landlord who is offered a mere glimmer of the possibility of obtaining full planning permission might not even want to sell or give that land at low cost.

In my constituency, the building land for which full planning permission for residential dwellings is available costs between £100,000 and £200,000 per acre. There is therefore a great incentive for a landlord to hold out in case he might get full planning permission. Where an area is designated for low-cost housing, and is subject to the exemption, the relevant criteria should be altered only in exceptional circumstances; otherwise, we will be in deep trouble in rural areas.

4.45 pm

Mr. Curry: The debate has ranged from the furthest flung rural communities to the inner-city bailiwick of my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke). I should declare an interest as my constituency is the fifth most scattered one in the country, where anything that is not national park is an area of outstanding natural beauty. The problems that my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) has highlighted—his constituency matches mine—and those outlined by my hon. Friends the Members for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) and for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) are all writ large in my constituency. They would therefore expect me to be particularly sensitive to the problems of housing in rural areas.

When we drew up the policy for the new purchase grant scheme we had two things in mind. First, we wished to extend home ownership so that people living in housing association property were put on a more equal basis with people living in local authority property under secure tenure. The basis of the scheme is the equivalence of status of those two sets of tenants. Secondly, we wanted to recognise that certain rural areas present particular problems, where it would not be sensible to permit a right to buy.

The question then arose about how to define such a scheme. I wanted a scheme that was easy to define, clear cut, not bureaucratic and complex and which did not allow properties to float in and out of designation. That is why we chose the concept of rural settlements of 3,000 people. We did so partly because the definition of rurality by the Rural Development Commission, which we are building upon, is fairly well understood. We chose carefully the idea of settlement as opposed to village or parish because it gave us more flexibility. One could have a parish which included some large places, as well as some small areas. Designating settlements enables us to propose more embracing exclusions. Making sure that people know what those exclusions are is of course important. That is why we propose carefully to list the settlements' locations, and we shall also issue maps carefully defining them.

Mr. Gill: If my memory serves me right, this is where we were last time the question was debated. I am sure that the Minister acknowledged then that definitions would need to be made, so it is sad that we are here discussing the same measure again while the lists are still not available. When does he propose to publish them?

Mr. Curry: We gave members of the Committee some illustrative examples of how we intended to proceed. We shall issue lists once the Bill has completed its passage; they will be subject to consultation. We do not intend to come up with a definition that is so hard and fast that settlements of 2,999 will be included but those of 3,001 will not. Equally, we want to avoid accidents of birth and death sending settlements in and out of designation.

Once we have designated the settlements for the first time, we expect the designations to remain in force for 10 years, or at least between censuses. It is not in anyone's interest that settlements should not know what status they enjoy. Obviously, there will have to be revisions from time to time—say, when a major settlement is developed, since that will alter the social and economic nature of an area. We are approaching the matter flexibly, therefore, but with a clear set of rules that will not, I hope, be confusing.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale raised some questions about his own part of the world, mentioning the national parks in particular. There are only 17 settlements of more than 3,000 people in all our national parks. In the Lake district they are Keswick, which is not in my right hon. Friend's constituency, and Windermere, which is, and which has a population of roughly 70,000. In the Yorkshire dales and Northumberland parks, no settlements fall within the designation. In Exmoor, there would be two, in the north Yorkshire moors, three, and in Dartmoor, four. There would be rather more in the Peak district, but we shall need to discuss the detail to determine exactly which ones will be designated.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) has explained that he cannot be here owing to the need to attend a Select Committee this afternoon, but I might point out that, with areas close to major conurbations, we would need to be sensitive to the situation and to recognise that differing circumstances probably apply as compared with more far-flung communities.

[Mr. Curry]

I should at this point remark that in rural areas, for existing properties, whether or not covered by section 106, the scheme is entirely voluntary. Properties are covered only if the housing association opts into the scheme, because it is entirely discretionary. The element of requirement impinges only on properties built with public funds after this legislation becomes law. The hon. Member for Attercliffe cited the example of a housing association that wanted to develop affordable homes using only money raised privately. In that case, there would be no right to buy. The simple formula in that case is: no housing association grant, no sale. I hope that that will reassure the hon. Gentleman.

We have just circulated a consultation paper, and replies have been received. The proposals recognise the need for replacement properties, which is why we recycle receipts into the scheme. That is an essential element of the whole idea. As the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) correctly said, under current legislation if a housing association sells properties—quite a number do; it is well established—the receipts go back to the Housing Corporation. The money is recycled into general funding, not specifically to the housing association. Under this scheme, when a housing association sells a property, the receipts are retained by the association and must be used to provide new social housing. That means that if the association is using land donated, or given at very low cost, the sale takes place at market value and there will be no discount for the housing association. The tenant gets a discount, as with the local authority scheme—although perhaps not on the same scale. The point is that the housing association receives a market price for the property, and all the money goes into the provision of new accommodation. That is how any donation is recycled for future tenants.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) mentioned Hanson Land Ltd. The Labour party rides with strange bedfellows these days, it would seem. One day Hanson—the next, who knows? The answer to the hon. Member's point is that if those properties are sold at market value, the housing association will use the whole of that value for recycling into new properties. So Hanson's fear of a bonus for the tenants is misplaced. There is no bonus for them from the point of view of the housing association.

Mrs. Maddock: I have listened carefully to the Minister, but I believe that there is evidence that in the process of buying and selling there will not be enough money left at the end of the system to replace all the properties. I cannot quote the figures, but I know that people are very worried about this. In practice it sounds fine: the money will be returned and will be available for future use. But we all know from buying our own homes that it costs money to make financial deals, so some money is lost to the system.

Mr. Curry: Under the legislation, when a housing association receives money it will all go into the provision of new accommodation—and it does not have to be newly built. It can be acquired in other ways, which may enable the association, in fact, to invest in more houses than it has sold.

We want to be flexible, as I have said. We shall keep all the mechanisms under review. I am anxious that the scheme should work. As I said often in Committee, I am not in receipt of biblical certitude; we need to keep an eye on developments. I would not hesitate to amend the scheme if that appeared necessary. But I do not want to make the scheme so complicated that its very complexity constitutes a deterrent. Our twin purpose is to encourage home ownership and to put housing association tenants on a more equal footing with local authority tenants. At the same time, we have to recognise that there are circumstances in which that would not be—to use a word beloved of my officials—appropriate.

Mr. Raynsford: The Minister has presented the case for the recycling of capital receipts as the solution to the problem, but it is not an adequate solution. First, there will be places where it is impossible to replace properties, especially in communities where there is strong pressure on development and where, once a development is complete, people do not want further development. If the housing that is developed goes out of social use, therefore, it will be lost for ever.

Secondly, the crucial point about Hanson which the Minister overlooked is that no developer or landowner will make land available for social needs at low market price if he then sees that the resulting windfall accrues not to him but to the housing association and the tenant, because the tenant can buy at a discount and the housing association gets the capital receipt. Many landowners say that they are prepared to part with land for less than the market price, but they will not do so if, as a result of the right to buy, that land is built on with houses that are then sold at market rates. That will act as a deterrent to future development in Peterborough and elsewhere.

Mr. Curry: There is no windfall gain for the tenant. The tenant pays a market price, but he is given help in paying the market price by the grant. The tenant does not get a discount, irrespective of whether the land was given by the Church Commissioners, my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale or anyone else. The price that the tenant pays is exactly the same as the price that the market requires, but he gets assistance from the grant that is given to help him to pay that price. The tenant pays a percentage and the remainder is made up by the grant.

If the housing association sells a property that has been built on land that has been donated, it will make a bigger profit from the sale of that land and that profit will then be recycled into the provision of new accommodation. The value of the gift is transmitted forward into the new sales. That is my point. But I am willing to reply to other points.

5 pm

Mr. Gill: My hon. Friend the Minister has not answered the question posed by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford). We all accept, on both sides of the House, that there is no gain or benefit to the tenant. We accept that such gain as there is will go to the housing association and will therefore, as my hon. Friend points out, be recycled. But will he put himself in the shoes of the landowner who either has sold or might in future be prepared to sell land for the purpose of social housing? If the landowner provides land for that purpose, is there any certainty that that land and that housing will remain in use for the purpose for which he has made it available at less than the market price? If there is no certainty, why should the landowner provide any land? More to the point, why should any landowner make additional land available in the future if the original housing on the original land is disposed of? My hon. Friend must consider the issue from the point of view of the landowner, who may be very reluctant to let any land go. In many instances, there will be opposition in the villages to any land being allowed for that sort of housing and it will be extraordinarily difficult for any landowner to countenance making land available unless there is a guarantee that the land and the houses built on it will remain used for the purpose for which he made it available in the first place.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the Minister continues, I must say that we have had two rather long interventions. I shall not be so generous next time.

Mr. Curry: First, in all the areas covered by the 3,000 rule, the landowner can donate land in the absolute certainty that that land and the property which stands on it will not be sold because it will fall within the exemption. I anticipate that most of the settlements that will be designated in the first instance are likely to remain permanently designated. In the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, in my constituency, and in the national parks, most of the settlements are not on the borderline of 3,000, but are well below 3,000—in the hundreds. So the question would not arise.

Secondly, outside the 3,000 rule for new build, if the landlord gave land for the purposes of social housing and social houses were built on it and if the housing association had used public funds to build property—that is a further condition—and that land were sold, the housing association's receipt, which would be the market receipt, would have to be used to provide new social lettings. The housing association has no discretion about that, because it is a requirement that that money be recycled into new social lettings.

Mr. Jopling: I shall try to be brief. There is still an element of uncertainty which my hon. Friend the Minister has not been able to put aside. Why not include in the Bill a provision that the reviews can only bring more land into the exempt area and cannot take land that is already exempted outside the area?

Mr. Curry: There might be circumstances in which a decision is taken to establish a new settlement, for example. We all know the pressures that we are under in provision for new households. We wish to settle that, as far as possible, on used sites, and that point verges on the concerns expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South.

One cannot exclude the possibility that there might be some demand that would require the augmenting of existing settlements. Such circumstances will not occur frequently, but one should not assume that they cannot happen. In that case, we might have an anomaly under which quite large settlements were excluded from the programme. As I have said already, when we make the designations we intend to consult on them. We do not intend to seek arithmetical precision in every instance; we will consider local circumstances. Once the designations are established, they are likely to remain for the period between censuses at least, and possibly for much longer.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: I regard that as a most unsatisfactory answer. Rural areas have great continuity and people think in terms of 100 years, not five or 10. Landlords, as some of my hon. Friends have said, will not give land away unless they have some certainty that the designated areas will remain into the future, not just for 10 years.

Mr. Curry: In the overwhelming number of areas, that will be the case. But if my hon. Friend had been asked 100 years ago whether she could anticipate the settlement patterns that would exist now, she would have had some difficulty in predicting them, and so would I.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: My hon. Friend said 10 years.

Mr. Curry: I said that the census takes place on a 10-yearly basis and we would not expect any reviews to take place in a period shorter than that. In the overwhelming number of cases, there is unlikely to be any change as a result of the census, but if we institute arrangements, we must have some mechanism for flexibility. We are constantly told not to be too rigid. I do not want to be rigid and that is why I do not want to see a situation in which there is constant change and when as soon anybody is entered in the register of births, marriages and deaths he or she can move the settlement in or out of the qualifications.

Mr. Raynsford: The Minister is making very heavy weather of this. He accepts the need for a clear exemption in rural areas. Why will he not accept the case for a clear exemption in the case of section 106 agreements? The numbers involved are small, but that would give certainty to the landowner and the developer that the purpose of that land being provided cheaply is because it is for social housing in perpetuity. That is consistent with Government planning policy, so why cannot the Minister agree to it?

Mr. Curry: I have not got to my notes yet. As the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) mentioned, the definition of "affordable" is not just for rented accommodation. It goes wider than that, as does the use of section 106. Existing properties under section 106 can be withheld from the scheme because it depends on voluntarily opting in. Section 106 is irrelevant in that regard. If a new site were permitted section 106 status, what would prevent all new-builds from being designated under section 106? There would be a danger that section 106 would be used automatically as an impediment to the implementation of a sensible policy of wider home ownership. When a house is sold, the grant helps to make up the market price, the sale is made only at the market price and, if the housing association sells, it gets the benefit, not the tenant, and it has to use that for the provision of new accommodation. I cannot see why that should cause a particular difficulty.

[Mr. Curry]

We have done our best to ensure that the provision is as sensible as possible. I have spoken to the Country Landowners Association and I have discussed the whole question with Mr. Euan Cameron. I accept that the CLA may have concerns, but I hope that I have succeeded in explaining what we are trying to achieve in the legislation.

I do not want my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South to feel neglected in his inner-city fastness. As he will know, arrangements for the voluntary right to buy are not part of the Bill. I have, however, conducted quite lengthy discussions with the housing associations about that right in an attempt to satisfy what I regard as their legitimate concerns. We have ensured already that landlords have the power to offer alternative properties for sale to tenants if they are available and if the tenants wish to buy, but there would be some difficulties in making that process a requirement of the scheme.

I know that some housing associations with properties in inner London are worried about the potential difficulties of managing mixed leasehold and tenanted developments. For existing properties, the scheme is voluntary. We have already agreed that landlords can have extra discretion to exclude homes built in the past with charitable donations. In my discussions with organisations such as the Peabody trust, William Sutton and the Guinness trust, satisfaction has been expressed. They feel that a significant part of their problems has been met.

The new right will apply to future developments. If a tenant agrees, a landlord can offer an alternative property from his stock to buy. That would also be at a discount. It would be funded by a purchase grant. If it is not possible for the landlord to offer an alternative home—for example, no alternative is available or it would be unacceptable for the landlord to move somebody else on so as to provide alternative accommodation—the circumstances are clearly different.

We are trying to provide a new right to enable tenants to buy their own homes. We must hesitate before we say that the right should be diluted by the power to exclude properties for good management reasons. Once the Bill is enacted, I shall monitor what ensues. We have had sensible discussions with the housing associations and I think that we have met the bulk of their concerns. As I have said, I want to see how the rural exemption develops. If I felt that something was not working, I would seek to put it right. I shall monitor the right-to-buy scheme. If I feel that problems are arising which had not been anticipated, or on a scale that had not been anticipated, I shall not hesitate, in consultation with housing associations, to seek a way to put things right. I want the scheme to be recognised as a practical one. I also want to open up a housing opportunity.

I accept what has been said about mixed development. I think that there is a consensus in the Chamber. We want to get away from the idea of estates comprising nothing but local authority properties, or housing association properties, especially where perhaps the most economically active or competent people move out to seek homes elsewhere. We want to try to find a way for people of different backgrounds and competences to stay in the housing that is provided and help in the process of regenerating the estate.

Our scheme has the virtue of being sensibly flexible within the framework of something that is simple, easy to understand and does not lead to a great deal of undue complexity. The proposals put forward by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock), on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, would be extremely tortuous, involving endless consultation and reconsultation. My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) is concerned that we might undertake reviews after 10 years. The Liberals propose two-year reviews. That would cause a great deal of uncertainty. I would be doubtful about allowing local authorities to designate at will zones in which they felt that the right to buy should not apply. I think that we have the balance about right. I commend the Government's position to the House.

Mrs. Maddock: I cannot emphasise enough the importance of getting these matters right. The approach must not be unduly bureaucratic. Despite what the Minister says about my proposals, I consider that his proposals are fairly bureaucratic. As Liberal Democrats, we believe that local authorities should have the right to say what is happening in their areas. They know what is going on. The new clause sets out criteria that local authorities would have to follow. It does not constitute a free-for-all, as the Minister claimed.

I am surprised that the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) is not supporting the rights of local authorities. However, given the antics of some Labour-run local authorities, I have a little sympathy with his view that they should not be allowed to run away with their own powers.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Lady heard me say that the reason for not leaving these matters to local discretion is to avoid discrepancies between areas, with individuals feeling aggrieved that on one side of the boundary the right exists while on the other side it does not. The Opposition's approach has nothing to do with the performance of individual local authorities, whether they be Tory, Liberal Democrat or Labour. We want there to be a standard and understandable national system.

5.15 pm

Mrs. Maddock: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but there are differences between one area and another. Right hon. and hon. Members have explained how and why areas differ. The new clause would allow differences to be taken into account. Westmorland and Southwark are clearly not the same. The whole point of having local government is that local authorities know what is going on in their areas.

There are many views coming into the House from those who are involved in the provision of low-cost, affordable housing. They are still concerned. The Minister has not responded to all the problems. I remind him what the National Federation of Housing Associations has said. I am sure that it sent him its briefing, as it sent it to me and many other right hon. and hon. Members. The federation is concerned that the Government will fail to meet their objectives unless they provide more adequate exemptions from the right-to-buy proposals that are contained in the Bill. We know that consultation is taking place. The federation believes that if the Government do not provide more adequate exemptions the affordable housing that they want to see created will be sold off. It is unsatisfactory for the Minister to hide behind the fact that the right will apply not to present properties and present conditions but to those of the future. We should be establishing communities that are sustainable. There is every danger that we shall take a step backwards after making some good moves forwards.

The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale quoted from the three questions posed by the Country Landowners Association. He did not mention what it would like the Minister to do, which is to provide greater certainty. It wrote:

"There would be greater certainty if the Bill (a) provided for a once and for all exemption for schemes in existence at Royal Assent, or the date of planning permission for subsequent developments, and (b) extended the definition of rural areas to cover special situations where the exercise of a Right to Buy would harm the interests of future generations."

That view is shared by many of us.

Earlier I referred to the response of Purbeck district council, which is in Dorset. Representatives of the authority have seen the Minister. They tried to bring home to him the findings of the Department's research into the classification of rural housing markets in England. It has been found that constraints on land supply, rather than the nature of demand, in many areas are the main influence on the level of local housing opportunities. We have been trying to get that through to the Minister this afternoon. The more constraints there are on development land—the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) talked about this—the higher the price. That limits opportunities for new affordable housing.

In addition, opportunities to replace housing through the purchase of existing satisfactory housing rest on affordable prices in a given area. The Minister has said that housing associations and other social landlords will be able to buy other properties in other areas. However, those properties may not be in the areas where people work or in areas that people can get to easily. The Minister's proposal works against the idea of having housing and planning policies that are in the interests of sustainability and protecting the environment. In places such as the Lake district and Purbeck, planning is affected by the existence of sites of special scientific interest, coastal heritage sites and world heritage sites. They affect planning policy and make it difficult to replace units of housing in the same area.

The final paragraph of the letter from Purbeck council says:

"Housing and Environmental Services Committee when discussing the Consultation Paper wished to stress that the views expressed . . . are supported across the whole political spectrum of this Council."

There is no overall control on the council. However, all the councillors agreed that they wanted the Minister to try to do something about the problems that they believed would arise if his proposals went ahead.

It is not good enough for the Minister to hide behind arguments about the housing association grant, the argument that properties with existing agreements will not be brought into the right to buy or the argument that the money will be recycled. There is evidence from the National Federation of Housing Associations that in some cases, only 50 per cent. of the money will be able to be used again. It is likely that we shall not be able to provide new properties in the area in which existing properties have been sold, and that will be detrimental to future developments.

Unless we support some of the amendments in the group, we shall be responsible for allowing the undoing of much of the good work that has been done by developers, by those who have sold land at low prices and by those of us who believe that our housing and planning policies should be about sustainability and about supporting mixed communities. The Minister talked eloquently about why we need to have mixed communities. If that is his belief, he should look favourably on what I, the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) and some Conservative Members have said. We have the opportunity tonight to push the Minister further when we go into the Lobbies.

It is obvious from the debate that the new clause is unlikely to succeed. In view of that, I will support amendment No. 10 on which there will, I hope, be a vote later tonight and I will not press the new clause to a Division.

Question put and negatived.

New clause 22

DEMOCRATISATION OF SOCIAL HOUSING MANAGEMENT

'. The Corporation shall ensure that every registered social landlord at all times guarantees—

(a) the maximum democratisation of the management of the landlord's property required by the tenants, and—

(b) that a democratic and accountable structure of the management of the landlord's property shall at all times exist at least at the level of the local housing authority in which the property is based.'.—[Mr. Simon Hughes.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following: New clause 23—Complaints and appeals—

'. The Corporation shall ensure that every registered social landlord at all times has a satisfactory and nationally recognised—

(a) complaints procedure, and

(b) independent procedure for appeals against decisions made by the registered social landlord.'.

Government amendment No. 29.

Mr. Hughes: The new clause follows the tenor of the previous debate, of which I heard part. I entirely endorse all the arguments put by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock). We want to ensure that housing policy reflects, first, the views of the users—the people who are in housing or who need housing—and, secondly, the needs of our different communities. The two new clauses specifically concern social housing management.

I declare an interest as a founder member, and member, of the management committee of a small housing association in my constituency—the Bermondsey and Rotherhithe housing association. I also have a constituency interest in the subject. The House of Commons Library has produced a report, from census returns, that shows the amount of housing that is entirely bought or owner-occupied by virtue of a mortgage and the amount that is social housing or local authority housing.

[Mr. Hughes]

My constituency, under its new boundaries—that is the way in which the census returns were carried out—is one of the top 10 authorities in England and Wales in terms of social housing, with a figure of 11.6 per cent. It is surrounded by many constituencies that are in the top 25. The issue we are discussing strongly—although not, of course, exclusively—affects London tenants because, in the top 25, come the new constituencies of Regent's Park and Kensington, North; Cities of London and Westminster—the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) is in his place—Holborn and St. Pancras; my neighbouring seat of Vauxhall; Islington, North; Hackney, North and Stoke Newington; Hackney, South and Shoreditch; Ealing Acton and Shepherd's Bush; Camberwell and Peckham, which is to the south of my constituency and is in the borough of Southwark; Hammersmith and Fulham; Battersea; Brent, East; Islington, South and Finsbury; and Bethnal Green and Bow. There is a huge concentration of social housing and housing association housing in London. The way in which it is managed matters greatly to our constituents.

The converse is that we have—and, for economic reasons, are bound to have for the foreseeable future—one of the lowest rates of owner-occupied housing. My constituency has the lowest rate of owner-occupied housing in England and Wales—18.4 per cent.—either by means of a mortgage or fully bought. The next lowest figure is in the new Camberwell and Peckham constituency, which is next to my constituency and also in the borough of Southwark. Many of the 25 constituencies that have the least owner-occupied housing are in London.

My constituency has the lowest number of properties that are owned outright in England and Wales—just 2.5 per cent. Social housing and council housing are, and will continue to be, the principal forms of occupancy in areas such as mine.

For half their period in office, the Government said, in effect, "We are not interested in providing any new general council housing at all. We will permit councils to build an absolute minimum of housing and then only for special needs." For a period, the Government said, "We believe that social housing should be provided by housing associations." That was the tenor of debates in the 1980s.

I remember when that period came to an end. The present Secretary of State was Minister of State and there was a debate not long before the public expenditure announcement—that was three or four years ago. One Conservative Back Bencher after another said, "We do not like all this social housing because all our communities are disrupted and it is planted on us." As a result, in the following public expenditure statement, having cut the council housing budget, the Government cut the social housing budget as well. However, it is still, in theory, Government policy that, if we provide social housing, we should provide it through housing associations rather than through local authorities.

Whatever my complaints may be about local authority management—I have many complaints about Southwark's management of its housing stock, the largest in London, which is often very poor—at least local authority housing is democratically managed. Every four years, people vote for those who will run the council and the local authority has neighbourhood committees and neighbourhood forums. Tenants' representatives go to a central housing forum, they express their views and they are consulted on council policy. The council may not take the blindest bit of notice of what the tenants say and the tenants may get frustrated, but the process has often changed what happens for the better. In my experience, the idea of democratic accountability in social housing is still in its early infancy. I do not think that that is good enough, and my constituents who are tenants in housing association properties agree.

Some housing management associations, such as Peabody, are based in my constituency. It tries to do a good job, and it is certainly not the worst offender, but many others need a kick up the backside and to be told that they must become democratic bodies. I would go further than the Government would ever go in democratising social housing, but we must be careful not to create a two-tier, self-perpetuating management structure. I serve on a management committee, and plead guilty to playing my part in the system, but we must be careful that social housing is not managed by people who, effectively, appoint themselves. All those involved come up for rotating elections which—unless we are careful—can result in the same people being re-elected for another four years. When someone dies or retires, provision for tenant representation may be introduced, but that can be pretty thin.

The situation is worse in large housing associations. I cannot recall the relative positions in the league table, according to the number of properties that each owns, of social housing landlords. Some landlords—such as North British—have about 28,000 properties, while those at the bottom of the league have perhaps a dozen. Many now have bigger stocks than most local authorities. My local authority has 56,000 properties, which is the largest stock in London. There are few larger housing stocks in England—Birmingham, Liverpool and Manchester may provide examples.

5.30 pm

Many social housing landlords have expanded. For example, the South London Family housing association was a small association that moved from one borough to another, although its focus has remained in south London. Many similar associations can now be found all over the country. I am proposing the new clause with the utmost sincerity because I believe that something is rotten in the state of housing association democratic management, and I speak with more than 13 years' constituency experience of dealing with the issue.

I have not sought to be a technical purist about the way in which the new clause is drafted. That was not my intention. I did not serve on the Committee, but I have read some of the debates. I do not claim to have read every word—that would not be believed—but I have read the key parts. The Government amendment in this group shows that they have conceded some of the points made in Committee and in and out of the House. I want to see whether we can push the Minister to go further.

The Minister may say that we must not be over-prescriptive in the Bill and that there are many things that the Government can do by secondary or delegated powers. We are discussing the part of the Bill that says that the Housing Corporation "may issue guidance". That is a good wheeze by the Government—they delegate the guidance to someone else to issue, or do so themselves. I want to know whether the Housing Corporation will provide adequate guidance and—more important—whether that is mandatory. I understand how the Housing Corporation works. We must have a procedure that has teeth. We do not want a procedure that takes so long to implement, and which involves so much negotiation, that it becomes nothing that housing associations need be afraid of.

I have included the word "guarantees" in the new clause for a reason. I should like the law to state that the Housing Corporation

"shall ensure that every registered social landlord at all times guarantees—

(a) the maximum democratisation of the management of the landlord's property required by the tenants."

It is not for me to say what tenants should have, but if they want to be consulted and to have an input on the allocations policy and the next type of property to be built, they should be able to do so.

I went to a meeting the other day called by the community worker for Hyde housing association—one of six associations developing the old Bricklayer's Arms goods yard, one end of which is outside my home in Bermondsey. We were discussing community facilities and youth facilities on the estate. At the meeting, the woman worker handed around a document inviting tenants to take part in a consultative structure for tenants. It looked as enticing as running from here to John O'Groats on the worst day of the year. The document had been duplicated, contained no detailed thought and did not look as if those involved were keen to receive a response—but it was an effort to provide some form of tenant participation.

A lot of effort has been made to try to interest people on the estate in community action. It is hard work. We must require housing associations to have structures that allow tenants to have their say. As in every form of democratic management—whether it be Parliament or housing associations—the fact that some people do not want to have their say is not a reason for preventing the rest from doing so. A third of the British electorate and half of the American electorate do not vote in general elections, but that does not mean that we should not have elections. If 10 per cent. of people participate, that is 10 per cent. more than in many places at the moment.

If housing associations are given more responsibility, they will continue in that way—whatever my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and I may want—for the next few years. It is not possible to turn the housing policy of Britain around in two seconds.

Mr. Raynsford: We can try.

Mr. Simon Hughes: It does not take two seconds—it takes a Parliament at least. If the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) were responsible for the matter, he would find that out. The policy can be changed over five years, and I would expect the policy to be aimed in a radically different direction within that time under a new Government. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and I will end up on the winning side of the argument, probably in collaboration with others. Whereas in the past the majority of social housing has been council property, housing associations are now an equally large player. There is no reason why associations should not have the same sort of democratic accountability as councils.

Many people who become tenants of housing associations do not positively elect to become such tenants—they are nominated by the local authority from the waiting list. They do not opt into something they think will have less management because that is what they want—they simply want a home—but once they are in their home, they want to have a say in how it is run.

I have been a private tenant. It was a frustrating experience because I had a remote landlord who operated through a managing agent. To get anything done was a nightmare. That was neither the worst managing agent nor the worst landlord by any means. All people in social housing ought to be treated alike in terms of opportunities to influence what goes on.

Another issue is the level at which accountability should be based. I have tried to be fairly precise. The new clause says:

"a democratic and accountable structure of the management of the landlord's property shall at all times exist at least at the level of the local housing authority in which the property is based."

I shall give the example that I cited earlier. One of the large players in the social housing market in my constituency is the South London Family housing association. London and Quadrant is another. The offices of the South London Family housing association are on the other side of Crystal Palace, over the top of the hill. They are not in Southwark. When I had occasion, with one of my councillor colleagues from Surrey docks, to argue the case of a shared-ownership occupant who faced repossession, we had to go to Crystal Palace to see the director of the housing association. That was fine for me—I have a vehicle and I could organise it—but it would not have been fine for a single parent with two children who relied on public transport or for a family out of work who would have had to hike around south London.

The management must be at least in the borough or district where the housing is—and I really mean management, not a letter box. Nor do I mean an office at which the housing officer is in attendance once a week. Even if the housing association has only 20 properties in Southwark, Lewisham or Greenwich—or in any other district, such as Hereford, Christchurch, North Devon or Huntingdon—people should not have to go outside the borough boundaries to get to the forum in which they can talk with other tenants about what is going on. That is the issue.

You will know perfectly well from your city, Madam Deputy Speaker, that even if the offices are within the city boundary, they may still be a long way away. They could be half an hour or an hour's journey each way. In rural areas, it could be a real hike. There should be access to management within each local authority area. Some districts are small, but the boroughs in metropolitan England and London and the Welsh unitary authorities are very big. They should be the minimum management areas, although I hope that it will be possible to go further. I hope that the Minister can be encouraging about that.

New clause 23 makes two points, one of which the Government have to a certain extent accepted in their amendment. I am grateful for that. The Government have argued—I have supported them—that there should be national and independently recognisable standards; people should be able to complain about public authorities, have their complaints dealt with and have their cases adjudicated independently. Amendment No. 29 would require the Housing Corporation to bring forward

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

"the procedures to be adopted to deal with complaints by tenants against a landlord" that are nationally recognised. It is important that tenants should know the procedures.

It has been argued that people may end up in a place where they did not intend to be. They should not be disadvantaged when they complain about where they end up. We must have a citizens charter-type standard for tenants' right to complain, whether the complaint is about delays in repairs or about a housing officer not doing his job properly—although I do not say that that is a regular occurrence. The tenant must know that the complaints procedure will work.

The Government have not responded to the second point made in new clause 23. I have tabled another amendment, which relates to local authority housing. Social landlords and local authorities can take categorical and definitive decisions which can have fairly conclusive effects on people's lives. A few weeks ago, I went with a councillor colleague to see a housing association director about some constituents of mine. They were a young couple with a youngster and they could not keep up the payments on a shared ownership property—part buy, part rent. If they managed to pay the rent, the building society threatened repossession and if they managed to pay the mortgage the housing association pressed them for the rent. The husband had lost his job, so the expected income had not been sustained.

5.45 pm

There came a time when the housing association told the couple that they had to go. That was understandable. Before people get into costly litigation, sometimes without legal aid—although not in this case—there must be a chance for someone to ask whether the decision was justified and reasonable. That should happen independent of the landlord. There is a strong case, which applies equally to local authorities, for saying that the person who makes the decision should not be the person to whom the appeal is made.

One of the most frequent complaints—it is made more strongly about councils than about social landlords—is that, when people appeal against a decision, they have to appeal to the same officers who made the original decision. People do not feel that their appeal has been properly heard. They may be offered a property that is not suitable for them. The two most obvious complaints are made to me every week at my surgery. For 13 years, at no surgery have I not had those complaints. Goodness knows how many surgeries that is, but it is an enormous amount.

One complaint is, "I have been offered a property and it is not in a fit state for me to move into. It needs work done so I have turned it down and I have been told that that is an unreasonable refusal. I have appealed, but it has gone to an internal committee and the decision has been upheld."

The other complaint is related to personal circumstances. Someone may say, "It is a lovely flat, but it is six miles away from where my children have just settled in primary school." Someone else may say, "It is a lovely flat, but I am a carer for my mother-in-law and she lives half a mile from where I now live and she would be two or three bus journeys away from where I am being offered a place." Someone else may say, "It is a lovely flat, but it is round the corner from my ex-husband, against whom I had an order when the marriage was coming to an end." The Minister knows that such real issues arise.

What may be a subjective view may not be upheld by the landlord. The landlord has the job of letting the property. The appeal may not go to the allocations officer, but to the manager, the deputy manager or even to a few people. Even so, it does not look fair and people do not believe that it is fair. Appeals have to be heard by someone outside the management. Independent appeals procedures exist for everything else, including police complaints, insurance, banking and the ombudsman service. On behalf of hundreds, probably thousands, of past, present and prospective tenants in my constituency alone and, I am sure, in every other constituency in England and Wales, I am asking for an independent procedure for appeals against decisions made by the registered social landlord.

It follows from what I have said that the amendment in the name of the Secretary of State is welcome. I shall support it, as will my hon. Friends. It meets part of new clause 23, but not the other part. I hope that I shall receive a sympathetic response to both new clause 22 and new clause 23 and that the Minister will see fit to give tenants the democratic rights that some of them may want and many do not have. I hope that he will give the Housing Corporation, the housing associations and all registered social landlords a kick up the backside in the direction of democracy and make sure that we have an independent complaints and appeals procedure.

Mr. Curry: Amendment No. 29 gives effect to the commitment given in Committee to broaden the list of topics on which the Housing Corporation may issue guidance to tenants of registered social landlords. The amendment will enable guidance to be issued on the services that may be provided to tenants and in relation to the landlord complaints procedures.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has pointed out that his constituency is dominated by council housing, not by social housing, and that problems occur in his constituency that may not occur with quite the same intensity elsewhere. The hon. Gentleman wished to draw the attention of hon. Members to the problems that arise in an area that has those characteristics—and he has done us a service in doing so. The Government are concerned—as is the hon. Gentleman—that there should be effective consultation within the context of effective management.

There is nothing worse than a local authority that does not carry out the necessary management tasks effectively—such as filling in the voids, ensuring that there is a proper turnover of social housing and responding to complaints about what happens on the estates. No doubt the hon. Gentleman followed the debates about anti-social tenants and the problems that arise on estates. As we will discuss tomorrow, this has become one of the prime concerns of social landlords.

New clause 22 seeks to establish in statute the guarantee that every registered landlord has a framework in place whereby all decisions affecting the management of the landlord properties reflect the views and the wishes of the tenants. It also requires that accountability structures be introduced at the same level as the local authority in whose area the homes are based. I have some difficulty with the wording of the new clause, and the hon. Gentleman has said that he would not go to the stake over the wording.

The concept is open to several interpretations, which indicates that it is a difficult one with which to grapple. However, we must pin it down to some form of legislative language—we have no choice. One of the things that united the Committee was the feeling that lawyers should not be given unnecessary work—and even my hon. Friends who are lawyers subscribed to that view, no doubt out of solidarity. I would not wish to go down a course that is too complicated.

I share a lot of the sentiment that is behind the proposal. Tenants have an important part to play in the management of their homes. However, the degree to which they will want to get involved will vary—some people wish to be consulted rather than to be involved in the day-to-day management; it is a question of different habits and traditions. To some degree, it is a reflection of the sorts of problems that emerge and the size of the estate.

We have supported this concept and we have tried to take it forward for many years. Tenants should be able to make their views known and ensure that they are reflected in the decisions that affect their properties. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey recognised, there are many ways in which this can be achieved. We cannot draw up a blueprint because arrangements will need to reflect local and wider circumstances. The Housing Corporation is committed to tenant participation, and I have emphasised that matter in my meetings with it.

The tenants' guarantee requires registered social landlords to keep tenants fully informed on all aspects of the management of their homes. It also requires landlords to seek the views of tenants and to give them the fullest consideration when taking decisions on the management of their homes. Landlords have been actively encouraged to establish forums through which tenants can express their views and can comment on housing management policies and practices.

Many landlords have gone further than that and they have appointed tenants to their management committees, which has been welcomed. Tenants have an opportunity to influence decisions. They are represented on the boards of all large-scale voluntary transfer associations and I am sure that the new local housing companies will wish to follow that practice. Tenants are an important group whose requirements need to be recognised and whose views must be taken into account.

Hon. Members on the Committee who went through the tergivisations of the funding of housing associations will know that they are not the only interest group. The funders, be they private or public, need to be satisfied that their investment is being protected. The wider local community and prospective tenants also have an interest to ensure that their needs are protected. Given these wide-ranging interests, it is important that no single group should be in the majority in the management of registered social landlord stock. The hon. Gentleman is not pushing in that direction—he is concerned about the general experience of consultation.

The clause talks about the maximum democratisation of the management. As I have said, it would be difficult to enshrine this in legislation. The important point is that tenants should be encouraged and able to see that their views are taken into account when decisions are taken. One way of doing this is by enabling them to have a positive input to local management decisions, and the arrangements that we are encouraging will do that.

The second part of the clause calls for a democratic and an accountable structure—at least at the level of the local authority in whose area the property is based. This is open to a number of interpretations. If it means that registered social landlords should have tenant consultation schemes equivalent to local authorities, it assumes that all local authorities have such schemes in the first place. Some local authorities may have such schemes—and they may provide a framework to follow—but other local authorities may not. There are still a number of local authorities with a poor track record in this regard.

If that means that the management arrangement should be tailored to fit local authority areas, it would be difficult for housing associations whose stock straddles local authority boundaries. The hon. Gentleman referred to the Peabody Trust which, as it is one of the largest housing associations, would experience precisely that circumstance.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I referred to the fact that the Peabody Trust and other housing associations straddle many boroughs. Therefore, it is unfair and unrealistic to expect people to participate with people who have no commonality of interest, other than the fact that they have the same landlord. It would be the same as asking people who are Barratt's homes purchasers, but at the opposite end of the kingdom, to be in the same group. It is about having people in a sense of community, where the landlord is the same and where they are within a boundary that they understand and recognise.

Mr. Curry: I recognise the point that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is making. As he would acknowledge, it is a difficult concept to enshrine in legislation. I am quite willing to draw the attention of the Housing Corporation to the need to get a level of consultation that reflects a commonality of interests—a focus on things that matter to a group of people and that is not dissipated by being so general that it loses any practical purpose and becomes a token institutionalised process rather than something that means something.

The question of accountability for a registered social landlord is a different concept from that for a local authority—the hon. Gentleman will accept that point because he is widely experienced in this field. The management needs to be accountable, it needs to listen to the different interest groups to find out their views and it needs to explain the reasons behind its decisions. It also has to consider all the interest groups.

While I agree with the sentiments in the amendment—and I am grateful that we have narrowed down the purpose behind it—I find it difficult to accept that the concept should be put into law in this way. If the hon. Gentleman does not persist with the amendment, I shall undertake to discuss with the Housing Corporation how it can try to incorporate his message in the discussions it has with the housing associations.

[Mr. Curry]

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister happen to have on him, or could he lay his hands on, figures that show the percentage of associations that have the forms of consultation to which he referred—such as tenants on their management committees or regular constitutional forums that tenants attend? If the Minister does not have that information to hand, will he acquire it and let us have it in due course?

Mr. Curry: I do not have that information on me, but I shall do my best to acquire it and let the hon. Gentleman have it in due course.

I believe that new clause 23 is unnecessary. Under the tenants guarantee—which was issued under section 36A of the Housing Associations Act 1985—the corporation already requires landlords to operate and publicise fair and accessible complaints procedures for tenants and applicants. Procedures are also in place to provide for appeals to the landlord committee of management or a group of members not involved in the complaint.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about wishing to have some completely independent recourse, and that is why we will provide in the Bill for complainants to have access to a statutory independent housing ombudsman. We are filling a deficit. It is a final recourse that will be utterly independent and beyond reproach. It is therefore sensible to try to get the complaints dealt with independently and in-house, and to provide for there to be a further appeal beyond that if it does not work. I suggest that, in those circumstances, the hon. Gentleman might not have to persist with his amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought that the Minister had finished his speech. Is that correct, or is he giving way?

Mr. Curry: If it would help the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, I am sure that I could construct a further sentence that would mean that I had given way.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful for the Minister's co-operation.

The one problem with the ombudsman procedure is that it might reasonably be expected to take so long that it was too late to influence the decision. Someone might complain about the allocation of a property, for instance, and by the time the ombudsman had ruled in that person's favour the property might have been allocated to someone else, making the complaint a lost cause. I hope that the Minister will reflect on that again.

6 pm

Mr. Curry: I will certainly do so, but the hon. Gentleman will know that we are currently reviewing the ombudsman's service to local authorities generally, and one aspect that we wish to consider is the time that it takes to obtain results for people. When we have established the arrangements, our priority will be to ensure a rapid service. The complaints that are raised in this context, being more specific, may be susceptible of more rapid treatment than the more general matters dealt with by the local authority ombudsman. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be content with that.

I commend the Government amendment, which fulfils the commitment given to the Standing Committee.

Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe (Bradford, South): The Minister always sounds plausible. He tells us eloquently that everything is all right, that we should not worry, that matters are developing in the way that we want and that everyone will be happy; but the Government are making a major change in their housing policy.

I should like more councils to be able to build social housing. I am a product of a council estate. The rent collector would come along and make sure that everything was fine, and if we had any problems we could tell him about them. Those who were not happy with his response could go to the tenants' association, which would consider the issues that had been raised; if that did not work, people could go to their local councillor. We had democratic accountability. The Government, however, are moving towards the private rented sector, and into realms into which the pendulum swings in favour of the private landlord and against the tenant. Tenants may well be fully informed of their rights, but will often be very fearful because of the time scale applying to some tenancies.

There is a difference between being informed and being involved. I am glad that we are having this debate, and I accept that the Government amendment deals with the position in some small respects, but tenants feel vulnerable none the less. No choice is involved in the move from local authorities to housing associations. They need to feel that they have the same rights as they would have if they had been with a local authority—the same ability to make their voices heard in regard to the development of their community.

Although there has been a move from local authorities to housing associations, there has been a cut in housing association grant. Because of that, some of the smaller associations have had to become part of the larger ones, and that has removed the point of accountability. As has been said, if people are to be involved, they must be close to the decision-making level. Democracy works only if it is meaningful and enables tenants to be involved.

I do not think that the parameters set by the Government will help private tenants, and I want stronger guarantees to ensure that they are involved. Many enlightened local authorities have devolved tenants' rights to estate offices and local tenants' associations, and are well versed in the development of policy to secure greater involvement; but we are now seeing a shift towards a body that has no such experience. Safeguards should be built into the legislation. We are talking not about increasing the regulation of private landlords, but about trying to create the environment that the Government say they want to create—an environment in which people are involved in democratic institutions, and taking responsibility for their lives in the neighbourhoods that they will inhabit. We have already observed the democratic deficit caused by the number of people who do not become involved in either local or general elections. How will a move to the private rented sector secure the greater involvement that we want?

The Government would not support what I consider to be the ideal solution. What is wrong with returning the main aspect of housing policy to local authorities, and enabling them to build more houses? There are more than 9,000 names on the waiting list in Bradford, and there is no guarantee that the private rented sector will meet that need, particularly through the Bill. I am not entirely satisfied that the Government's proposals meet the requirements in new clause 22. I do not think that tenants will be able to participate fully, although they can be involved to an extent. They will feel more isolated than they did before.

Mr. Raynsford: I broadly agree with the thrust of the argument of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who tabled new clauses 22 and 23. I do not agree with every point that he made, but he probably would not expect me to. He is right to highlight the case for increasing tenant involvement.

Let me correct an earlier omission by declaring an interest that appears in the Register of Members' Interests and which I declared at the beginning of the Committee stage. I am a consultant to HACAS, the social housing agency.

The case for increasing tenant involvement is obvious. It is based on justice—on the assumption that those occupying homes have every right to be consulted and involved in key decisions about how their homes are designed, built, maintained and managed. It is also based on efficiency, however. There is considerable evidence, developed over recent years by the many organisations that work with tenant groups, that active tenant participation can achieve a better-managed, more efficient performance in many areas—including some where there have been huge problems—than more traditional housing management structures. For those reasons, it is in everyone's interests for us to try to promote the case for more active tenant involvement and participation. We should give tenants more opportunities to participate to the degree that they wish in decisions affecting their homes. To that extent, I agree whole-heartedly with what the Minister said.

This is where I part company with the Minister. The Government have acted in a way that entirely contradicts those principles in rejecting, in Committee, an amendment that we tabled to make it clear that tenant-led organisations would not be debarred from being registered as social landlords under the new regime that the Bill would introduce. I find it extraordinary that the Government should take such a stance. There are a number of examples of tenant-led organisations that have been registered as social landlords, and have proved highly successful.

There is an obvious example north of the border. I am not one of those who believe that we can concentrate on a hermetically sealed part of the United Kingdom, and ignore what goes on elsewhere. I believe that there is a great deal of good practice in Scotland, from which we should seek to learn. The Glasgow housing co-ops are a fine example of such good practice: they are tenant-led, tenant-managed organisations that have taken over housing stock and are running it well. Closer to home, in the constituency represented by the right hon. Member for the City and Westminster—who was an assiduous member of the Committee—is the example of the Walterton and Elgin community housing project.

Mr. Brooke: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his felicitations, but that housing association is in the constituency of Westminster, North.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful for that correction. It is in the borough that the right hon. Gentleman represents. It took over the management of some 900 properties from Westminster city council. It is a successful tenant-led organisation.

Across the border in Kensington and Chelsea, the Government have recently given their blessing to the proposal to pass responsibility for housing management to a tenant management association covering that borough's housing stock. There are many other illustrations from all over London and the whole country. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey knows of the activities of several housing co-ops in south-east London with which he has been associated and with which I am associated. They are fine examples of tenant-led organisations doing an excellent job.

It is extraordinary that a Government who pay lip service to tenant participation should have voted down an amendment that said that nothing should prevent an organisation that is controlled by a majority of tenants from being registered as an approved social landlord. We do not say that every organisation must be so constituted, or even that that should be the norm, but that such bodies should eligible to be registered. Of course, the Housing Corporation will want to examine them to find whether they are efficiently run and properly constituted before deciding whether to register them, but they should not be ineligible for registration simply because they have a majority of tenants on their committees. That was the effect of the Government's vote against our amendment in Committee.

We were given several specious arguments. We were told that because new social landlords set up under the Bill would be predominantly bodies interested in taking over local authority housing, it would be inappropriate for them to be tenant-led. Walterton and Elgin community homes, which is tenant-led, took over Westminster city council's housing. There is no reason why others should not do the same.

We were told that there needed to be a balance of different interests on management committees. There was even a hint that tenants would not be able to take responsibility for all the finances. What nonsense; lenders would not lend money to organisations in which they did not have confidence. They would consider them closely to find whether they have proper business plans and sound managements in place. The Housing Corporation, the regulatory body, is also there to ensure that such bodies are properly run. There are lots of safeguards. The inference that tenant-led organisations cannot be trusted is unfortunate and we wholly repudiate it. It is wrong and a mistake. The Government have made a serious error of judgment in taking that line.

The Minister told the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey that he would discuss with the Housing Corporation ways in which good practice could be encouraged. The problem is that the Housing Corporation is constrained by the Government, who are refusing to let it register tenant-led bodies. On the one hand, the Minister offers consultation with the Housing Corporation to solve the problem, but, on the other, he is creating a problem by not allowing it to register tenant-led organisations.

[Mr. Raynsford]

Mr. Curry: When I suggested that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey was not focusing on tenant-led organisations, he nodded his agreement. He is more concerned about the consultation of tenants and their landlords in general and about local authorities in particular. In respect of the Housing Corporation, we would obviously want to consult the local authority associations.

6.15 pm

Mr. Raynsford: I take that point, but if the Minister articulates, as he did earlier to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, the view that there should be an option for tenants to participate to the degree that they choose and that they should be free to decide and not constrained within rigid patterns—that is my understanding of what he said—why is he not prepared to allow tenant-led organisations to be registered? We are not saying that that would become the norm or that it will happen very often, but where tenants wish it, have the ability and commitment to do so, and where lenders are happy to lend, why should not such bodies be eligible to be registered?

That is significantly inconsistent with other Government approaches. They gave council tenants the right to manage. If they believe that council tenants should have the right to manage—I have mentioned already the Kensington and Chelsea tenants who were enabled to take over the management of their council housing under this arrangement—why is it inconceivable that a tenant-led organisation should be able to own its homes? What is the distinction? The Government's position on the right to manage is profoundly suspect because while they support in theory a right to manage for council tenants, as we will point out tomorrow when we discuss leasehold, Ministers are seeking to take away the right to manage that we gave leaseholders in Committee.

Irrespective of whether tenants are in charge or in a majority on the committee, we need to increase their opportunities to play a role in the management of their homes and to influence the practices and policies of the organisations that provide their housing. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey mentioned housing associations in south-east London. He referred to some by name and I hope that he was not referring to them when he said that he thought that there were a lot of problems and that something was rotten in the management of some housing associations. My experience of those that he mentioned in south-east London—the London and Quadrant, Hyde, and South London Family housing associations—is that they are highly responsible, well-run organisations that are, in general, responsive. I do not claim that they get everything right; every big organisation makes mistakes. They are good examples of reputable organisations trying to do an excellent job. However, the key point is that they are getting large—some very large. It is important that they should always be thinking about ways of listening more carefully to the views and concerns of their tenants so that they keep in touch.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The rottenness is in the fact that in the sector that is growing most quickly, there are no guarantees of democratic representation. It is still a patrician system that depends on the housing association concerned deciding to do it. It is led from the top down rather than from the bottom up. That is why it is down to legislation and the policy of the Housing Corporation to set the rules with which, I am sure, housing associations would willingly comply.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful for that clarification. I am sure that it is his experience, as it has been mine, that the associations that he mentioned have been in many ways exemplary in their operation. They are getting larger and it is important that they should always be thinking of ways in which they can ensure that they remain responsive to their customers.

I received a splendid testimonial for Hyde housing association when I was visiting Southampton, which is some 70 miles from its headquarters in south-east London on the edge of my constituency. I got positive feedback about its work because it has an effective local committee and takes consulting and involving tenants locally seriously. There is no reason why size should be a bar to good tenant involvement. It is a question of good practice and it is important that we should encourage that. We should ensure that social housing agents of whatever size or sort are, wherever possible, reminded of the need to be as responsive as possible to the aspirations and hopes of their tenants.

The Minister briefly referred to Government amendment No. 29 as responding to concerns expressed in Committee. We raised in Committee the importance of the Housing Corporation giving good guidance to housing associations on the standard of housing management, not least in relation to tenants with special needs. We were talking especially of vulnerable tenants and those who are housed under the care in the community policy. We had quite a debate on the subject in Committee and the Minister agreed to take it away, think about it and come back to us. He has come back with an amendment that refers to management and services to tenants. I hope that he will confirm that those services will cover the whole range, including those necessary to help some of the most vulnerable tenants who require support and care, as well as simply a home over their head in the sense of the normal housing management service.

Mr. Curry: Yes.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful for that confirmation, which resolves the dilemma. I welcome the Government's response to our amendment and the Minister's confirmation that it will have as broad a remit as we intended.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister was helpful and conciliatory in what he said. I shall take him up on the more explicit offer that he made and ask him to talk matters through with the Housing Corporation. I will also pursue that route separately and, with the leave of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock),

I will come with her to talk through the ways in which we can make practical differences. The best way to proceed would be for the Minister to do what Ministers are always willing to do and keep the matter under review. Ministers are willing to do that because it is not normally a party problem as they are not in the same job at the end of the period to which they commit themselves.

The test is whether housing associations respond to the mood clearly expressed in all corners of the House. They must set standards that allow the maximum participation, the maximum good practice and the maximum belief on the part of the tenants that the system is, independently, in their interests and in their favour.

On that basis, I shall not put my new clauses to the vote, although I anticipate that the Minister will want to put his amendment to the vote, when I shall vote for it.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 2

ELIGIBILITY FOR REGISTRATION

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 60, in page 2, line 1, leave out

'does not trade for profit'

and insert

'is non–profit–making'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 61 and 62.

Mr. Curry: We now embark on a marathon of Government amendments that fulfil commitments made in Committee. I shall give the basic bones of what we propose.

Amendments Nos. 60 and 62 provide a clear definition of non-profit-making bodies for the purposes of eligibility for registration with the corporation. Amendment No. 61 is a minor drafting change.

Amendment No. 62 re-enacts the provisions in the Housing Associations Act 1985, which defines a body as non profit-making if it does not trade for profit, or its constitution or rules prohibit the issue of capital with interest or dividend exceeding the rate prescribed by the Treasury. The amendment was tabled to provide cover for any existing registered association that may have the power to pay interest or dividend at the rate prescribed by the Treasury. I am sure that the amendments will find favour with the House.

Mr. Raynsford: As the Minister said, the amendment responds to suggestions proposed in Committee. It confirms that organisations providing social housing should be non profit-making organisations.

We welcome the amendment and think it is appropriate. We are pleased that the Government have not proceeded with the ill-considered plans contained in their White Paper published last summer, allowing profit-making organisations to compete with housing associations and other social landlords for social housing grant—as we must come to know what was previously known as housing association grant. I shall not risk your wrath, Madam Deputy Speaker, by venturing my thoughts on those titles.

The key issue is that social housing should be provided by non-profit-making organisations. We have a wealth of good housing associations and other social landlords in this country, and others are likely to be created in future—hopefully, some of them will have active tenant involvement. There is no need to jumble up their role with that of the perfectly legitimate, but different, role of profit-making organisations, which should rightly provide what is known as privately rented housing.

We want to see more private investment in good-quality, private rented housing. It is not appropriate to confuse that with the provision of social housing, which should be undertaken by organisations that are clearly non-profit-making. The amendments make that clear—we strongly support them and trust that they are confirmation that the Government have finally abandoned their ill-conceived plans to extend social housing grant to profit-making bodies.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 61, in page 2, line 10, leave out 'the following' and insert

'those specified in subsection (3)'.

No. 62, in line 10, at end insert—

'( ) For the purposes of this section a body is non–profit–making if—

(a) it does not trade for profit, or

(b) its constitution or rules prohibit the issue of capital with interest or dividend exceeding the rate prescribed by the Treasury for the purposes of section 1(1)(b) of the Housing Associations Act 1985.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 63, in page 2, line 38, leave out from 'after' to end of line 40 and insert

'a disposal by the landlord to the tenants by way of sale or lease or on shared ownership terms;'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 64.

Mr. Curry: The amendments bring the permissible purposes of registered social landlords—a concept with which we became familiar in Committee—into line with the right-to-acquire provisions. They ensure that permissible purposes—which sound more exciting than they are—are consistent with the provisions elsewhere in the Bill.

We made it clear in Committee that we do not want to make significant further changes to the permissible purposes of registered social landlords. We would, however, be prepared to listen to well-defined and well-justified extensions that could be included in subsequent secondary legislation. We discussed what would happen if there were a launderette in a block of flats, and I said that we would take a sensible and pragmatic view on the subject. The amendment fulfils our commitment to do so.

Mr. Raynsford: We accept the spirit in which the Minister moved the amendment. We highlighted specific issues, such as the ability of registered social landlords to carry out ancillary operations that might be described as commercial—for example, a launderette or a charity shop. In his letter to me on the subject, the Minister said that he was content that those points were covered by the legislation. On that understanding, I am happy to support the amendments.

[Mr. Raynsford]

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 64, in page 2, line 41, leave out from beginning to end of line 43.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 3

REGISTRATION

Amendment made: No. 65, in page 3, line 17, leave out from 'registration' to end of line 20.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 4

REMOVAL FROM THE REGISTER

Amendments made: No. 66, in page 4, line 8, leave out from beginning to end of line 12.

No. 67, in line 12, at end insert—

'( ) Before removing a body from the register of social landlords under subsection (4) the Corporation shall consult the local authorities in whose area the body operates; and the Corporation shall also inform those authorities of its decision.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 5

APPEAL AGAINST DECISION ON REMOVAL

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 68, in page 4, line 22, after 'Corporation' insert

'—

(a) not to register it as a social landlord, or

(b)''.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 69 and 70.

Mr. Curry: Clause 5 permits an organisation to appeal to the High Court against a decision by the corporation to remove it or not to remove it from the register of social landlords. The amendments extend that right of appeal to cases in which an application for registration has been refused by the corporation.

Amendment No. 68 amends clause 5(1) to include the extended right of appeal.

Amendments Nos. 69 and 70 are technical: they amend subsections (2) and (3) of clause 5 respectively to ensure that their meaning is not inadvertently changed following the introduction of amendment No. 68.

Clause 5 provides a right to appeal to the High Court, where a registered social landlord is aggrieved at a decision to remove it, or refuse to remove it, from the register of social landlords. The amendments extend that right of appeal where an organisation is aggrieved at a decision not to include it on the register. The amendments reflect the commitment given in Committee.

6.30 pm

Mrs. Maddock: I support the Government's amendments, as they are identical, in all but phrasing, to those that I moved in Committee. I assure those hon. Members who were not present for the Committee's deliberations that we had very interesting and mostly amicable and sensible discussions. However, we never knew what the Government's response would be. The Minister often said that he agreed with us in principle, and that perhaps he would have the provisions in question rewritten. Occasionally, he shocked us—the first time it happened, I almost fell off my chair—and accepted an amendment as written.

The Minister agreed to consider these matters and to return to discuss them with hon. Members. I am very pleased that he has done so. The amendment gives a body that has been refused registration as a social landlord the right to appeal to the High Court. The Bill confers the same right on any body that is threatened with removal from the register. I am pleased that the Minister has introduced the measure, which has my whole-hearted support.

Mr. Curry: I merely wish to remark that the spectacle of the hon. Lady threatening to fall off her chair was so distressing that I sought to limit to the absolute minimum the number of future occasions upon which I would agree with her amendments, so as to ensure that she did not suffer any irreparable damage. As she has said, I undertook to consider the spirit of the amendments proposed in Committee and to reintroduce them in a form that was consistent with the phraseology and the purpose of the Bill. I hope that the group of amendments achieves that aim.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 69, in page 4, line 25, after 'brought' insert

'against a decision relating to the removal of a body from the register'.

No. 70, in page 4, line 28, after 'brought' insert

'against a decision relating to the removal of a body from the register'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Schedule 1

REGISTERED SOCIAL LANDLORDS: REGULATION

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 127, in page 111, line 41, after first 'of' insert 'remuneration or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 128.

Mr. Curry: Paragraphs 2 and 3 of schedule 1 govern the payment of benefits by a registered social landlord to its officers and employees. The amendments clarify the position for a registered social landlord to pay remuneration, including loss of earnings, to its committee members.

We are anxious to ensure that the quality of people who serve on the committees of housing associations and now of social registered landlords is high. We draw people from different walks of life with different expertise. In order to attract better qualified people with particular expertise, we must look at the possibility of their not being unduly penalised by their willingness to serve on committees of housing associations or of registered social landlords. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. Raynsford: This will not be a simple matter of my thanking the Minister for moving an amendment that we proposed in slightly different terms in Committee. The amendment raises a serious policy issue regarding the future of what was known traditionally as the voluntary housing movement. It was known by that name because housing associations were governed by voluntary committees comprising people who served unpaid. They believed in the activities of the organisation, in the same way as members of local authorities did, and believed that it was in the public interest to serve in that manner.

The Minister's comments imply that the amendment opens the door to the payment of remuneration—including, in his words, the reimbursement of expenses to such people. That is a major policy departure, and I do not believe that he should be presenting it as a small technical amendment at Report stage if he envisages a framework in which housing associations and social landlords will be empowered to pay remuneration to their committee members in future.

There has been considerable debate about the issue within the housing association movement in the past two years, when issues of governance were at the forefront of its deliberations. Although there were strong advocates of remuneration for members, there has been an overwhelming response from voluntary committee members all over the country who oppose the concept of payment. A number of people have spoken to me in extremely strong terms about how insulted they would feel if payment were introduced. They believe strongly in the voluntary principle: they give their time voluntarily out of a sense of public obligation.

We should not confuse such people with those who are appointed to quangos because they think that they can make a little bit on the side while helping the party. Many housing association committee members are particularly concerned about the measure, because they believe that it is part of an attempted "quangocratisation" of the housing association movement. The Minister will be well aware that the Nolan committee has examined housing associations, and they have every reason to believe that that sort of scrutiny is being applied to their activities. That is all the more reason for them to want to stick to the well-established principle that their work is undertaken voluntarily, for the public good and in the public interest.

The wording of amendment No. 127 is somewhat curious. It simply inserts the words "remuneration or" into a rather detailed schedule that spells out what can or cannot be paid to officers and other members of housing associations and of social landlords. As I said earlier, if it is a major new departure—which is what it appears to be—it should have been introduced at an earlier stage. It should have been discussed in Committee, and the Government should have spelt out why they were seeking to make that policy departure.

The Minister may say that the amendment is simply about compensating people for loss of earnings. However, he referred to remuneration, including compensation for loss of earnings. If that is so, he is presenting a serious policy change to the House. I think that we are owed a full explanation of why the Government have made that change. It is not in line with the views expressed by the majority of people in the housing association movement, and it certainly does not accord with the views of the National Federation of Housing Associations.

I am very surprised that the Minister has brought the measure before the House in this curious manner. I hope that he will explain it fully, and, hopefully, confirm that he does not intend to change the long-established and well respected policy of people serving as members of housing association committees in a voluntary, unpaid capacity.

Mrs. Maddock: I share some of the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford). I am surprised that we are considering the amendment in this context, when it is part of a much wider debate about how people are remunerated for their services.

I think that it is important that people are able to take part in the democratic process and in decisions regarding the distribution of public money whatever their means. That is a very broad issue, and the Government intend to deal with it in only five minutes in the context of the amendment. People receive no remuneration for being school governors, although council members sometimes receive payment. People who are members of health boards, working one day a week, receive £5,000 a year. We must examine that policy issue, but we should not necessarily do so today via the amendment.

I do not agree totally with the hon. Member for Greenwich that people should serve on housing associations in a voluntary, unpaid capacity. I am sure that there are people who serve on a voluntary basis and who lose financially as a result. If people are to participate in the democratic process and to make decisions about how public money is spent, they must have the freedom to do so whatever their means.

Although I do not agree totally with the hon. Gentleman, I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response. He has ventured into an area that is much wider than remuneration for those who volunteer to work for housing association committees.

Mr. Curry: I think that the hon. Member for Greenwich is making a meal out of a snack. The amendment has no sinister purpose: we are not trying to change the ethos of the housing association movement. I constantly meet housing association committee members. I recognise their valuable work, and the fact that they perform that work voluntarily. Such people come from all walks of life, and are of all political persuasions. I have met merchant bankers who are just as heavily involved as those who work in social services, the probation service or other community-based activities.

The amendment seeks simply to make it clear that housing associations would not be acting illegally if they were to make payments for certain purposes. The proposal to pay for loss of earnings came from the National Federation of Housing Associations, although we thought it sensible to extend that somewhat.

The amendment makes remuneration possible; it requires no obligation. It is not an encouragement to pay. I would not wish to do that. Like the hon. Member for Greenwich, I value the spirit of co-operation that animates the housing association movement. However, we are trying to encourage people who may not be earning major salaries to become involved. It is not the merchant bankers who will need remuneration, but those who earn relatively small sums of money and who may find it difficult to give up their time without being paid. The amendment seeks to ensure that people in those circumstances should not be discouraged from taking an active role in the housing association movement.

[Mr. Curry]

The amendment is discretionary, not obligatory. It intends no ethos change, but simply to ensure that certain actions by housing associations would not be illegal if they were necessary. It is not expected to change the modus operandi of a valuable movement that is based on voluntary service.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 128, in page 112, line 20, after first 'of' insert 'remuneration or'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 129, in page 121, line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 4 and insert—

'( ) Any such inquiry shall be conducted by one or more persons appointed by the Corporation.

( ) If one person is appointed he must be a person who is not a member or an employee of the Corporation and has not been such a member or employee within the previous five years; and if more than one person is appointed at least one of them must be such a person.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 130 to 133 and 74 to 76.

Mr. Curry: We now come to a more lengthy group of amendments, which none the less fulfils the obligation that I gave in Committee to reflect upon certain commitments.

Paragraphs (20) and (21) of schedule 1 enable the corporation to appoint a person to conduct an inquiry into the affairs of a registered social landlord or carry out such an inquiry. Amendment No. 129 amends paragraphs (20) and (21) to provide that the corporation cannot conduct the inquiry itself or appoint an employee to conduct it by himself. As I said in Committee, due to the curiosities of parliamentary draftsmanship, that could mean himself or herself. I would not wish the wording of the amendment to offend any feminist sentiment.

When the corporation appoints more than one person to conduct an inquiry, one person may be an employee or ex-employee of the corporation. Amendments Nos. 130 to 132 cover the arrangements to be followed when more than one person is appointed, particularly with regard to the provision of reports.

Amendment No. 133 extends the enforcement power covering requests for information under clause 30 to include the provision of information requested by a person conducting an inquiry.

Clause 29 gives the corporation power to serve a notice requiring a registered social landlord, or subsidiary, to provide information for any purpose connected with the discharge of its functions.

Amendments Nos. 74 and 76 are technical amendments, which are necessary to ensure that the corporation, or the person conducting an inquiry on its behalf, can obtain information or documents.

Amendment No. 75, which replaces clause 29(5), seeks to clarify the limits in the powers of the corporation to obtain information held by solicitors and bankers of registered social landlords.

In a nutshell, paragraphs (20) and (21) of schedule 1 currently enable the corporation to conduct an inquiry into a registered social landlord. In Committee, I agreed to introduce an amendment requiring the corporation to appoint at least one person who was not one of its own employees. Amendments Nos. 129 to 132 honour that commitment, and make some consequential changes to their powers.

Amendment No. 133 extends the enforcement power when someone resists a request for information, under clause 30, to cover requests by a person conducting an inquiry, to ensure that they can obtain information and documents relating to the inquiry.

Mr. Raynsford: As the Minister said, the amendments honour commitments given in Committee. In Committee, we moved an amendment to provide that the Housing Corporation

"shall appoint one or more persons to conduct the inquiry."

At the time, the Minister found it impossible to accept our wording. I notice that he has moved an amendment worded as follows:

"Any such inquiry shall be conducted by one or more persons appointed by the Corporation."

Clearly, his officials and the Clerks have had an immensely complicated time reversing the sequence of that wording to justify the Minister's claim that our wording was typically untidy.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman will know that the music and cadence of the clause also matter. He struck a lumpy note in Committee, and we have tried to turn it into something more melodious.

6.45 pm

Mr. Raynsford: I shall not challenge the Minister by testing his knowledge of the skills of inversion in musical composition. We are pleased that the principle in the amendment has now found its way on to the Bill. It will ensure that the person appointed by the Housing Corporation to carry out an inquiry will be independent, and that, if any such inquiry involves more than one person, at least one will be independent. We are pleased that the Government have accepted that important principle, and we welcome the amendment.

Mr. Brooke: In support of my hon. Friend the Minister I remind the House of the occasion when Sir Edward Marsh—Eddie Marsh—said to Winston Churchill, to whom he was private secretary, "We know that Shelley was a great poet because, whereas an ordinary poet would have written 'And roses wild and ivy serpentine', he wrote 'And wild roses, and ivy serpentine,'" to which Winston replied, "And I suppose he would have been the greatest poet of all time if he had written, 'And wild roses and serpentine ivy'."

Mr. Curry: There is something worse. The second line of "Hail to thee, blithe Spirit!

Bird thou never wert," seems to me to strike the lowest point in English poetry.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 130, in page 121, line 13, at end insert—

'( ) Where the inquiry is conducted by more than one appointed person, then, if they do not agree on any matter relating to the conduct of the inquiry, including whether the inquiry should be extended, the view of the majority shall prevail; but they may each make interim reports, and shall each make a final report, and may do so jointly or separately.'.

No. 131, in page 121, line 16, after first 'inquiry' insert

'(or, if more than one person is so appointed, each of those persons)'.

No. 132, in page 121, line 19, leave out 'the appointed person, he' and insert

'any person, the person to whom they are produced'.

No. 133, in page 121, line 21, leave out from beginning to end of line 24 and insert—

'( ) Section 30 (enforcement of notice to provide information, &c.) applies in relation to a notice given under this paragraph by an appointed person as it applies in relation to a notice given under section 29 by the Corporation.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 8

CONSENT REQUIRED FOR DISPOSAL OF LAND BY REGISTERED SOCIAL LANDLORD

Amendment made: No. 71, in page 5, line 25, at end insert—

'( ) Before giving any consent other than a consent in relation to a particular landlord or particular land, the Corporation shall consult such bodies representative of registered social landlords as it thinks fit.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 9

LETTINGS AND OTHER DISPOSALS NOT REQUIRING CONSENT OF CORPORATION

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 72, in page 6, line 5, after '8' insert ', or paragraph 12(1)(h),'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 73, 85 and 86.

Mr. Curry: Amendments Nos. 72, 73, 85 and 86 are technical amendments that correct minor omissions from the original Bill. Amendment No. 72 extends the range of lettings and other disposals not requiring corporation consent as listed in clause 9 by including tenancies granted to tenants of fully mutual co-ops.

Amendment No. 73 to clause 12 deals with disposals of registered social landlords' properties that are made under a consent in clause 8. It re-enacts schedule 2(3) of the Housing Associations Act 1985 and provides that, where a property is sold in national parks and areas of outstanding natural beauty, the association may include a covenant limiting the freedom of a purchaser to dispose of it, typically restricting sale to someone who has lived in the area for at least three years.

Amendment No. 73, which is required to ensure consistency with schedule 3 of the Housing Associations Act 1985, clarifies that the provision applies to voluntary sales made under clause 8. Sales under statutory schemes such as the existing right to buy as well as the new purchase grant scheme are subject to separate statutory arrangements in relation to rural areas.

Amendments Nos. 85 and 86 amend clauses 61 and 62 respectively to add a necessary definition of local authority as used in part I of the Bill.

Amendments Nos. 72, 73, 85 and 86 are technical and correct minor omissions, and amendment No. 72 extends the range of lettings and other disposals not requiring corporation consent as listed in clause 9, by including tenancies granted to tenants of fully mutual co-operatives. Amendment No. 73 clarifies that the provisions relating to restrictions on onward sales in clause 12 apply to voluntary disposals under clause 7. Both clauses re-enact existing provisions in the Housing Associations Act 1985. Amendment No. 85 adds the term "local authority" to the list in clause 61 of minor definitions used in part I. Those matters are so important that they bore some repetition.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 12

RESTRICTION ON DISPOSAL OF HOUSES IN NATIONALS PARKS, &C.

Amendment made: No. 73, in page 8, line 9, after 'landlord' insert

', in accordance with a consent given by the Corporation under section 8,'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 16

RIGHTS OF TENANT TO ACQUIRE DWELLING: SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS

Amendment proposed: No. 10, in page 11, line 2, at end insert—

'(c) designate dwellings or descriptions of dwellings subject to a planning obligation under section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 created in pursuance of the affordable housing policy in a local authority's local plan, to which the right conferred by that section does not arise.'.—[Mr. Raynsford.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 223, Noes 274.

Division No. 112] [18.50 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Ms Janet (Ros'dale)
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Austin-Walker, John
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart
Bennett, Andrew F
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blair, Rt Hon Tony
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burden, Richard
Byers, Stephen
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cann, Jamie
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Judith
Clapham, Michael

Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cohen, Harry
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Jean
Cox, Tom
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Chris (L'Boro & S'worth)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge H'l)
Denham, John
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Dowd, Jim
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Etherington, Bill
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foulkes, George
Fraser, John
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Garrett, John
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godsiff, Roger
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harvey, Nick
Henderson, Doug
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Hoon, Geoffrey
Howarth, Alan (Strat'rd-on-A)
Howarth, George (Knowsley North)
Howells, Dr Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hutton, John
Ingram, Adam
Jackson, Helen (Shef'ld, H)
Jamieson, David
Janner, Greville
Jenkins, Brian (SE Staff)
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Khabra, Piara S
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kirkwood, Archy
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loyden, Eddie
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAvoy, Thomas
Macdonald, Calum
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McMaster, Gordon
MacShane, Denis
Madden, Max
Maddock, Diana
Mahon, Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Martin, Michael J (Springburn)
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll & Bute)
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Mike (N W'kshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
O'Neill, Martin
Parry, Robert
Pearson, Ian
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Pope, Greg
Powell, Ray (Ogmore)
Prentice, Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Raynsford, Nick
Reid, Dr John
Rendel, David
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Roche, Mrs Barbara
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Chris (Isl'ton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Rachel (Dunfermline W)
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Steinberg, Gerry
Strang, Dr. Gavin
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watson, Mike
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Wise, Audrey
Worthington, Tony
Wray, Jimmy
Wright, Dr Tony
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mrs. Jane Kennedy and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Aitken, Rt Hon Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Amess, David
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkins, Rt Hon Robert
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Bates, Michael
Batiste, Spencer
Bendall, Vivian
Beresford, Sir Paul
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Sir Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Sir Rhodes
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Sir Graham
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Brown, M (Brigg & C'thorpes)
Browning, Mrs Angela
Budgen, Nicholas
Burt, Alistair
Butler, Peter
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Sir Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sir Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Coe, Sebastian
Congdon, David
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'shire)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dicks, Terry
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Sir Anthony
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Rt Hon Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Fox, Rt Hon Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Freeman, Rt Hon Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Sir Peter
Gale, Roger
Gallie, Phil
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, Sir John
Grant, Sir A (SW Cambs)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)

Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Grylls, Sir Michael
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archibald
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hanley, Rt Hon Jeremy
Hannam, Sir John
Hargreaves, Andrew
Haselhurst, Sir Alan
Hawkins, Nick
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hendry, Charles
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Horam, John
Hordern, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Howell, Sir Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Robert B (W Hertfdshr)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, Sir David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Legg, Barry
Lennox-Boyd, Sir Mark
Lester, Sir James (Broxtowe)
Lidington, David
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mans, Keith
Marland, Paul
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Dr Brian
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Moate, Sir Roger
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Needham, Rt Hon Richard
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Patnick, Sir Irvine
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Pickles, Eric
Porter, David (Waveney)
Powell, William (Corby)
Rathbone, Tim
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Riddick, Graham
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Ryder, Rt Hon Richard
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Sir Timothy
Scott, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Sir Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Nicholas
Speed, Sir Keith
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Sir Michael (S Worcs)
Spink, Dr Robert
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stephen, Michael
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan
Streeter, Gary
Sumberg, David
Sweeney, Walter
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (N Tayside)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'fld)
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Simon Burns and
Mr. Giles Brandreth.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 27

GRANTS UNDER SS. 50 TO 55 OF THE HOUSING ACT 1988

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 17, line 3, leave out from 'association' to end of line 4 and insert

'which had such a deficit as is mentioned in that section for any of the years beginning 1st April 1994, 1st April 1995 or 1st April 1996.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 151 and 28.

Mr. Curry: The amendments give effect to the commitments given in Committee. Amendment No. 27 provides for the period for associations to make applications for revenue deficit grant to be extended to cover associations that incurred a deficit in any of the three years prior to commencement.

Amendment No. 28 excludes from the rent surplus fund stock provided with the aid of grant under section 50 of the Housing Act 1988.

Amendment No. 151 allows the corporation to direct a registered social landlord to use any unrecovered housing association grant paid under earlier legislation for a specific purpose instead of directing repayment to the corporation. A similar power covering grant that will be paid under the Bill is contained in clause 26.

Mr. Raynsford: The amendment gives effect to an undertaking given in Committee to enable a claim for revenue deficit grant to be made by an association that had been receiving such a grant in any one of the three years preceding the commencement of the Act. Those are the words that the Minister used when moving the amendment, and those were the words used in our amendment in Committee. We were told that the words were insufficient and inadequate. The Minister has, therefore, chosen clearly to spell out the specific years in the Bill's phraseology. I am only astonished that, for the sake of consistency, he did not use the same terminology when moving the amendment. We welcome this amendment and we support it.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 151, in page 17, line 4, at end insert—

'( ) In section 52(2) of that Act (recovery, &c. of grants: powers of Corporation), in paragraph (c) after "to pay to it" insert ", or to apply or appropriate for such purposes as it may specify,".'.

No. 28, in page 17, line 10, at end insert—

'( ) In section 55(1) of that Act (surplus rental income: cases in which section applies), omit paragraph (a).'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 29

GENERAL POWER TO OBTAIN INFORMATION

Amendments made: No. 74, in page 17, line 42, after second 'to' insert 'the Corporation or'.

No. 75, in page 18, line 17, leave out from beginning to end of line 19 and insert—

'( ) Nothing in this section requires the disclosure—

(a) by a solicitor, of a privileged communication made to him in his capacity as solicitor, or

(b) by a registered social landlord's banker, of information as to the affairs of any of his other customers.'.

No. 76, in page 18, line 20, leave out

'a person authorised by the Corporation' and insert 'any person'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 35

ISSUE OF GUIDANCE BY THE CORPORATION

Amendment made: No. 29, in page 21, line 9, at end insert—

'( ) the services to be provided to tenants;

( ) the procedures to be adopted to deal with complaints by tenants against a landlord;'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 36

POWERS OF ENTRY

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 77, in page 21, line 36, leave out 'seven' and insert 'not less than 28'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 78 to 81.

Mr. Curry: In Committee, I offered to look again at the way in which the corporation might use the powers of entry contained in clauses 36 and 37. I have concluded that the period of notice that landlords should receive before the corporation uses those powers should be extended from seven to not fewer than 28 days. Amendment No. 77 achieves that aim.

Amendments Nos. 78 and 79 provide the quid pro quo, which is that the landlord, rather than the corporation, should then be responsible for informing tenants that a survey is to take place. That means that the landlord rather than the corporation would communicate with individual tenants, which is a more sensible arrangement.

The penalty clause contained in amendment No. 79 is necessary because a failure by the landlord to give due notice could frustrate the carrying out of the survey. We have built in a penalty clause equivalent to that contained in clause 37, which deals with obstruction of the surveyor by the landlord.

Amendments Nos. 80 and 81 are drafting amendments to the penalty provisions in clause 37.

Mr. Raynsford: We welcome the amendments, which again give effect to undertakings given by the Minister in Committee, arising from amendments that were moved by Labour Members and by Liberal Democrat Members. Under the Bill as originally drafted before it was considered in Committee, it seemed possible that tenants could have been guilty of an offence if they refused to allow access to someone seeking to enter their premises under the powers contained in this clause. Clearly that would have been an entirely unsatisfactory arrangement. We therefore welcome the clarification that the liability for an offence does not extend to a tenant.

We also moved the extension of the period from seven to 28 days to give proper notice of the use of such powers. That is an equally welcome clarification. We support those sensible and welcome amendments.

Mrs. Maddock: As the hon. Member for Greenwich said, in Committee we discussed the sensitive issue of powers of entry into a person's home. I therefore welcome amendment No. 77, which is in line with amendment No. 137, which I proposed in Committee. I greatly welcome the Minister's comments about giving a duty to a landlord to inform a tenant of entry into that person's home. If I am honest, however, I am slightly disappointed that a tenant will not be given 28 days' notice of that event, but the Minister has honoured his commitment to reconsider the matter. He has come back with some sensible amendments which, with the small proviso that I have expressed, I welcome.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 78, in page 21, line 36, leave out 'to the occupier, and'.

No. 79, in page 21, line 38, at end insert—

'( ) Where such notice is given to the landlord, the landlord shall give the occupier or occupiers of the premises not less than seven days' notice of the proposed survey and examination.

A landlord who fails to do so commits an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 37

PENALTY FOR OBSTRUCTION OF PERSON EXERCISING POWER OF ENTRY

Amendments made: No. 80, in page 22, line 1, leave out 'a summary' and insert 'an'.

No. 81, in page 22, line 5, after 'on' insert 'summary'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Schedule 2

SOCIAL RENTED SECTOR:HOUSING COMPLAINTS

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 30, in page 125, line 48, leave out

', if the complaint is not withdrawn,'

and insert

'not withdrawn, and a power to investigate any complaint duly made but withdrawn, and where he investigates'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 31 and 32.

Mr. Curry: The amendments are intended to clarify and simplify the arrangements by which the housing ombudsman may investigate complaints and make determinations.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 31, in page 128, line 3, leave out from first 'complaint' to 'by' in line 4 and insert

'duly made to him and not withdrawn, and may investigate any complaint duly made but withdrawn, and where he investigates a complaint he shall determine it'.

No. 32, in page 128, line 22, leave out from 'may' to end of line 24 and insert

'take such steps as he thinks appropriate to publish what the member ought to have published and recover from the member the costs of doing so.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 53

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS: PART I

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 82, in page 31, line 5, at end insert 'minor'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 83, 84, 139, 142 and 126A.

Mr. Curry: These technical amendments concern the location in the Bill of consequential amendments and repeals. Most of those will now be contained in an order made under clause 53.

Mr. Raynsford: Amendment No. 139 deletes 11 pages of the Bill, from page 131 to page 142. Amendment No. 142, which substitutes for that deletion, is just half a page long. On the surface, that would appear to be a welcome reduction in unnecessary legislation; perhaps the Minister would describe it as deregulation, but it is difficult to be sure that nothing has been lost on the way. I seek some assurance from the Minister that there is no policy effect from such major surgery to his own legislation.

Mr. Curry: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman that assurance.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 83, in page 31, line 7, leave out from beginning to end of line 8.

No. 84, in page 31, line 9, leave out 'other amendments' and insert 'amendments or repeals'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Schedule 3

SOCIAL RENTED SECTOR:MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 129, line 41, at end insert—

'Finance Act 1981 (c.35)

.—(1) Section 107 of the Finance Act 1981 (stamp duty payable upon sale of houses at a discount) is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (3)(e) insert—

"(ea) a registered social landlord within the meaning of Part I of the Housing Act 1996;".

(3) In subsection (3)(f) for the words from "registered" to the end substitute "registered—

(i) in Scotland, under the Housing Associations Act 1985, or

(ii) in Northern Ireland, under Part II of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1992;".

(4) In subsection (3A) (exclusion of certain sub-sales), for "subsection (3)(f)" substitute "subsection (3)(ea) or (f)".

(5) After subsection (3B) insert—

"(3C) A grant under section 19 or 20 of the Housing Act 1996 (purchase grants in respect of disposals at a discount by registered social landlords) shall not be treated as part of the consideration for a conveyance or transfer to which this section applies made by a body falling within subsection (3)(ea) above.".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 134 to 138.

Mr. Curry: This is a mixed group of amendments on various issues relating to the housing corporations and the new registered social landlords. Amendment No. 33 extends the provisions of section 107 of the Finance Act 1981 to registered social landlords. I would draw hon. Members' attention in particular to subsection (5), which ensures that tenants buying their home under the new right to acquire will pay stamp duty only on the discounted price, rather than on the full market value. That is in line with the existing right to buy.

Amendments Nos. 134 and 135 will enable the Audit Commission to provide specialist advice to the Housing Corporation on audit matters. The current provisions in the Bill give the corporations power to sell their loans to the private sector, but they contain possible ambiguities. Amendment No. 136 puts the responsibility for the sale on the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Wales, and provides them with a power to direct the corporations to sell their loans on terms which they approve. Amendment No. 137 provides a similar power for the Secretary of State for Scotland in relation to Scottish Homes' loans. That puts the sale of the portfolios on to a secure legal footing.

Amendment No. 138 would repeal the scheme known as home ownership for tenants of charitable housing associations, HOTCHA for short, which has now been superseded by the tenants incentive scheme and the do-it-yourself shared ownership scheme. The purchase grant scheme will also allow tenants to buy their homes at a discount.

Mr. Raynsford: Do the terms of amendment No. 33, which exempts tenants from payment of stamp duty on the full price of properties sold to them under the right to buy, also extend to the voluntary purchase grant? From my reading of the amendment, I assume that it does, but I would welcome some clarification from the Minister.

Mr. Curry: The answer is yes.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful to the Minister. Amendment No. 134 refers to consultancy services of the Audit Commission offered to the Housing Corporation. I would be most grateful for some suggestion from the Minister as to which services he envisages the Audit Commission offering and in what circumstances. The Minister elegantly explained the purpose of amendment No. 138, and I am surprised that he did not introduce it as the "gotcha HOTCHAs" amendment.

Mrs. Maddock: I should like to comment on amendment No. 136, which gives the Secretary of State another power. On numerous occasions in Committee, I expressed my view about giving too many powers to individual people. Some of us have a sneaking suspicion that the amendment may be one route by which the Government will try to find some money for their tax cuts before the general election. I do not know whether the Minister would care to comment on when he will demand that the Housing Corporation should sell off its portfolio.

[Mrs. Maddock]

7.15 pm

Mr. Curry: If the hon. Member for Greenwich will permit me, I will write to him with details of the sort of matters about which the Audit Commission might wish to give assistance to the Housing Corporation. We are in the business of appointing specialist advisers on the loan portfolios, and, of course, our actions would follow the advice given to us in those circumstances. The timetable is determined by the nature of the advice that we give and the practicality of the proposition.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 134, in page 130, line 46, leave out from beginning to 'above' and insert—

'Functions of Commission in relation to audit of accounts of registered social landlords

28D.—(1) The Commission may provide the Corporation with consultancy services relating to the audit of accounts of registered social landlords.

(2) The Commission may recover from the Corporation such costs incurred in providing the services as may be agreed by the Corporation.

Meaning of "the Corporation" and "registered social landlord"

28E. In sections 28B to 28D'.

No. 135, in page 130, line 53, at end insert—

'(ab) its functions under section 28D relating to such landlords;'.

No. 136, in page 131, line 6, leave out from 'section' to end of line 13 and insert

'76 (general power of Secretary of State to give directions to Corporation) insert—

"Direction for sale of Corporation's loans portfolio

76A.—(1) The Secretary of State may direct the Corporation to assign or otherwise transfer to another person, on terms approved by the Secretary of State, all or any of the Corporation's rights and obligations in relation to any loan and any related security.

(2) A direction under this section may be varied or revoked by a further direction.

(3) Nothing in this section affects the generality of the Secretary of State's power to give directions under section 76.'.

No. 137, in page 131, line 35, at end insert—

'Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 (c.43)

In section 2 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988, after subsection (7) insert—

"(7A) Without prejudice to the power of the Secretary of State to give directions under subsection (10) below, the Secretary of State may direct Scottish Homes to assign or otherwise transfer to another person, on terms approved by the Secretary of State, all or any of its rights and obligations in relation to any loan or related security; and it shall be the duty of Scottish Homes to comply with any such direction.

(7B) A direction under subsection (7A) above may be varied or revoked by a subsequent direction given by the Secretary of State.".

No. 138, in page 131, line 35, at end insert—

'Housing Act 1988 (c.50)

Section 58 of the Housing Act 1988 (application of Housing Acts to certain transactions) shall cease to have effect.'.

No. 139, in page 131, line 36, leave out from beginning to end of line 18 on page 142.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 61

MINOR DEFINITIONS:PART I

Amendment made: No. 85, in page 34, line 7, at end insert—

' "local authority" has the same meaning as in the Housing Associations Act 1985;'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 62

INDEX OF DEFINED EXPRESSIONS:PART I

Amendment made: No. 86, in page 35, line 10, at end insert—

'local authority Section 61'.—[Mr. Curry.]

New clause 4

DUTY TO PROVIDE GAS SAFETY CERTIFICATES

'1.— After section 353 of the Housing Act 1985 insert—

"353A.–(1) It is the duty of the person having control of a house in multiple occupation, and of the person managing it, where the house contains a gas appliance or any installation pipework, chimney or flue, to ensure that a certificate showing safe installation, maintenance and chimney and flue cleaning shall be given to the tenant a reasonable time before he signs the tenancy agreement and every twelve months thereafter during the term of that tenancy.

(2) The aforesaid certificate shall specify the name, address and, where it is gas work, the CORGI registration number of the person who did the relevant work and the date the work was done.".'.—[Mrs. Maddock.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause would impose a duty on landlords of houses in multiple occupation to ensure that any gas appliances in properties let by them are safely installed and annually maintained. The clause would also apply to other appliances which use any fuels that are liable to produce carbon monoxide. It would also impose a duty on landlords to ensure that pipework, chimneys, flues and so on are maintained safely.

The tragic consequences of unsafe gas heaters were highlighted just last week, when a landlord from Hull was convicted of manslaughter for failing to deal with dangerous appliances which eventually caused the death of his tenant. Some people are concerned that landlords merely pay a fine when they are responsible for the death of their tenants. Officially, nearly 30 people a year in the United Kingdom die of carbon monoxide poisoning, but most experts agree that the true figure is much higher—perhaps hundreds or even thousands.

Part of the problem is the difficulty of recognising carbon monoxide poisoning for what it is. Even general practitioners find diagnosis difficult, and have sometimes treated victims and then sent them home, where they have subsequently died because the faulty appliance in question continues to give off its poison. That is why we need to highlight the problem and make sure that more people know more about it. Most incidents happen in the home, and not just in houses in multiple occupation, but this legislation gives us an opportunity to look at what happens in HMOs as a result of poorly maintained and installed gas cookers, boilers, heating appliances and associated fittings.

Since 1994, landlords have been obliged by law to have annual safety checks carried out by gas installers registered with the Council of Registered Gas Installers. The evidence shows, however, that tenants are not aware of that requirement; and that many landlords are not fulfilling their responsibilities. Twelve months after the requirement was introduced, Which? magazine surveyed 103 tenants in privately rented properties containing gas appliances, and found that almost two thirds of them said that no servicing or inspection had been done, a third of them having been resident in the properties for more than 12 months. As the magazine observed,

"These figures suggest that many private landlords are ignoring—or are unaware of—the new gas-safety check laws, and a significant number of tenants are being put at risk".

A particularly vulnerable group are students, many of whom live in the private rented sector. They tend to move in and out of it fairly often, and perhaps do not have the time to check with their landlords whether their gas fires have been inspected. It is therefore important to put the onus on landlords to provide a certificate, and to renew it every 12 months. That is the purpose of the new clause. Tenants are already legally entitled to ask for evidence of inspection, but we should require landlords to give the evidence to the tenants anyway. Many tenants are understandably reluctant to press landlords for these certificates, which is why the new clause is so important.

I realise that this may prove tricky for the Government, and I know that they are looking into the whole matter to find ways of improving the current legislation. This Bill, however, gives us a golden opportunity to ensure that more people know about the problem, to improve tenants' rights and to make landlords face up to their responsibilities. A great deal of publicity attended the case of Tracy Murphy who died in Hull. Prosecutions are often brought by the Health and Safety Executive, and only fines are imposed—sometimes written off as business expenses. But human lives are at stake and we owe it to those who have lost their lives to ensure that it does not happen again.

I have figures to show how often the problem arises in houses in multiple occupation. Gas was responsible for seven deaths last year; solid fuel, also covered by the new clause, caused four deaths. Butane caused one, and another was attributed to an unknown cause. Of those fatalities, three took place in people's own homes, four probably did, but three were in rented accommodation. Meanwhile, 47 per cent. of near misses were connected with gas, and there were far more such incidents in rented accommodation than in homes lived in by the owners. Now we have a real chance to do something about that.

I realise that the Minister may not be in a position to give us a commitment today. I know that he is consulting on the matter, but I hope that he will at least look at ways of incorporating in housing legislation and legislation covering HMOs a provision that will make it the responsibility of landlords to provide a certificate. He would find support on both sides of the House for such a proposal. I look forward to hearing his comments on what I believe is a useful way of dealing with a problem that has given rise to so many tragic reports in the press in recent weeks.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): I have some sympathy with the remarks of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) and with her new clause. Those of us with constituencies which include many people living in multi-occupation property—especially students—well know the fears surrounding this issue. Those fears are well known to me, as a parent whose oldest child will in due course go off to university and find herself in such accommodation. Students are particularly vulnerable because their occupation is short term and because of their high turnover rate. That means that they cannot know when the appliance that they are using, or the fuse that serves it, was last inspected and passed as safe.

The hon. Member for Christchurch is therefore right, at a time when the Government are examining the matter, to urge the Minister to say something about the state of play. How are the Government's investigations going? What action do they propose to take to allay some of these fears?

A certificate on its own is not enough. There should be a notice attached or near to an appliance stating when it was last checked and found safe. There should be a sign near a flue stating when it was last swept and rendered safe. After all, the same has been required for fire appliances over the years. Fire appliances can remain in the same place for ages, which is why there must be written notices near them saying when they were last inspected to the satisfaction of the relevant expert. Gas appliances, flues and their fittings should definitely be the subject of a requirement to produce evidence of their continuing safety, to protect those whose short-term occupation of such accommodation puts them at risk.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I concur with the last two contributions, although I am slightly surprised at the need to introduce this idea in this format. Admittedly, the Government are looking into the issue, but it has been with us for quite some time.

I know that British Gas produced a video about carbon monoxide poisoning which was aimed particularly at students. I hope that the Minister will include universities in his investigation as accommodation officers often encourage private landlords to house some of their student population. That applies particularly to students from abroad—at Bradford university, for instance. Many of the houses in which students find themselves contain appliances that have not been properly checked. Before any tenancy agreement is signed, it should be a prerequisite that satisfactory certificates of safety be produced; that is only common sense. Furthermore, that requirement should be included on the face of the Bill.

In my authority, environmental health officers cannot get around all the houses in multiple occupation for checks because there are simply too many. The problem is addressed only when a tragedy happens, such as that in Hull. That case involved a negligent landlord who was imprisoned, but many people feel aggrieved that he had committed offence after offence. How long will it be before we can put such matters right? The Government push people towards the private rented sector, so they have a responsibility to ensure that people are in a safe environment. British Gas is aware of the position and, as I mentioned, it has made a video.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

I hope that the Minister will not take too much time to investigate the problem. New clause 4 sets out an easy and straightforward way to deal with the issue in the short term and I hope that we shall see some quick action. Concern has been expressed not only by student unions, but by other vulnerable groups. For example, single-parent families move into accommodation because of the low cost and the appliances have not been checked. I hope that the Minister has listened to what has been said and will support the spirit of new clause 4.

7.30 pm

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I will not detain the House for long. I wish to thank the Minister because when we discussed fire regulations and other areas covered by new clause 4 I raised the question of the means of escape order and whether the Bill would introduce an inconsistency on means of escape orders. That point is relevant to our debate today. The Minister promised to write to me about that subject and I am grateful that he did so.

I wish to clarify with the Minister what he said in that letter, because it is important that we get it on the record. As I understand it, the Minister has said that there will still be an exclusion in the means of escape orders for houses with fewer than three storeys. I have some reservations about that, but I wish to clarify the position. Beyond that, the good news—if I understand the Minister's comments correctly—is that there will be less disparity between the two schemes in the criteria governing the inclusion of houses than was originally proposed.

The Minister's letter stated:

"our proposal at present is to cover all HMOs which might be subject to registration as described in clause 62".

I wish to clarify that he means that there will be no contradiction between regulations relating to means of escape orders and those relating to houses in multiple occupation covered by the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I having a little difficulty relating his comments to new clause 4. They seem more relevant to new clause 9. Perhaps I have misunderstood the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Burden: I might have been able to raise the point on both new clauses, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I raised it at this point because new clause 4 deals with the safety of gas fires. The means of escape order specifically relates to fire regulations—

Mrs. Maddock: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burden: I should like to answer you first, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When we discuss new clause 9, I intend to raise other issues about licensing schemes. The means of escape order is specifically about fire regulations. I do not know whether that clarification will help.

Mrs. Maddock: The hon. Gentleman could raise the point on Government amendment No. 56 when we come to it. I tabled an amendment to take out the word "knowingly". The Government agreed to take my amendment away and rewrite it. They have brought it back exactly the same and I commend their rewriting.

Mr. Burden: The point on which I seek clarification is essentially simple. I think that the Minister has clarified it in writing, but I wish to put it on the record. My point is that if a house is covered by the registration criteria in the Bill, the same property should be covered by means of escape orders; there should be no contradiction between the two schemes. If the Minister can give that clarification I shall be content.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I will deal later, if I may, with the point raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) about fire escapes. I wish to deal first with the important contribution by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock).

Gas safety is a very important subject and I have much sympathy with the underlying concern expressed by the hon. Lady about promoting safety. I also understand the concerns expressed by other hon. Members in the course of the debate, which has been good, if short. I understand the concerns about students felt by parents of children going to university. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Martin) made an important point, which was echoed by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) as it affects his constituency, Bradford university and Bradford students.

I believe that it will be helpful if I deal in a little detail with the regulations that concern gas safety, to which the hon. Member for Christchurch adverted. Duties on landlords to provide safe gas installations in rented accommodation are properly matters for the Gas Safety (Installation and Use) Regulations 1994. Those regulations require landlords, including landlords of houses in multiple occupation, to maintain gas appliances, flues and installation pipework in a safe condition; to arrange annual safety checks of appliances and flues using a CORGI-registered gas installer; and to provide records of those checks when tenants ask for them. The record must include the date of an inspection, the defects identified and any remedial action taken. Those requirements are compulsory for all landlords who rent property that comes within the scope of the regulations.

Managers of HMOs are also required by the management regulations to keep gas supply installations, and those for space and water heating, in good repair and working order. Environmental health officers, who enforce the management regulations, have been told to inform the Health and Safety Executive if they suspect that the gas safety regulations have been breached.

I naturally share the desire of the hon. Member for Christchurch to give tenants the information that they need to avoid potential death traps. The primary aim of the regulations is to reduce gas-related carbon monoxide poisoning from dangerous gas fittings and blocked flues which, as the hon. Lady said, account for nearly 30 tragic deaths every year.

The hon. Member for Christchurch mentioned the recent, tragic case in Hull. I believe that the landlord in question had earlier been prosecuted by the Health and Safety Commission and he was also prosecuted by the Crown Prosecution Service. I understand that he was convicted of manslaughter—a criminal conviction, of course—and received a suspended sentence of 18 months imprisonment. The judge gave reasons why the sentence was suspended and said that an immediate term of imprisonment would be the likely outcome in other cases. That illustrates the serious manner in which the courts regard what is a serious offence. I am sure that anyone who has listened to the debate will have heard that serious approach echoed by the hon. Members who have contributed.

Many of the deaths have occurred in rented accommodation, such as HMOs, and I recognise the pressure, reflected in new clause 4, for a change in the law so that landlords are either required to supply evidence of annual safety checks without tenants first asking for it, or are required to display such evidence prominently in rented accommodation.

As I have indicated, the 1994 regulations already require information about checks to be produced to tenants on request, and the Health and Safety Commission has gone to great lengths to publicise how the law protects tenants and to ensure that they are aware of their rights. I understand that the Health and Safety Commission has also been in touch with the Government's chief medical officer, who has issued a circular to all general practitioners about the symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning. The Health and Safety Commission is very aware of the importance of the subject.

Changes to the rights that I have described are properly matters on which the Commission would first need to advise Ministers. I am pleased to be able to tell the hon. Member for Christchurch that the Commission has a review of the 1994 regulations in hand and that that review will consider the case for a possible new duty on landlords requiring them to display evidence of an annual gas safety check in a prominent position.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): What is the time scale for the review?

Mr. Clappison: That was to be my next point. I understand that the HSC will be producing a consultative document by March 1997 and that it intends to produce new regulations possibly by May or June 1997.

Mr. David Martin: Will my hon. Friend speed up that process? Talking about consultative documents makes it sound like next year or the year after that. Perhaps he will give the commission a kick where it hurts.

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend, too, has the happy knack of anticipating my next remark. I was about to assure the House that in view of the concern expressed in the debate I intend to contact the commission to draw its attention, first, to the seriousness with which the House regards the subject and the requirement that an advertisement be introduced and, secondly, to the concern that has been expressed about the time scale. I will draw the commission's attention to the debate. Indeed, I am sure that it would want to be aware of it. I shall ensure that the points made in the debate are reflected upon by the commission.

I hope that on the basis of my assurances the hon. Member for Christchurch will find it possible to consider seeking leave to withdraw the motion.

Mrs. Maddock: I am grateful to the Minister for his comments. I was slightly more patient than some hon. Members in letting him respond to the debate. I hope that he will push the Health and Safety Commission to quicken its response.

Carbon monoxide poisoning is extremely sinister. We know that carbon monoxide is odourless and colourless, so it cannot be seen. There is a great lack of knowledge. I could go into the reasons why that is so, not least the shortcomings of science education, but I am sure that I would be ruled out of order.

The new clause is simple, but its implementation would solve many problems. I understand that if a review is taking place it is only right that we should wait until we hear what has happened, but I should not have been happy to wait until 1997. Too many people would be lost between now and then.

Mr. Bennett: Does the hon. Lady accept that if the Government had any concern about these matters they could complete the process by September before students sign on for the next term?

Mrs. Maddock: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, and one that I hope the Minister will take on board.

It is important to help those tenants who may not want to push their landlords on these safety measures. The landlord may have told them, "It's all right." I regret that we are moving towards a time when more people will be living in temporary accommodation. They will be moving from time to time. When people do not have direct responsibility and they do not want aggravation with the landlord, they may not be happy to take action. It is important to understand that aspect and to ensure that it is the landlord's duty to provide a certificate.

Nevertheless, having listened carefully to the Minister, I do not intend to press the new clause to a Division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Lady wish to withdraw the new clause?

Mrs. Maddock: If it makes the procedure of the House easier, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The choice rests with the hon. Member.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 9

NATIONAL LICENSING SCHEME FOR HOUSES IN MULTIPLE OCCUPATION

'.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order replace the provisions of sections 63 to 67 with a national, mandatory licensing scheme for houses in multiple occupation.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(2) Any order under subsection (1) above shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'—[Mr. Raynsford.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Raynsford: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

We come to the extremely important issue of the licensing of multi-occupied houses. The purpose behind the new clause is to give the Secretary of State power by order to replace the provisions of clauses 63 to 67 with a national mandatory licensing scheme for houses in multiple occupation.

The Bill would replace the provisions of sections 346 to 349 of the Housing Act 1985 for registering houses in multiple occupation. These are schemes of registration that can be set up by local authorities. In summary, the Bill would leave a registration scheme for multi-occupied houses to local authorities' discretion. Secondly, it would shackle authorities' discretion in operating such a scheme. On the basis of the Bill's provisions—I accept that the Government are to move an amendment to remove one of the elements to which I have referred, but we do not know yet what will take its place—well over half of multi-occupied houses would be excluded from the proposed licensing scheme. Our alternative is to give the Secretary of State a reserve power to replace the proposed provisions with a national licensing scheme.

7.45 pm

Let us consider the scale of the problem. We know from research findings that the Government have published that there are about 638,000 multi-occupied houses in Britain. There are different types of such houses, and only about 111,000 are what we would describe as traditional HMOs. By that I mean houses that have been converted into bed-sits. There are about 100,000 shared houses and flats, 41,000 households with lodgers, 17,000 purpose-built multi-occupied houses, about 17,000 hostels, guest houses, boarding houses and bed-and-breakfast hotels, and about 352,000 buildings converted into self-contained flats. That makes a total of 638,000.

It is recognised that multi-occupied houses contain some of the worst housing and life-threatening conditions of any accommodation. The Government's consultation paper—I use no other source because no one, I hope, will dispute what it contains—was issued in November 1994. It made that very point. It stated that "estimates from the English House Condition Survey suggest that the privately rented HMO stock contains a significantly greater proportionate share of dwellings in poor condition than other forms of housing."

It continued:

"There is little dispute that HMOs represent a significantly higher fire risk than single family homes."

Let us put some flesh and blood on those relatively cautious official comments. According to the house condition survey, two fifths of houses in multiple occupation—traditional HMOs—are unfit for human habitation. Anyone living in one of those properties has a four in 10 chance of occupying a property that is unfit for human habitation.

Research undertaken by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation last year—it was undertaken by Geoffrey Randall, a very experienced researcher—revealed the risk of death from fire to be 28 times higher in a multi-occupied house than in the housing stock as a whole. That clearly explains the continuing high death toll in multi-occupied houses. The highest proportion of deaths from carbon monoxide poisoning—the issue was rightly highlighted by the hon. Member for Christchurch in moving new clause 4—is to be found in privately rented multi-occupied houses. There is, therefore, a concentration of severe problems.

Let us consider some of the human consequences. The hon. Member for Christchurch referred to the tragic case of Tracy Murphy, a 19-year-old student who was gassed by a defective appliance in the bed-sit that she was occupying in Hull in November 1993. She had lived in the flat, with her fiancé, for between only four and five weeks. She usually telephoned her family every day. After members of her family had not heard from her for three days, they visited her, only to find her dead. Her fiancé was away on business. Her blood had a 75 per cent. saturation level of carbon monoxide.

The landlord was subsequently found guilty of breaking the HMO management regulations in not maintaining the gas fire safely. As we all know, he was prosecuted. Tracy's parents, Trevor and Anita Murphy, have had to fight all the way for two and a half years to get the Crown Prosecution Service to proceed with a charge of manslaughter. On 22 April, the charge was confirmed, and the landlord was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment, suspended for two years, and ordered to pay £4,000 towards the Murphys' costs.

After the trial, Tracy's father Trevor said:

"Our only child's death will not be in vain if mandatory licensing of landlords is introduced. You need a licence for a TV and an MOT for a car, yet you do not have to have a licence for something that can kill people."

We in the House owe it to the memory of Tracy Murphy, and to her parents who have campaigned so vigorously since her death, to try to get something from her death. We owe it to them to take more effective action, in the form of a national licensing scheme for multi-occupied houses, to stop the hideous, unnecessary and senseless death of young people on the scale that we have seen in recent years.

The problem is not just one of deaths through carbon monoxide poisoning. As I mentioned, the risk of death from fire is far greater in a multi-occupied house than in any other type of housing. Let us consider the case of 20-year-old Matt Cohn. He died in the early hours of Wednesday 28 July 1993 when fire ripped through the semi-detached multi-occupied house in Harrow in which he lived. I stress the fact—this is an important point—that I am talking about a two-storey house in Wealdstone. Matt lived in a converted attic into which he had moved only two weeks earlier. It was his first independent home away from his family.

Access to and from the attic was by means of a wooden ladder. The house had no fire protection and, as the subsequent inquest established, the fire probably started in a rubbish bin near the kitchen on the floor below the attic. There was a fire alarm, but it failed to go off because the batteries had not been replaced. The landlord did not live on the premises; he lived in Cumbria. Despite that, he had allowed the property to be run without adequate arrangements for its management and maintenance and without proper safety protection for his tenants.

According to one of the ex-tenants,

"Matt didn't stand a chance. If there had been a back way out, he might have survived. It could have been all of us. I will never forget that night. Matt was just a young boy, happy-go-lucky with so many friends. He had his whole life in front of him and now it's all gone. The only way up or down was by the main stairs. There was no fire escape. We'd been told by the electricity board the wiring was unsafe."

Claire Jackson, who lived in the attic flat for a year and moved out just a week before Matt moved in, commented:

"It makes me go hot and cold just thinking about it. It was just a matter of time, I suppose, but you never think it will actually happen. Everything was done on the cheap and the wiring was so dodgy that even when the electricity meter ran out, my bedroom lights stayed on. It could so easily have been me."

At the time of the fire, the London borough of Harrow was unaware that that semi-detached house in a tree-lined road was a multi-occupied house. That is an issue of which we should be mindful. Under the provisions to which I have referred, two-storey properties would be excluded from any registration scheme. A local authority would not only not have to do anything about such properties, but it would be prevented, because of the nature and size of the house, from taking any action to register such premises. That is the case under the Bill.

I accept, as I mentioned earlier, that the Government propose to remove the relevant clauses. I hope to hear in detail what they intend to put in their place. The Minister owes it to us to tell us whether two-storey properties of that nature will be included in the Government's proposed registration scheme.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Arising out the tragic case in Harrow, of which many of us are aware, what would the hon. Gentleman's definition be of an HMO for the purposes of national registration?

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that important question. When I began my speech, I outlined the different categories of multi-occupied houses. The definition that seems most appropriate to me is one that includes a number of separate households living under the same roof. The actual number can be defined in different ways. The Government proposed a series of different tests depending, first, on whether the household had lodgers, secondly, on whether the landlord was resident in the premises and, thirdly, on whether the premises were self-contained accommodation. I do not think that we have to go to a precise figure. I will tell the hon. Gentleman why, because I understand exactly why he asked his question.

For properly self-contained accommodation, which may be purpose built, different standards apply from those that apply to the bed-sit property that the hon. Gentleman and I know only too well and which we normally think of when we use the letters HMO. If, in the traditional type of HMO that the hon. Gentleman is describing, there are two or more households, it is an HMO that should be separately registered. If we are dealing with self-contained properties, especially if they are owner-occupied as is quite often the case, one can accept the exclusion of properties with three entirely self-contained flats within the premises. That is why I do not think that we can fix an arbitrary figure. We have to look at the different categories of dwelling, but ensure that all properties at risk are brought within a licensing scheme. That is the crucial point to which I shall return in a moment.

I should like now to refer to evidence I obtained in Ipswich last week. I was visiting the town and I talked to the local authority there. It was conscious not only of the publicity concerning the Murphy case last week, but of the fact that the matter was due to be considered in the House this week. The authority brought to my attention a further sad fatality in a multi-occupied house in Ipswich.

The authority's letter to me says:

"On 24 February the fire brigade and police were called to break into a bedsit in Ipswich, following an emergency call from another tenant. On gaining access they found a nineteen year old man dead on his bed with a gas fire on.

Subsequent investigations by the Police, local Environmental Health Officers, the Health and Safety Executive and CORGI revealed that:—

1. Death was due to carbon monoxide poisoning.

2. The fire was found to be spilling carbon monoxide into the room and the flue was found to be capped off at roof level, therefore all flue gases spilled back into the room.

3. The property had three other gas fires, two of these had similar faults, including flues capped at roof level.

4. The property had a current CORGI gas safety certificate".

That is, perhaps, the most disturbing of all the comments.

The authority continues:

"5. Inspection of the landlord's entire portfolio of twenty five properties revealed serious defects at sixteen addresses.

Emergency disconnections of appliances and/or supply at all of these properties were necessary. Defects found included capped off flues, undersize supply pipework and various faulty appliances. The majority of appliances appeared to be secondhand.

6. Disconcertingly the majority of the properties were covered by current CORGI gas safety certificates.

7. The Council served Statutory Notices in respect of all sixteen properties.

8. The landlord has now complied with the majority of the Notices."

I have mentioned that case to raise the question whether reliance simply on CORGI—the Confederation of Registered Gas Installers—certificates is adequate. It is clear that, in that case, it was not. Proper inspection by the local authority environmental health officers resulting in notices being served has now led to action on that property.

Those tragedies are the background to the case, which is widely accepted on both sides, for the need for more urgent action. The Government published a consultation paper, as I mentioned, in November 1994. I want to be fair to the House and to set out the reasons given in that consultation paper in favour of a national licensing scheme, which we support, and the reasons that the Government spell out for opposing a national licensing scheme, which is their current position. I shall then invite hon. Members to conclude whether the Opposition or the Government are correct.

The Government spelt out the following arguments in favour of a national licensing scheme. First, it would "secure high standards throughout the licensed HMO sector. As with current HMO powers there would be an emphasis on the more consistent enforcement of fire safety standards, both the provision of basic amenities to ensure minimum health and hygiene standards would also be included".

[Mr. Raynsford]

Secondly, it would

"prevent the undesirable proliferation of hostels catering primarily for benefit recipients in resort areas".

Thirdly, it would

"focus any regulatory regime on those areas and types of housing with the worst problems, and hence make possible the removal of planning controls which apply uniformly nationally".

Fourthly, it would

"clarify the regulatory regime so that landlords and tenants know as far as possible which properties need to be licensed and what standards are acceptable".

Finally, it would

"ensure a more consistent approach to the HMO sector, which recognises the value of HMOs in meeting a particular housing need and which is reflected in local housing and planning strategies."

Those were the arguments in favour.

8 pm

The Government made three arguments against such a scheme. First, such a scheme

"would add little to the powers already available to local authorities. These can be exercised flexibly and tackle those properties which represent the greatest risk. Licensing would reduce this degree of flexibility by requiring local authorities to deal with all HMOs, so making it more difficult to concentrate on those properties most at risk".

Secondly,

"as with current registration schemes it would create excessive bureaucracy which would have to be paid for. Only the better landlords would agree to register and the remaining landlords would, as now, refuse to come forward. There would therefore be no significant improvement in the condition of standards of HMO properties as a direct result of licensing".

Thirdly, the Government said that

"licensing would be introducing too high a degree of regulation into a market where both landlord and tenant are willing to agree on a reasonable standard of accommodation, particularly in relation to matters not directly affecting fire safety. Raising standards to an unrealistically high level in all cases would mean that either the landlord would withdraw accommodation from the market or the tenants would be unable to afford the higher rents that higher standards could imply."

Let us consider those arguments. First, the Government said that licensing would add little to the powers already available to local authorities. By introducing part II of the Bill, the Government have destroyed that argument. They would not be introducing further powers and they would not include the special control provisions in part II if they believed that the current powers were adequate. There is clearly a need to do more. We are all aware of the appalling examples of lives that have been needlessly sacrificed, and they emphasise that the appalling safety risks require more urgent responses than are currently available.

The second implication of the Government's first objection is that licensing would somehow reduce flexibility by requiring authorities to deal with all HMOs, so making it difficult to concentrate on those properties that are most at risk. That argument does not hold water. We all agree that a risk assessment approach is needed in the introduction of a licensing scheme, as in a registration scheme. The worst properties must be given priority, and there is no difference between the parties on that. Our only difference is that we believe that a national licensing scheme would oblige all local authorities to do that, whereas the Government's voluntary scheme—some may and some may not register—will result in very little happening.

The Government's second objection was that licensing would create excessive bureaucracy which would have to be paid for, and that only the better landlords would register. There are two separate issues here. The national registration scheme that the Government are introducing increases bureaucracy—there is no question about that. Additional notices will have to be served, and additional inspections and measures will have to be taken to ensure compliance. That is implicit in such a scheme. The question is whether we want an effective scheme to justify the bureaucracy or only a partially effective scheme.

The problem is that the Government are arguing for more powers—they would not otherwise be introducing part II. They accept that their scheme will involve bureaucracy, but it is justified because they recognise—as do we—that there is a huge problem about the safety of the people who live in such accommodation. An overall national licensing scheme is more likely to be effective, because the standards will be known everywhere. Landlords who hold their housing stock in more than one local authority area—some have properties in a number of areas—would know what standards had to be met in every area of the country. If schemes vary from area to area, those landlords will be uncertain as to what standards apply in different areas. It would be far more bureaucratic for them to have to pursue the environmental health departments in each area to find out what is required. From the landlord's point of view, there will be less bureaucracy in a single standard national licensing scheme than in the multiplicity of schemes that the Government are allowing for in their registration arrangements.

The argument that only the better landlords will agree to register is fallacious, because the obligation would be on the local authority to ensure that all premises were registered. That would ensure an approach based on risk assessment, and that authorities dealt first with properties in the worst condition. We envisage a scheme in which there would be more regular visits, inspections and enforcement in respect of properties identified as risks, and relatively long periods between registration and re-registration of properties that are clearly satisfactory.

The study by Geoffrey Randall estimated that it would be possible to introduce a mandatory national licensing scheme along the lines that we advocate at a cost of £30 per room registered. That is a modest cost in relation to the appalling loss of life—perhaps 100 people a year—as a result of fire and gas accidents in properties and the appalling conditions that prevail in so many of them, some four out of 10 of which are unfit for human habitation. That is what we must put in the balance.

That leads me to the third argument against licensing in the Government's consultation paper—that it would introduce too much regulation in a market where both landlord and tenant are willing to agree on a reasonable standard of accommodation. We have no problem with a reasonable standard of accommodation, but we have a serious problem with squalid, sub-standard and dangerous places in which people die because the proper standards are not properly enforced. We cannot justify doing nothing on the grounds that the current position is reasonable—it is not. The Government know that something must be done, and the argument between us is whether there should be a mandatory national scheme or the partial and—in our view—ineffective registration arrangements that the Government are proposing.

There is extremely wide support for a national mandatory licensing scheme. Some 76 per cent. of those who responded to the consultation paper on licensing in 1994 indicated that they favoured a new national licensing system. The reasons for their support were straightforward. First, the current law is complex and confusing. In its evidence, Birmingham city council listed 17 different Acts of Parliament and regulations that sought to control conditions in the private rented sector. Secondly, the complexity is multiplied by the different policies and enforcement practices employed by different local authorities. Landlords who own properties in different boroughs were confused by the different requirements and regimes in different areas.

There is a great deal to be said for a standard national framework enforced in a comparable way everywhere so that everybody knows the position and whether the standards in their properties are adequate. The absence of a clear national framework makes it difficult for landlords who are thinking about opening new properties. How are they to approach the problem? Will they look at different areas and see in which one they can get away with least control? Will they say, "In this area we do not have to register, so we can get away with poor conditions; we will open a new house here and not go into that area because the local authority is tougher"? All that that will do is encourage poor standards and discourage the vigilant and conscientious authorities from pursuing proper licensing arrangements.

Let us take the parallel of motor cars. We know exactly what the consequences would be if licensing applied in some counties, but not in others. Motorists would decide to register in the county that did not have a licensing scheme, the purpose of the scheme would be defeated and it would become a nonsense.

The other problem with the current scheme is that it is inherently inefficient because it depends on tenants' making a complaint and on the local authority tracking down each substandard property. Hon. Members will recall the case in Harrow, in which the local authority was not aware that the property was an HMO. That is, sadly, a consequence of the present arrangements. Depending solely on tenants' complaints is inevitably an inefficient way of ensuring that all the properties that need to be checked are identified and made subject to the licensing arrangements. Some tenants will inevitably be nervous about making a complaint, especially if they have an insecure letting and the landlord says to them, "If you complain, you can leave. You need not expect to be able to stay here."

All the reasons that I have given make an overwhelming case for a national licensing scheme. Licensing is supported by a wide range of national, local, voluntary and statutory organisations including the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health, the Chartered Institute of Housing, the Association of District Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of London Government, Shelter, the Campaign for Bedsit Rights—which has a remarkable record for campaigning tirelessly over many years to tackle the scandal of poor conditions in multi-occupied houses—the Refugee Council, the National Union of Students, the National Association of Probation Officers and the National Consumer Council.

On 5 March, we held a housing policy conference, at which a number of people spoke. I shall quote not a Labour party spokesman, because the House would expect me to do that, but the chairman of Quality Street, a private sector landlord. Paul Mugnaioni said openly that he saw no reason why private landlords should not have to be licensed before renting out homes. He said that it would cause no problems for responsible landlords. Richard Best, the director of the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, added that the research conducted for the Campaign for Bedsit Rights showed that a national licensing scheme could pay for itself after five years.

There are overwhelming reasons for going for such a scheme to provide an effective and consistent regulatory framework throughout the country. The scheme would cover all the key factors that are necessary for the proper management and maintenance of multi-occupied houses. It would cover the fitness of the dwelling under the fitness standard; it would cover the safety of the dwelling in relation to means of escape in the event of fire; it would cover the safety of the electrical and gas appliances in the premises; and it would cover the arrangements for the management of the property.

Three or four members of the Committee spoke with great knowledge and concern. Hon. Members representing seaside towns, in particular the hon. Members for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) and for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson), highlighted the serious problems of poor management, which allowed a concentration of people in properties in very poor conditions which were essentially benefit hostels. All manner of problems were caused to neighbours as a result of poor management. We need to check to ensure that such properties are managed and that the people who run them are competent.

8.15 pm

I have outlined the elements of a scheme. We are not talking about an unduly rigorous or bureaucratic framework. The elements are a check on the condition of the property and measures to ensure the safety of the residents and the competence of the people managing the property. The landlord would then qualify for a licence. The scheme would probably be based on risk assessment to ensure that properties that were licensed but nevertheless problematic were subject to more frequent visits than properties of a good standard where a licence could run for a good period before it needed to be renewed. That is a matter of detail, but it is wrong to suggest that a national licensing scheme would place an onerous obligation on every landlord, including those who let good property, simply for the sake of complying with licensing requirements.

Instead of responding to all the evidence and all the people who were in favour of a national licensing scheme with a national mandatory scheme, the Government have introduced a revised form of registration of HMOs. Their proposals are inadequate for two main reasons. First, it will be up to each local authority to decide whether it will have a scheme. That will leave the uncertainty, the variations in practice between areas and the unfairness in the current legislative framework. It will be a thoroughly unsatisfactory framework which will be bad news for tenants and for landlords.

[Mr. Raynsford]

The second reason is that, on the basis of what is in the Bill, significantly more than half of the HMOs in the country will be excluded from the registration provisions. The current provisions exclude, first, houses occupied by persons who form only two households, secondly, houses occupied by no more than four persons who form more than two households, thirdly, houses occupied by no more than four persons in addition to the person managing or having control of the property and any other members of his household and, fourthly, houses where the living accommodation consists entirely of self-contained flats.

We moved a series of amendments in Committee. We did not insist that every one of those categories be included. As I said in response to the intervention by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), self-contained owner-occupied property would not necessarily have to be subject to a licensing scheme. However, a property in which a number of self-contained properties were let almost certainly would, not only because of the conditions but because of fire and gas safety. That is where some distinction needs to be made between the different categories. There is an overwhelming case for ensuring that many of the categories excluded are subject to a licensing scheme and that the restrictive parts of the Bill are amended.

I welcome the Government's decision to withdraw the clause that contains the exclusions and look forward to hearing from the Minister how they intend the scheme should operate and which categories will be covered. Will there be a restriction on properties of two storeys or fewer? If such properties are excluded, horrendous fires such as occurred in the property in Harrow would not necessarily be prevented. What about houses occupied by fewer than four persons apart from the person managing the property? Many HMOs contain only three or four individuals as well as the owner or manager of the property, and in many of them conditions are very poor. Would they be excluded or would there be a risk assessment approach to ensure that all properties likely to be a serious risk would be subject to registration?

The Government undertook to consider the matter, and we look forward to hearing exactly what their conclusions are. Having said that, even if the scope is widened and the restrictions that I have described are no longer in place, the Government have still missed the historic opportunity presented by the Bill to introduce a mandatory national licensing scheme that makes clear our determination as a country to tackle this scandal of poor conditions in multi-occupied houses. I refer to the terrible, needless death of people from fire and from gas poisoning, and to the squalor and utterly disgraceful conditions in which people are forced to live.

Often, landlords are taking large amounts of money from the public purse in the form of housing benefit for those properties. I do not begrudge landlords a fair return, but I do begrudge their profiteering at public expense and not offering decent conditions. We have to ensure that we get value for money. Housing benefit should be paid for a decent standard of accommodation, where people can live with dignity and in safety.

A mandatory national licensing scheme would allow that to happen. New clause 9 gives the Secretary of State the power to introduce such a scheme. I put it to the Minister that, even if the Government do not want to do so, they should still put the new clause on the face of the Bill so that another Government, on coming to power, can take action more speedily than would be possible if they had to go down the legislative route. The new clause does not require the present Government to act if they do not want to, but we hope that they will be persuaded that it is necessary. We think that this is a scandal that is crying out for action.

We believe that new clause 9 is a pragmatic and sensible amendment that would allow the inadequate registration scheme that the Government are proposing to be replaced with a proper, mandatory national scheme that applies to every area at a consistent standard to ensure that people who live in HMOs are properly protected and to ensure that landlords are clear about their obligations and the regime with which they have to comply.

Sir Teddy Taylor: We should be grateful for the opportunity to discuss this issue. It gives me the opportunity to remind the Government that this is a serious and urgent problem that is causing a great deal of concern, resentment and worry. The only thing that we have to decide tonight—it is very important—is whether the issue is best tackled by allowing each local authority to have its system of rules that may be tougher in one area than in another or whether it would be better to have a national system of registration.

Having listened to the very able and coherent speech of the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford), I am worried about the danger that we will give the public the impression that the problem—which currently exists and which will remain—will somehow be resolved by national registration and by more bureaucracy, and that the sins, failures and ails of society will disappear if we have a new management system. I hope that the Opposition will bear it in mind—they may be in government before long—that social problems cannot always be resolved by bureaucracy.

I have been in this place for far too many years—31, in fact—and I can remember when people in my area in Glasgow found it impossible to get a rented house. We had strict rules on the renting of property and the result was that people could not get a house to rent. The Government changed the rules and houses are now more readily available.

We should also think through the nightmares that some of our residential homes for the elderly are going through at the present time. We have rightly introduced new rules and regulations, some of which are costly and some of which are rather irrelevant. Some of the pleasant and acceptable residential homes are now facing closure, so we will have the growth of much larger institutions where the same care and personal relationships may not exist.

I think that the Government's proposal of a voluntary regulation by individual local authorities, bearing in mind the special needs of the area, is probably the better option. On the other hand, it might reassure some of us who are worried about the situation, and particularly worried about some local authorities, that if by chance it turns out that local authorities prove to be irresponsible or neglectful in not applying for registration the Government would not close their mind and may consider the need to have national registration if local registration does not work—the Conservative Government may choose to do this perhaps five years from now, if they still exist. Perhaps the Minister can address this issue in his reply.

As the Minister may be aware, I have been in consultation with my local authority for a considerable amount of time in relation to the current limited voluntary scheme—so far without success. I do not want to make any political points in this regard because, irrespective of who is in power in Southend, I try to get on well with them. I know that the officials try extremely hard to resolve real problems. The Minister must be aware that there is a danger that some local authorities—controlled by all the parties—may say, "There is no urgency here and we are managing very well so we will not put forward for a scheme".

The Government—who have greater faith in local government than I have—may say that I am incorrect. If by any remote chance I am correct, and if there is a shortage in the number of applications for local management schemes, I hope that the Government will not close their mind to some kind of national registration. I accept that this would not be the best option—clearly, the best option is to have a scheme that allows for as much flexibility as possible, bearing in mind the special needs of the locality.

The second point that I wish to make is that there is a great danger in the Government responding to what they believe to be public opinion. Houses in multiple occupation are the kinds of institutions that every single individual, in every locality, would like to see abolished almost immediately. Wherever one has HMOs, one certainly has damage to the value of property and social problems. In the delightful area of Southend there are glorious large houses that are ideal for the location of HMOs. Local residents complain that when milk is delivered in the morning, it suddenly disappears—and that is only one, small problem. There are many others.

In an avenue near the sea front there are three HMOs together. Local residents rightly complain about the problem of noise pollution. There is also appalling neglect. There was a case where an individual had been dead for a considerable amount of time in a room that was meant to be attended to daily. However, it was some considerable time before the unfortunate chap was discovered. We also have unfortunate landlords. I would like to take the Minister to one particular HMO—the landlord is not present because he is in gaol for drug trafficking. It is difficult to chase him at the present time.

The Government, in their local plans, have made provision for unacceptable individuals not to get licences. However, it is not terribly clear what happens if a person gets a licence but then goes to prison for drug trafficking. Would the licence then be removed? I accept that what the Government are proposing is a major step forward. If taken advantage of by local authorities, it could improve the situation. I hope that the Government will seek to get the message across. There is a real danger of inadequacies. Even though I accept that the Government are extremely competent, exciting and effective, they occasionally have inadequacies. One of those inadequacies is in getting the message across.

My fear is that following tonight's debate—after the superb and exciting speech of the hon. Member for Greenwich—the general public may conclude that the Labour party wants to do something about HMOs and that the Tories rejected its interesting idea. That is not the case at all. I hope that the Government will get across the message to local authorities and to local communities that what they are proposing in the legislation is something rather important that could give substantial powers to local authorities.

The third thing that I want to say—I hope that it will not make me too unpopular where I live—is that we should have some regard to the individuals who live in HMOs. I have a weekly surgery, my phone number is in the phone book and I speak to a lot of people. Therefore, I am well aware of the situation facing people who live in HMOs. Quite frankly, the conditions that people endure in HMOs—whether they are adequate or inadequate—are pretty dreadful.

Although the Government very kindly arrange for the housing benefit to be available, the nasty landlords usually shove an extra £5 on the charge on top of what is allowed by the housing benefit authorities simply to get what they regard as reasonable. It means that what is regarded as the minimum living standard under the income support rules is usually that less £5 and it is not a very pleasant situation.

I hope that the Government will accept the need for standards to be maintained. The only additional concession that I will make is to ask for extra action to be taken if, by chance, local authorities prove inadequate in applying for, and enforcing, licences. In Mr. Barker we have an excellent director of environmental health—the department has subsequently changed its name to the department of consumer services and goodness knows what else; the name seems to change nearly every day—and I am sure that, given the extra power, he would use it very satisfactorily.

8.30 pm

I want to mention two problems to my hon. Friend the Minister. I am not saying that there are easy solutions, but I hope that something can be done. I think that the majority of the public in Southend-on-Sea are sickened by those two problems. First, it is abundantly clear that individuals with problems are being dumped on Southend, simply because some authorities do not have HMOs, do not want them and do not want them to be encouraged. Southend contains many large properties that would be suitable for conversion to HMOs. It is a real problem; authorities are passing their social problems to us.

I have heard that Labour authorities, and even a Conservative authority not far from here, thought that they could solve their problems by dumping them elsewhere. I am sure that the Government disapprove of such action, whether it is taken by a Labour or a Conservative authority. I hope that they will realise that the problem has a serious impact on areas such as Westcliff-on-Sea, and the Milton ward in particular. Do they believe that local authorities—all of which must deal with individuals with special needs—will have an obligation to provide accommodation for those people? Unfortunately, two boroughs in particular that have no HMOs, or an inadequate number, cannot provide accommodation there. It can only be provided in Southend, and that is unfair to us.

The second point that I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bear in mind is this. Some areas, whether or not there is dumping, are attractive to people looking for

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

HMO accommodation, because they contain many large houses that are suitable for conversion. Southend suffers from that a great deal, as do other seaside resorts. I hope that, in the allocation of funds, the Government will remember that some areas have special problems. Southend is certainly one of them.

If we talk too much about special problems, we are in danger of giving the impression that the place concerned should be avoided. I have lived in Southend for many years, and it is a delightful borough, but we have specific problems in certain areas, and something needs to be done.

Irrespective of what we do tonight, I hope that the House will not give the impression that there is an easy solution. It appears to me that there are more people looking for such accommodation now than there have ever been in the past, for all sorts of reasons. Some may stem from unemployment, some from family break-up and some from the consequences of such break-up; others relate to the personal problems of individuals. Moreover, many of the authorities involved have not applied even for the basic rights that they could have under the existing licensing scheme. I hope that the Government will take firm action, on an urgent basis, to convey to authorities that new, strong powers exist to help proper management of their affairs, and also that they have an obligation to act.

Why on earth do not local authorities apply? I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will think about that carefully. Is it because they do not want the bother of applying, or because they think that the powers are a waste of time? I have the impression that some authorities regard the existing powers as inadequate; the powers in the Bill are much stronger and more precise. Could the Government perhaps send the simple message that, under the new powers, individuals who break the rules can have their licences removed and, consequently, their properties closed, and may end up with a serious court conviction?

I also have the impression that many people living in certain local authority areas who have suffered from the consequences of HMOs feel that no one is doing anything. I believe that, if it is made clear that those who do not apply for the appropriate licences can have the licences that they have been given revoked, and that those who have not applied may be subjected to fines and imprisonment, the Government's proposals will make a substantial difference. I certainly hope so. We must ensure that local authorities realise that tough new powers are available if, and only if, they apply for them.

I hope that the Government will give some thought to the "dumping" problem, and the undue attraction of individuals to such accommodation. I hope that they will see a case for doing something very simple. I have mentioned Southend, and the Milton ward in Westcliff. Is it unreasonable to ask the Government to consider asking an individual—or part of the Minister's Department—to consider what action might be appropriate in the area, in terms of the Bill? Nowadays, there is a terrible danger that the Government will produce an enormous number of reports, employing huge numbers of consultants, holding huge numbers of seminars and spending huge amounts of money, while no attention is being given to real problems. I have mentioned the problem in Southend and Westcliff's Milton ward. The council would be very pleased if the Government thought it appropriate to consider how the problem has arisen and what further steps could be taken, perhaps in consultation with the council and all those involved with it.

As most hon. Members probably know, Southend is in an interesting political position. The majority of our councillors happen to be Liberal Democrats. I am involved with Southend, West—which I do not represent—where there are a good many Liberals, no doubt for good reasons. However, we have a Conservative party, and also a Labour party. I believe that we will probably still have three parties after Thursday's elections; but, irrespective of who is in charge, it is desperately important for everyone to work together to try to solve the problems.

In Southend—unlike Glasgow, where everyone seemed to regard political discussion as almost a recurrence of the civil war—I have the impression that, by and large, the parties work together if there is a real problem that they feel can be resolved. Does the Minister think that it might be appropriate for his representatives to discuss Southend's problem with representatives of all its parties? Could they say, "Here is a real problem; this is what the new legislation can do", and ask whether there is a way in which they can work together to improve the lifestyle of those living in HMOs and try to resolve the general difficulties?

The Minister should be aware that there are appalling cases of neglect, some of which I have mentioned. Individuals have been exploited, and property has been found to be in an appalling state. I had the pleasure of visiting one property with local authority officials, and what I saw appalled me. In fairness, it was years ago, but I saw no fewer than 14 people sleeping in one room—and it was not really a room; it was at the top of some stairs, in a sort of hallway. The local official involved was so appalled that he somehow managed to get the place closed. Of course, all the people there went somewhere else. I do not know where they went, but it is quite possible that they went to another place with serious problems. Such problems have to be faced. The Government are giving local authorities the opportunity of solving them with the exciting new powers in the Bill. I hope that authorities will respond to that by taking advantage of the opportunities provided by the Government, but I also hope that the Government will say that if, by any remote chance, it does not work as successfully as it should, they will not close their mind to a national registration scheme. It would be a second best, but it may be the only alternative.

Mr. Betts: The issue is not simply one of technicalities, models or schemes but of the rights of individuals who live in houses in multiple occupation to be protected from landlords who need to be controlled by the sort of scheme that my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) proposed. The need for control is clear from the weight of evidence of our observations in our areas and from what he said about the tragedies that have shown the failures of the current system.

Instead of giving tenants rights to ensure that they get protection from a control system in each local authority, the Government have given local authorities the right to apply for a registration scheme if they wish. That is our fundamental disagreement with the Government. In giving local authorities that right, there is an assumption that they may not take it up. Tenants in some parts of the country may lose the right to have their homes properly regulated and to be properly protected from the excesses of landlords who may not behave in a fit and proper manner.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich spelled out the danger of fires to residents of such properties. People are 28 times more likely to die in them than in ordinary rented property. Such properties are twice as likely to be unfit. We examined that evidence in great depth in Committee. The Government had no substantive argument against the fact that they are more dangerous to their occupants than other private rented properties.

Most Opposition Members would instinctively want to argue for freedom for local authorities to take decisions that reflect the needs of their areas. In many respects, it is right that local authorities should be free to choose priorities related to the requirements of their areas. In this case, however, we are talking about what are issues of health and safety at the very least and which have on several tragic occasions been issues of life and death, as was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. In those circumstances, there should not be a right for local authorities to decide whether to introduce the aspects of the Bill that could enable them to prevent lives from being so wastefully expended, so tragically lost. Local authorities should have a duty placed on them to ensure that they take all appropriate action under the legislation available to give protection to people in such circumstances.

The people who live in HMOs are often there not through their choice but because of their desperate needs. They are often families that have been made homeless from other properties and are in HMOs because that was all that was available. They are often the poorest and most vulnerable people. Often they are students or young people who do not always think of the problems and difficulties that can result from inadequate fire safety provision or gas fires and gas equipment that has not been properly serviced. Such considerations are not the first things that come into young people's minds when they set off full of hope and expectation to university. After two or three weeks of desperate struggle looking around, they find somewhere to put down their heads at night. They deserve and must have full protection from the Government.

Young and transient people have other things on their minds. At their age, they are rightly thinking of their studies, their futures and of social activities at university. People in such properties have often come from being homeless. They may be vulnerable people of other sorts such as people struggling desperately to bring up families on low incomes. They do not easily make a strong pressure group to push local authorities into applying for registration schemes as one of their top priorities. Local authorities are under pressure in a variety of different ways and from different people and groups in their communities. However, the residents of HMOs are not likely to form the strongest pressure groups. There should be a national mandatory scheme because of the sort of people who live in such properties, the nature of the properties, the record of many of the landlords and because, in the end, there may not be any pressure from such individuals as a group to ensure that their voice is loudly heard.

8.45 pm

Opposition Members would champion the case for local authority freedom on many issues. In Committee, we had some moments of humour. The issue that caused the greatest collective hilarity among Opposition members was the Minister's conclusion that we could not have a national mandatory licensing scheme because we had to give local authorities the freedom and choice to act on behalf of their residents as they thought fit. From a Government who have imposed so many extra duties on local councils in the past few years, taken so many responsibilities and powers away in other respects, and controlled their expenditure absolutely, that came a bit rich. That argument cannot be meaningfully sustained.

The lie to the suggestion that the Minister was a champion of local authority freedom and local democracy was given by the wording of his model registration schemes. Local authorities have the freedom to act only in so far as they can apply to have such a scheme. They can have any scheme they want, as long as it is the Minister's scheme. They can have a different scheme as long as they get approval from the Minister for it. That is nothing to do with local authority freedom. The Government are apparently not willing to stand up to certain pressure groups that are forcing them away from imposing a duty on all local authorities to have a proper licensing scheme for HMOs.

There is no real argument for local authority freedom in this respect. Local authorities are not making one. As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich said, when the Government consulted, the local authorities associations unanimously said that they wanted a mandatory national licensing scheme. The only organisations that appeared not to want such an arrangement were the landlords and the fire officers. The latter had a peculiar view about who should be responsible for the enforcement of the schemes and wanted more authority for themselves rather than directly for local authorities. Apart from that, the Government chose to side with the landlords.

Perhaps the Minister could tell us about the results of the consultation. The Government started by considering both a national mandatory scheme and one that local authorities could choose whether to adopt. What single factor in the consultation responses decided the Government in favour of an optional scheme? Which single organisation or group of organisations gave such powerful evidence to the Minister that the Government were persuaded of that point of view? Why did the Government, who said that they were neutral and had an open mind when they set out on the consultation process, come down for an optional scheme rather than a mandatory one? Was it the pressure of landlord power? Apparently, no other group seriously argued for the course of action that the Government have decided upon.

The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) seemed to be arguing that the Government were right to have a scheme that local authorities could choose to adopt if they so wished but that the Government—and I agree with him on this—should do everything that they can to bring the availability of the scheme with its enhancements to the attention of local authorities and to encourage them to take it up because it was a good idea that it should be extended across the country. But he then seemed to say that if local authorities relax and do not take up the offer and the Government's suggestions, the Government should consider a national licensing scheme. If the result that the hon. Gentleman is trying to achieve is that the registration licensing scheme that is available for local authorities to take up if they so choose should be taken up by all local authorities and applied on a national basis, why not begin from that position and place that duty on local authorities? We shall then achieve much more quickly the end that the hon. Gentleman apparently desires.

[Mr. Betts]

Sir Teddy Taylor: The basic reason why I prefer the voluntary scheme is that authorities have different problems and the schemes will not all be the same; they will vary according to the applications put forward by the different councils. I think that my hon. Friend the Minister will confirm that the legislation makes it clear that it would not merely be a matter of applying for a licence and getting a stamp on it. The licence for Southend-on-Sea would be simpler than those for other areas. I would prefer that, but I agree that if councils do not apply, we should consider a national scheme, which would be uniform.

Mr. Betts: I think that the hon. Gentleman may have slightly misunderstood the possibilities that will be available to the Secretary of State under a national mandatory licensing scheme. I take the hon. Gentleman's point that different HMOs pose different problems in different parts of the country. In response to an intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich explained the different aspects of HMOs and how they might be treated differently under any system.

While a national licensing scheme would place an obligation on every local authority to license HMOs in their areas, it could contain slight differences of approach—as the Government suggest may be available to local authorities under their model arrangements. But, under a national licensing scheme, every local authority would have to have a scheme and apply it. Under the Government's proposals, a scheme is taken up only if a local authority so chooses—that is an important difference. There could be variations in individual schemes and variations in the way in which different HMOs are treated, even under a national licensing scheme. The essential difference is that every local authority would be required to have a scheme. The universal application of a scheme would be that much quicker if the Secretary of State were given powers to introduce one—as my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich suggests.

I wish to raise one further issue that I hope my hon. Friend and, in particular, the Minister, will address. I raised the issue in Committee, and it remains important. When I moved an amendment in Committee I accepted that its wording was not necessarily correct—and I accept that it is difficult to draft the correct form of words.

We have discussed in the debate the difficult and sometimes complicated issue of defining multiple occupation. There is another difficult issue—which may seem simple at first sight, but can prove to be more complicated—and that is the definition of household. There has been a difficult case in the courts involving Sheffield council. The issues involved in the Barnes case, which we talked about in Committee, still need to be addressed as part of any national scheme.

In the Barnes case, the landlord was able to avoid being affected by the local authority exercising its powers through a local control scheme by claiming that the students who occupied the property were living as one household. Without going into the details of the scheme, when students occupy houses, even if they are individuals leading individual lives and not sharing many of the household duties in the home, they may well turn up on the doorstep of the property as a group. They may have been sent there by the local students union or whatever body organises accommodation for new students arriving at university. If four, five or six people arrive at the property, they may collectively be required to find a replacement if one of them leaves.

In the Sheffield case, such issues meant that the court found that it was dealing with one household, which could not be controlled by the local authority scheme dealing with houses in multiple occupation. That is worrying and puts many students at risk. Other local authorities are already encountering problems as a result of the system and I hope that we can resolve the problem of definition—if not under the Government's current proposals, certainly under the national mandatory licensing scheme that the next Government will surely introduce.

The problem has been recognised; the need for a scheme has been recognised in the sense that the Government accept that they will draw up model schemes for local authorities to follow—that is hardly an issue between us. Our argument involves the need to replicate that scheme so that all local authorities run such a scheme in their area. We do not disagree on the nature of the scheme, but on the extent of its application. Even a national scheme could reflect slight differences in different areas.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich said, the problem is not even—as the Government have tried to claim—that a national mandatory scheme would be more difficult to enforce or more bureaucratic. If it is a good idea to have control schemes for houses in multiple occupation, it is a universally good idea and should be universally applicable. If it is recognised that it is necessary to deal with the problems of houses in multiple occupation and the activities of some landlords, that need should be recognised everywhere. If it is recognised that it is necessary to protect tenants and to uphold their rights, it is necessary to protect tenants throughout the country. If it is necessary for some houses in multiple occupation to be registered, why not register all houses through a national mandatory licensing scheme?

One cannot argue against the logic of such a scheme; we did not hear a convincing argument from the Government in Committee and I am not sure that the Minister will do much better tonight. I hope that he might keep an open mind on the subject—that is probably too much to expect. The Government should recognise that this is a serious matter and tenants are at risk everywhere. That is why the protection provided by a licensing scheme should be available to tenants everywhere.

Mr. Chris Davies (Littleborough and Saddleworth): The Government deserve credit for recognising the importance of the issue, and for ensuring that provision is made in the Bill for raising its profile and trying to tackle some of the worst problems. I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), who clearly showed that concerns are felt on both sides of the Chamber. That said, the plans for a voluntary registration scheme strike me as convoluted, confused and a cop-out. At worst, they seem designed to limit the effectiveness of real attempts to tackle the problem. I suspect that, if the proposals had been suggested by the Labour party, the Government would be pouring scorn on the details.

Houses in multiple occupation come in different shapes and sizes. They have different uses, ranging from bed-and-breakfast accommodation to hostels and flats with shared facilities. A common factor is that they often tend to be older properties—perhaps Edwardian, Victorian or even Georgian—and are usually substantial. The average Wimpey or Barratt box that one finds on modern housing estates is unlikely to be the perfect accommodation for a landlord who is seeking to make money by filling every room with tenants.

9 pm

As a councillor, I recall visiting a property in Canning street in Toxteth, Liverpool, some 12 or 14 years ago. It was perhaps typical of the impression that is created by the acronym "HMO". It was a grand four-storey Georgian property, with a magnificent classical frontage. However, as one reached it, one realised that the building's structure had decayed. At the side of the door was a block of nine bells, of which some worked and some did not—a few were simply wires hanging out of the wooden frame. One would eventually find a bell that worked, and someone would come and open the door.

One would then enter the gloomy interior of what was once a magnificent and prestigious house, which probably belonged to a merchant. However, the lighting now came from a single bulb hanging from an extended cable, and the plaster was rotting on the walls. The electrical wiring clearly needed to be redone, as one could see stretches of cable protruding from the plasterwork. The carpet on the once magnificent staircase was threadbare, and people could easily trip if they were to walk down the stairs in the dark.

One eventually reached the top landing, where a separate toilet had been provided behind a 6-ft high containment of hardboard, which reached nowhere near the top of the 12-ft. ceiling. That was unfortunate, as one of the tenants had a disorder which meant that odours emanated from the landing throughout the day, which were unpleasant for all residents and visitors.

The once magnificent rooms had been converted by dividing walls into relatively small bedsits. They had very high ceilings and minimal heating, and were very cold in winter. The washing and kitchen facilities were scarcely adequate, being of the most primitive kind; and I have already described the toilet. To be fair, that property was hardly a seething mass of human beings—it was semi-derelict.

It was occupied by only a handful of people: a teacher, a student, a council employee and several unemployed people. If the property had been exploited to capacity—if it had been in a fit condition to do that—it could have accommodated five or six times as many people in conditions which might be regarded as unacceptable, but which would have allowed each person a fair amount of space.

It is all very well for single people to live in such circumstances, so long as they choose to do so—as was probably the case with the five tenants ih that property. However, it would be unacceptable for a property such as that to be occupied by those such as the elderly, who had no alternative but to live in such premises. It would be particularly unacceptable for families with children to occupy such a property.

To be fair to the landlord, the cost of renovating such a property and making it fit for habitation was completely unrealistic. That property—a listed building—has now been restored, at public expense, at a cost of more than a third of a million pounds. There is no way in which a private landlord would ever spend that amount on a property, as he could never achieve that sort of return.

Despite the difficulties that all local authorities face in trying to raise the standard of houses in multiple occupation owned by private landlords—for the very real reason that the money is not available to carry out a substantial programme of improvement—it is essential that Parliament lays down minimum standards. During the debate today—and many times in Committee—we heard about the risks associated with HMOs compared with smaller, privately rented accommodation that is let to perhaps one family. The risk of a serious fire is 28 times greater in HMOs. For those reasons, the Liberal Democrats support the amendment calling for mandatory licensing.

It seems odd that the Government are posing as the friend of local authority freedom. After all, most Opposition Members condemn them as the most centralising Government in British history. It is strange that they now advocate that local authorities should have the freedom of choice in these matters. Those of us of a cynical nature would suggest that Government give freedom to local authorities only when it suits them.

I wonder why the Government advocated the proposals in the Bill. It cannot be because a national scheme would be difficult to enforce, yet that was one of the preposterous arguments that were put in Committee. We can imagine a director of housing facing the publicity of a fire such as the one in Harrow that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford), and being exposed to the full scrutiny of the press and his own councillors, and then finding that there was a mandatory scheme but that the local authority and the officers under his direct control had not enforced it properly. At best he could kiss his career prospects goodbye.

The idea that a mandatory scheme would not be enforced properly is ludicrous. It is more likely that it would help the Government to ensure that local authorities received no further support from the Department of the Environment to carry out the obligations that such an amendment would place upon them. Perhaps it would be convenient for the Chancellor to say that local authorities had the freedom to choose whether to take on the additional responsibility; and, if they chose to do so, they would have to decide whether or not to pay the money. Such measures involve costs, and I fear that the new clause represents one way to avoid any burden falling upon the Exchequer.

I wonder whether—I suspect that it is most likely—there are those within the Conservative party—perhaps on its right wing, or perhaps they are now regarded as part of mainstream Conservative thinking—who believe that imposing further regulations on landlords is somehow unacceptable. Some years ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) said that all landlords were cast in the same mould, but some were more mouldy than others. It was a difficult time for him, as, in a blaze of publicity, he had just dealt with a particularly notorious Rachman landlord.

[Mr. Chris Davies]

If we are to solve our housing problems and provide choice and flexibility for those seeking accommodation, it is important to encourage the private sector, but we should not forget that encouragement to private landlords and the freedom for them to earn money in that way involves responsibilities. The Opposition do not avoid that.

In practice, the Bill is concerned more with the appearance than the reality of dealing with HMOs. The hon. Member for Southend, East was concerned that the Government would not reap the full benefits of the initiative that they were attempting to take, and that they would not gain advantage from their proposals. I fear that his words were prophetic. Although the Government are making a gesture towards dealing with the problem, they will not gain the blessing of the housing associations involved, because of the way in which they are promoting the registration scheme, which I fear will not do the job.

In Rochdale, some 180 HMOs are known to the local authority, but the officers there say that there exist probably half as many again that are not known to the local authority. In neighbouring Oldham, the local authority is aware of about 140 HMOs. It is likely that there are another 140 that are not known to the local authority. The scheme proposed by Minister places the onus upon the local authority through the need to publicise the arrangements and ensure proper enforcement, yet many of the landlords who avoid their legal obligations by not making their presence known to the local authority will continue to slip through the net.

Although the proposals contain methods of enforcement, and place obligations on the landlord, and although it may be argued in law that ignorance is no defence, in practice, if a local authority takes to court an HMO landlord who has not previously made himself known, I fear that the court will deal with him leniently if he pleads ignorance. The landlord will receive a rap over the knuckles, and only then will the enforcement procedure commence. It is in the interests of landlords who do not care about their responsibilities or about tenants to find ways of circumventing the Government's schemes, even if local authorities decide to implement them.

A mandatory licensing scheme introduced nationwide would place the obligation firmly on the landlord to declare his properties and their condition; it would make available tough penalties to enforce the Bill's provisions, and would bring into line landlords who might not otherwise comply. Such a scheme would still allow local authorities freedom and flexibility to determine their assessment criteria above the minimum to meet the regulatory standards.

I imagine that local authorities would draw up their own five-star schemes. The basic requirement for one star would be to pass the minimum test laid down by statute to gain registration. A two-star property would still not be considered ideal, but would be deemed suitable for single persons having the freedom to make that choice. It would take five stars for a local authority to say that a property was acceptable as long-term bed-sit accommodation for a family with children. The local authority would have flexibility to determine the arrangements most appropriate for its own circumstances.

Such a scheme acknowledges reality, but the House must deal with the rogues who seek to circumvent regulations, and with slum landlords.

New clause 9 is supported by local government associations, because it would create a national framework and require landlords to face their responsibilities and take action. It would also give local authorities a firm base on which to build. I cannot say that I am particularly sympathetic to the exact wording of the new clause, which seems to give the Secretary of State the right to say yea or nay—something that we have criticised over the years, because that power is not to be given lightly.

I hope that it is not suggested that the blue centralisation of decision taking of the past 17 years will shortly be replaced by red centralisation, but I will give the hon. Member for Greenwich the benefit of the doubt, despite his argument that the Minister should accept the new clause so that a Labour Government could immediately implement the procedures. I like that argument, but I do not think that it will persuade the Minister to change his approach. I assume that the hon. Member for Greenwich tabled his new clause as a way of presenting something different from the proposals debated in Committee. Therefore, the Liberal Democrats will be supporting new clause 9.

Mr. Burden: Some powerful speeches have been made in support of new clause 9. Some extremely ambiguous messages have come from the Government about a national licensing scheme and registration. To give credit where it is due, the Government have indicated to some extent a willingness to do something. As the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) said, the Government have made certain proposals, although I disagree with the hon. Gentleman about their potential effectiveness. I acknowledge that Ministers feel the need to do something—hence the proposal for a registration scheme.

I find it odd that Ministers have undermined their proposals' effectiveness by making the scheme voluntary, which seems to be contradictory. That ambiguity has been present throughout the Bill's passage, and it even predates the Bill's publication. We had quite a long discussion in Committee about some of the consultation documents that preceded the Bill's publication. An odd contradiction and ambiguity was pointed out then, because a lengthy and very good consultation paper was published by the Department of the Environment in November 1994, entitled "Consultation Paper on the Case for Licensing". A rather thinner, two-page document was published by the Welsh Office.

9.15 pm

The DOE paper was very balanced and very clear, and, on its first page, stated that there was a problem that needed to be dealt with. The fact that there was a problem was widely recognised. Paragraph 3—under "secondly", which is odd—of the consultation paper stated:

"there is widespread concern that in many HMOs, physical and management standards are often poor and fire safety precautions inadequate. Although most local authorities are addressing these problems, the proponents of licensing claim that their current powers are too weak or progress in raising standards is too slow."

It is absolutely fair to say that that paragraph does not come out and say, "Therefore, there shall be a licensing scheme." It recognises that there is a problem, and that a large body of opinion recognises that something substantial must be done.

The two-sided letter that came out in Wales also had a third paragraph. It stated:

"There has been some criticism about HMOs which appear to be at a higher risk from fire and in a poorer state of repair. However, providing these homes are in good condition and are safe and well managed, they can successfully meet particular housing needs."

The tone of those two documents was very different, and some of us wonder whether the fact that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) was at the Welsh Office at that time had anything to do with it.

Despite the contradiction in the tone of the two documents, both—I shall deal with the DOE document in particular, because it seems to be rather more substantial—made as a substantial argument against a national licensing scheme, in addition to many arguments in favour of one, the fact that it would require primary legislation. That seems odd, because, a short while later, we are now discussing primary legislation on housing. Ministers had every opportunity to insert such a scheme in primary legislation, but have chosen not to do so.

Ministers may have their own reasons for not doing so, which I shall explore in a moment. I should tell the Minister that, if the Government are worried about introducing primary legislation on a national licensing scheme, this new clause will obviate the need for it. It provides a reserve power. Labour Members cannot understand how Ministers believe that their voluntary scheme will be effective. We cannot understand how there can be consistency in standards for accommodation for all tenants across the country, and yet make the scheme voluntary.

I accept that Ministers believe that that can be done. Why are they then removing the option of bringing in a national licensing scheme if the voluntary scheme is unsuccessful? Let us remember what they said before—that the big problem with a national licensing scheme is that it would require primary legislation, that a long process would have to be gone through to introduce it, and that it might be better to take a different route. They do not have to do that now.

The Government should use primary legislation to insert those reserve powers—then, fine, if the voluntary scheme works and all the local authorities opt for an effective scheme, no one is going to say, "Let's have a national scheme just for the sake of it." If those schemes do not work, Ministers should have the power to do something about it.

The consultation papers triggered a response. As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) has already said, local authority associations were unanimous in their belief that a national licensing scheme was the right option. Apart from those associations, the clear majority of respondents were in favour of a mandatory licensing scheme. The DOE chose, however, to opt for a voluntary registration scheme.

What was odd, however, was that the DOE press notice, which was published on 22 November 1995 and which explained the Government's response, said that the majority of respondents to the 1995 consultation paper welcomed the proposals in principle

"with a variety of opinion on detail."

Sixty per cent. of the respondents called for the Government to consider mandatory licensing for HMOs.

The Government seemed to say in their press release that the majority of respondents supported a voluntary registration scheme, when the respondents to their consultation document patently said the opposite: the majority supported a national licensing scheme.

Hon. Members have already said that fire risk in HMOs is a serious problem. According to the 1991 English house condition survey, 40 per cent. of HMOs are unfit for human habitation; 80 per cent. of them lack an adequate means of escape from fire, and 98 per cent. of local authorities rate the lack of fire safety as the most prevalent problem. Hon. Members have already said that the risk of fire in HMOs is 28 times greater than that in self-contained housing, as is the appalling problem of carbon monoxide poisoning, which we discussed when we considered new clause 4.

In my area of Birmingham, there are about 5,000 HMOs. We know that some of those are in good condition, and that some are run by responsible landlords who would have no problem with a national licensing scheme. There are far too many other HMOs that are in a dangerous condition and a poor state of repair. In my part of the country, as in others, far too many are accidents waiting to happen. In my constituency, 80 per cent. of the young people who are helped by the south Birmingham young homeless project end up in hostel accommodation, which suffer from the precise problems that I have described. Those youngsters have ended up potentially vulnerable as a result.

On Second Reading and in Committee, and even before the Bill was published, hon. Members on both sides of the House did a lot of good work to alert people to the problem. The hon. Members for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) and for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson) spoke eloquently in Committee about the need to do something about the appalling conditions in HMOs.

I must ask those hon. Members and the Government whether we are solely concerned about HMOs and the risks they pose to safety. Surely not. The Labour party accepts that standards and the extent of the problem may vary around the country, but is anyone seriously suggesting that standards of accommodation and safety should vary between one part of the country and another? No one has suggested, either in Committee or tonight, that standards should differ. Unless that was argued, surely there is every reason to provide at least reserve powers for a national licensing scheme.

In Committee, we were pressed about the need to respect the freedom of local authorities in this matter—no doubt we will hear the same argument tonight. As my hon. Friends have already said, we take that with a rather large bucketful of salt, given the Government's actions on local authority freedoms. Let them remember that their scheme does not provide local authorities with freedom. The only freedom it gives them is the freedom to have a scheme or not to have one. As soon as authorities decide to have a scheme, their freedoms disappear because at that point the contents of the scheme become subject to central control.

[Mr. Burden]

Let us explore the freedom not to have a registration scheme at all. It means the freedom to allow an accident to happen in a local authority's area without doing anything about it. No local authority that I know would welcome such a freedom.

Let us think, too, about the people who are arguably more important than local authorities or Members of this House—the tenants. They are the ones who will end up suffering the consequences—the fatalities described by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich —of inadequate conditions in houses in multiple occupation. The Government are giving local authorities the right to opt into registration schemes. Where is the right of the tenants to opt into such schemes? They will not be consulted when it comes to bringing a registration scheme into operation.

Labour Members have made it clear that we want a national licensing system, and we see no reason for delay: we want the proposal included in this Bill. Ministers say that they do not think that that is the right approach; they want a voluntary system. We do not think that adequate. But even if Ministers feel as they do, why are they disallowing the suggestion of beefing up this legislation, which would involve no extra parliamentary manoeuvres at all and which could be put into effect if these regulations, as we believe they will, prove inadequate? There is no reason to refuse the reserve power for which we are calling.

I ask Ministers even at this late stage to consider the tenants—the ones who matter—who will suffer without such a scheme, and to agree to the new clause.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North–East): It has been clear in this debate that there is widespread support for a national mandatory licensing scheme for HMOs. There is, for instance, support from organisations such as the Campaign for Bedsit Rights and Shelter, and from organisations representing tenants and would-be tenants. I suppose that no one will find that surprising.

There is also support from the regulatory sector, from the local government associations. The Association of London Government has written to me about this, and I know that other local authority associations take the same view. There is also support from specialists in local government. The head of environmental health in the borough of Newham has drawn my attention to the view of the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health, expressed when it learned that the Government were not proposing to go ahead with mandatory licensing—contrary to what appeared likely at one stage. The institute said:

"The Chartered Institute has supported the concept of licensing for HMOs since at least 1985; it considers that licensing would have a number of unique benefits . . . we still believe that a national, uniform, mandatory licensing scheme is necessary, that its benefits cannot all be achieved otherwise, and we are disappointed, not least given the overwhelming weight of opinion behind our views, that the Government does not accept these arguments."

The Government should take note of that well-expressed professional view.

There would be important benefits as well for the landlord sector, the other major player. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) quoted the chairman of Quality Street, who said that he saw no objection to a licensing scheme. One reason for advancing such a scheme is to make life more straightforward for landlords. Current law is extremely complex and confusing; that problem is exacerbated by the differing policies and enforcement practices employed by local authorities, and sometimes by officers and departments within authorities. Both those can make it extremely difficult for landlords to know what standards are regarded as acceptable. They often experience the law and the way that it is implemented as arbitrary and there is a disincentive for them to enter or remain in the market. The uncertainty also makes it difficult for landlords to plan expenditure on properties. A scheme of the kind we suggest would therefore have significant benefits for landlords as well.

9.30 pm

The large contingent of Blackpool hoteliers who attended the sitting of the Committee when we discussed this issue made a great impression on me. Those hoteliers felt very strongly that the Government needed to take a much stronger line on HMOs and they were concerned about the effect of badly run HMOs on their businesses. The hon. Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson), who is not in his place this evening, said—rightly, in my view—that

"the problem is not just the effect of houses in multiple occupation on those who live in them but, in many cases—particularly in seaside resorts, as my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and I well know—the effect that badly run HMOs have on businesses and local residents in the surrounding area".—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 20 February 1996; c. 231.]

The hoteliers were present for the whole sitting of the Committee that discussed the issue and they were anxious that the Committee took a firm line. They wanted a national mandatory licensing scheme and they were very disappointed that the Committee did not support that. I emphasise the point that there is wide support for the proposal from tenants and local authorities, and from landlords. I hope that the Minister will take that into account when he responds to the debate.

I hope that the Minister will focus his attention on the following questions. Why is it right that HMOs in some parts of the country should not be registered? What are the characteristics—for example, housing or environmental characteristics—that prevail in some parts of the country which lead the Government to conclude that registration and licensing would not be appropriate in those areas? The Government may be able to advance reasons why registration would not be appropriate in some parts of the country, but we have not heard them yet. I have no idea what they might be; if the Government are not able to give us those reasons, new clause 9 should be accepted. I await the Minister's answer with interest, because that point is at the heart of the debate.

The Under–Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), who participated in the debate on this subject in Committee, went so far as to suggest that the councils that did not introduce licensing schemes would fall into the category of rogue councils. If it is the Government's view that the only people who would not introduce licensing schemes would be rogues and lunatics, surely it should be a mandatory national scheme.

Why the Government have not come forward with a national mandatory licensing scheme is something of a mystery to all of us. It appeared from the initial consultation paper that that was in the Government's mind. We know that responses to the consultation paper were overwhelmingly in favour of a national mandatory scheme. It appears to many of us—as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) suggested a few moments ago—that the views of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), the previous Secretary of State for Wales, may have had something to do with the change of heart, as may the lurch to the right that was occurring in the Conservative party at that time. That dispute in the Conservative party may be the reason why the Government have not come forward with proposals, but we need to know.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich mentioned a couple of tragic cases in which people have died as a result of conditions in HMOs. Tracy Murphy, who lived in Hull, was one of those people. The other was Matt Cohn, who died in a fire in a two-storey house in Christchurch gardens in Wealdstone. I wish to mention a couple of other cases. Angela Stickland was two weeks short of her 21st birthday when she died in a bed-sit fire in Chesham in Buckinghamshire in November 1989. The South Buckinghamshire coroner recorded a verdict of accidental death in that case, but said that such houses are quite clearly an added fire risk. That happened in the area covered by Chiltern district council. Another case involved Michael Tighe, who died aged 30 in hospital as a result of burns sustained in an horrific bed-sit fire on Outercircle green, Lincoln.

The locations are Hull, Chiltern district, Harrow Wealdstone and Lincoln. There is nothing obvious that these areas have in common. There are no areas where controls are not needed. Controls are needed everywhere. There should be a national scheme. I hope that the Minister will accept that argument, or set out the circumstances in which he believes that registration would not be helpful.

Only a reserve power is proposed. That appeared to be what the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) was arguing for. He said that, if the arrangements set out in the Bill are unsuccessful, a national mandatory scheme should be introduced. That is exactly what implementation of the new clause would provide.

It is widely recognised that the present arrangements are inappropriate. The Government have set out the case for licensing and registration. The question before the House is, what importance do we attach to local authorities taking up the powers that the Bill would make available to them? Are we talking about something that it would merely be nice to have, or is it essential, as Opposition Members argued in Committee and again in the Chamber this evening, that the proposed powers are used so that tragedies can be brought to an end?

Mr. Sutcliffe: This has been a detailed debate. My hon. Friends have put the issues well and truly before the House, as they did in Committee. They have based their evidence on the thousands of people who contributed to the consultation document.

It would be unfortunate if all the evidence was pushed to one side because of political dogma that causes the Government to say, "We shall not regulate any more." It would be especially unfortunate because safety regulations are so important in this instance. It seems that the Government want vulnerable people to take the route of private rented accommodation. Vulnerable people include the single homeless, single parents with young children and families generally. They find themselves on short-term tenancies. Society must ensure that they are protected. In effect, the Government direct such people into private rented accommodation because they do not allow local authorities to build houses.

The Government are taking the gamble that is represented by houses in multiple occupation. They are gambling with other people's lives. A mandatory national licensing scheme would cut the risks that face the vulnerable. It ill becomes the Government to say, "Let's leave it to local authorities. They will sort it all out." The Government have done everything they can to remove powers and resources from local authorities.

The indictment against the Government is that they are not prepared, given all the evidence produced by my hon. Friends and the problems that are to be found in the private rented sector, with the high number of 638,000 dwellings used for multiple occupation that are in a state of disrepair, to be consistent by introducing a national registration scheme. Such a scheme would enable people in HMOs to feel safe and secure while paying an affordable rent.

Local authorities could assist if they had sufficient resources. Local authorities throughout the country tell us that they cannot respond adequately to the massive number of regulations that face them, given their lack of resources. Yet the Government continue to move people into HMOs. They are prepared to exempt certain buildings. We have heard this evening of many terrible tragedies. In many areas, HMOs are death traps.

I hope that the Minister will reconsider even at this late stage. The debate has taken some time, and people have looked at the matter in terms of the evidence from professionals who work in the sector and have tried to ensure that they convince the Government that a national mandatory scheme is the only way forward. The voluntary scheme that the Government propose is not acceptable because it may not operate in the areas where it needs to operate. I hope that the Minister will reflect on the matter.

People will lay the fault at the Minister's door if there are further tragedies. They will blame the Minister's failure to be consistent in this matter, especially when the Government have pointed people in the direction of multi-occupied housing as a means of providing social housing. I hope that, even at this late stage, the Minister will reconsider.

Mr. Clappison: This is an important subject. The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) was right on at least one point when he said that we had had a detailed debate. I am not sure that I go along with the rest of his contribution. It has been a detailed debate, and I listened carefully to the contribution by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford). I hope that I shall not offend the hon. Gentleman too much if I say that I also listened carefully to his speech in Committee and I now feel that I am something of a veteran in terms of the points he raises.

Notwithstanding some of the expressions that the hon. Gentleman used, there is a large measure of agreement on several points connected with houses in multiple occupation. I do not dissent from what he said about this being a big issue affecting many properties and, therefore, many tenants. I do not disagree with him when he says that, in some circumstances, standards are unsatisfactory and need to be addressed. I particularly do not disagree with him when he implies that there is a need for appropriate powers to deal adequately with those problems.

[Mr. Clappison]

The hon. Gentleman was right when he said that there were two differences between the Government and the Opposition; I put it to the hon. Gentleman that the differences have narrowed to two. First, there is the question whether there should be a national licensing scheme, which is the subject of the new clause, and, secondly, there is the question of which types of houses in multiple occupation should be excluded from the scheme.

In one of the less immediately transparent and direct passages in the hon. Gentleman's speech, he dwelt at some length on that point, but then added that, of course, the Government were prepared to listen on that point and had tabled amendments. I shall come to what the Government propose when I turn to those amendments. The hon. Gentleman can see that the Government have thought about the matter carefully and have taken the exclusions from the Bill. We do have proposals, which I shall outline when we come to the relevant amendments. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that, when deciding which types of property should be included in the scheme, we have to judge the degree of risk. I think that that was implicit in what he said.

I take issue with the hon. Gentleman on a national licensing scheme. What he said throughout his speech was undermined by the fact that he put his case rather too high. He certainly put it too high when he suggested that the Government's proposals were ineffective because they did not include national licensing. He confused licensing and powers, and he underestimated the significant and important powers that the Bill will put in place which will allow local authorities to tackle the problem of houses in multiple occupation—powers that will, most importantly, differ in different circumstances. The hon. Gentleman is aware of the differences that will occur between local authorities that adopt powers under the control provisions and local authorities that adopt the special control provisions that they feel are needed to deal with their local circumstances.

It will assist the House if I take it briefly through the effects of some of the powers. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) was absolutely right when he said, in an excellent speech, that the powers were stronger, clearer and more precise, and would make a substantial difference; he said that they were an important step forward. Those powers will be of benefit to residents in the Milton ward in Southend-on-Sea, which my hon. Friend mentioned, and in Westcliff-on-Sea, as they will assist other local authorities in similar circumstances, possibly in coastal resorts. Local authorities throughout the country will have the opportunity to adopt the powers which, in many cases, are tailored to meet their needs. They certainly reflect concerns that local authorities and residents have expressed.

It is important for the House to concentrate on the control provisions and their effectiveness for the local authorities that choose to adopt them. When the control provisions have been adopted by local authorities as part of a registration scheme, the authorities will have the opportunity to refuse to register HMOs when they fall below standard in a number of important respects—for example, when a house is unsuitable and incapable of being made suitable for occupation; where the person having control of the house or the person intended to be the person managing the house is not a fit and proper person; and where the house needs work to be brought up to scratch. Those important provisions place power in the hands of local authorities.

9.45 pm

I hope that all those who are aware of the tragic cases referred to in the debate will reflect on those powers, which are significant and address the problems of HMOs. The powers go further for local authorities that feel that they have a particular need because of the effect of HMOs on their area as a result of the way in which those houses are managed. Such authorities can go further and adopt the special control provisions, which provide a further tightening of the powers concerned. These important powers will enable local authorities—including those in coastal resorts—to bring to an end the state of affairs that is causing problems to residents.

We heard in Committee from my hon. Friends the Members for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) and for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson), and today the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) referred to the close interest being shown by Blackpool hoteliers in this issue. The hon. Gentleman may not know that my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North has been in contact with me both today and in the past about the matter. I believe that he is in the Chamber now, and that he has brought a delegation of hoteliers from Blackpool to talk about the problems. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] My hon. Friend has certainly been here during the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), who is here, has taken a great interest in the matter, and he is well aware of the problems in his constituency.

The Government have listened to all the representations, and the argument comes down to this: the special control provisions that are in place in the legislation will give authorities in coastal resorts the opportunity and the discretion to deal with the sort of problems that they are telling us about. Authorities can refuse to register the properties in question, or can issue an occupancy direction that will curtail the state of affairs about which the authority or the residents have complained.

The hon. Member for Greenwich said that there was a lack of standardisation in this area, and asked about landlords moving from an area that has control provisions or special control provisions to another.

Mr. Raynsford indicated assent.

Mr. Clappison: I see that the hon. Member for Greenwich is nodding his head. That was one of the slightly less practical points in his speech, and I would respectfully draw his attention to the other measures in the legislation. Clause 73 establishes a national code of practice that can be used in evidence in any civil or criminal proceedings.

We are building on the provisions that are already in place which create important duties that those responsible for HMOs must fulfil. Clause 71 takes further the duty of people having control of HMOs to prevent certain states of affairs that have a bad affect from coming into being, and makes it an offence for someone to be in breach of that duty, which can be actionable in damages.

In my respectful submission to the House, there is in place in the legislation a tough and appropriate package of powers that will give local authorities the opportunity to deal with the problems in HMOs about which the House has heard. Those problems vary in their nature and incidence throughout the country. There must be flexibility. Flexibility is built into the legislation in terms of the strength of the powers that local authorities can take. It is important that local authorities reflect on that. If they feel that they have a problem in respect of HMOs, the powers are there for them to adopt.

I do not see local authorities permitting a state of affairs in which landlords move from one area to another to create problems with HMOs. The opportunity is there for all local authorities to deal with those problems by adopting the powers, which the hon. Member for Greenwich—who is fair in many respects—will accept are tough and effective. We have not heard any criticism of the effectiveness of the powers. It would be a mistake to undermine the effectiveness of the legislation by confusing licensing with powers and to overlook the fact that the powers that we have provided create opportunities for local authorities to opt, if they choose to do so, in an important way into dealing with the problems that HMOs can cause.

We have introduced a wholly effective and tough set of proposals which provide the opportunity for local authorities to deal with what both Conservative and Opposition Members agree can be serious problems.

Mr. Raynsford: We have had an extremely good debate this evening. We have heard a number of valuable, thoughtful speeches. The debate has shown a clear majority in favour of a mandatory national licensing scheme. My hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts), for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), for Newham, North–East (Mr. Timms), and for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) and the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Davies) all spoke in favour of a mandatory national licensing scheme. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), in a thoughtful and forceful speech, made what I might describe as an each-way bet on the option.

According to my tally, that gives us from the Back Benches five and a half in favour to a halt against a national mandatory licensing scheme. If the Front Benches are added in, that gives us six and a half in favour to one and a half against—a slightly larger majority than the majority of 75 per cent. of those who responded to the Government's consultation paper in November 1994 who said rightly that at that date there was a need for a national licensing scheme. As many of my hon. Friends have said, that was all the local authority associations. They all want it.

The voice of dissent here is the voice of the Minister. He seemed disappointed to hear the same arguments as he had heard in Committee. That is the result of arguing these things out. If the Government had accepted our case in Committee, he would not have had to listen to me again today. It is his fault for not accepting the argument. That is the nature of democracy.

I accepted in Committee that there was an awareness and acceptance on the Government Benches that there was a problem of poor conditions, squalor, exploitation, bad landlords and, above all, life-threatening conditions such as dangerous gas appliances and lack of fire safety precautions which killed an unacceptable number of people every year in rotten houses in multiple occupation. All those things argue the case for more effective measures. The Minister said today that the Government were introducing more effective powers. He referred specifically to three items, to which I should like to respond briefly.

The Minister referred to the control powers and placing powers in the hands of the local authorities. I acknowledge that he rightly said that we had not argued against the powers. What we have argued against is the fact that the powers will not be mandatory—that there will not be a requirement on local authorities to operate them. As my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield said, in an entirely accurate and perceptive comment, it brings little or no satisfaction to a tenant living in unacceptable conditions who wants action if the local authority, for whatever reason—be it indifference, lack of care or scarce resources and considering that there are other priorities—says that it will not do anything about the situation and that it is not prepared to introduce the control powers.

While we welcome the powers, we believe that they should apply everywhere, because the problems exist everywhere. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North–East rightly said, the fire tragedies have occurred in places as far afield as Lincoln, Harrow and other parts of the country. We are not talking about problems that are concentrated in certain areas or in seaside towns; we are talking about national problems—and there must be a national response.

The Minister referred to the special control provisions that apply in coastal resorts. The case for such provisions has been made overwhelmingly by coastal resorts. The exact same argument applies: we welcome the special control provisions, although we shall query one or two details when we come to later amendments, but we want them to apply everywhere: we do not want them to be selected by, say, Blackpool but not by other resorts where the same problems may apply.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I understand that local authorities asked for—pressed for—these powers. Would it not, therefore, be perverse of them not to use the powers when they have been given the opportunity to do so because they have not been compelled to do so?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman may be correct, but local authorities already have powers to register HMOs under existing legislation and only about 100 out of the 300 or so local authorities have registration schemes in place. The existing powers are not adequate—we want to see them strengthened—and they are not used extensively. On that precedent, I fear that the creation of the new powers will not change the position and that some authorities will take a more serious view of their responsibilities than others.

[Mr. Raynsford]

Although we may chide authorities—we may talk about the failure of authorities and about irresponsible authorities—the tragedy will be for the individuals who live in squalid conditions in places where the authorities have not introduced the scheme and who have no effective remedy or redress. We take the view that there is a need for a national framework.

The third issue that the Minister prayed in aid was the fact that clause 73 allows him or the Secretary of State the power to issue codes of practice. Codes of practice are all very well, but they are only codes of practice—they can be ignored. It does not in any way counter our argument that we need an effective national mandatory licensing scheme. Such a scheme is necessary.

Without a national mandatory licensing scheme, the dreadful toll of deaths will continue year after year, and we shall hear the names that we have etched in our memories—such as Clanricarde gardens in London, Palmeira avenue in Hove, the hotel in Scarborough and the recent fire in Harrow. We will hear case after case, name after name, of people who die through carbon monoxide poisoning—such as Tracy Murphy. We will hear again and again of squalid conditions, of people crammed into unsanitary conditions, as the hon. Member for Southend, East described so movingly in his speech—15 or so people were crammed into squalid and unacceptable conditions, which is shocking.

If the Minister and the environmental health officer visit such HMOs, perhaps they will take action and close them. If they do not visit such HMOs, they will not know that they are a fire risk because there is no national framework. Those tragedies will continue, as in the case of Harrow. We owe it to the hundreds of people who are killed as a result of fires and faulty gas appliances in HMOs to take more effective action. We owe it to them to take action on a national scale, not only on a local scale. We owe it to them to introduce a national mandatory licensing scheme.

In conclusion, the one thing that the Minister did not say in his response was what will replace the provisions that the Government have now wisely chosen to remove from the Bill. As I highlighted in my speech, the Government are removing the restrictive provisions in clause 63(2) which will prevent local authorities from registering certain properties. What they are not saying is which properties will be included.

Until we have a clear indication that there will be a comprehensive national licensing scheme covering all HMOs where such risks arise, we shall say that the Government's response is inadequate, and we shall continue to press for a national scheme. I urge hon. Members who feel as strongly as we do—whatever their persuasion—to join us in the Lobby.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 220, Noes 278.

Division No. 113] [10.00 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Ms Janet (Ros'dale)
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Austin-Walker, John
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Burden, Richard
Byers, Stephen
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cann, Jamie
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Chris (L'Boro & S'worth)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge Hl)
Denham, John
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Dowd, Jim
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Etherington, Bill
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foulkes, George
Fraser, John
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godsiff, Roger
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike
Harman, Ms Harriet
Henderson, Doug
Hendron, Dr Joe
Hill, Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Hoon, Geoffrey
Howarth, Alan (Strat'rd-on-A)
Howarth, George (Knowsley North)
Howells, Dr Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hutton, John
Jackson, Helen (Shef'ld, H)
Jamieson, David
Jenkins, Brian (SE Staff)
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Khabra, Piara S
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kirkwood, Archy
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loyden, Eddie
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAvoy, Thomas
McCartney, Ian
Macdonald, Calum
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McMaster, Gordon
MacShane, Denis
Madden, Max
Maddock, Diana
Mahon, Alice
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Martin, Michael J (Springburn)
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll & Bute)
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Mike (N W'kshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
O'Neill, Martin
Parry, Robert
Pearson, Ian

Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Pope, Greg
Powell, Ray (Ogmore)
Prentice, Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Raynsford, Nick
Reid, Dr John
Rendel, David
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Roche, Mrs Barbara
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Chris (Isl'ton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Rachel (Dunfermline W)
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Steinberg, Gerry
Strang, Dr. Gavin
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watson, Mike
Welsh, Andrew
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Wise, Audrey
Worthington, Tony
Wray, Jimmy
Wright, Dr Tony
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mrs. Jane Kennedy and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Aitken, Rt Hon Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Amess, David
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkins, Rt Hon Robert
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Bates, Michael
Batiste, Spencer
Bendall, Vivian
Beresford, Sir Paul
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Sir Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Sir Rhodes
Brandreth, Gyles
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Sir Graham
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Brown, M (Brigg & Cthorpes)
Browning, Mrs Angela
Budgen, Nicholas
Burt, Alistair
Butler, Peter
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Sir Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sir Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Ru'cliff)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Coe, Sebastian
Congdon, David
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'lre)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Sir Anthony
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Rt Hon Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Rt Hon Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Freeman, Rt Hon Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Sir Peter
Gale, Roger
Gallie, Phil
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, Sir John
Grant, Sir A (SW Cambs)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Grylls, Sir Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archibald
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Rt Hon Jeremy
Hannam, Sir John
Hargreaves, Andrew
Haselhurst, Sir Alan
Hawkins, Nick
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hendry, Charles
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Horam, John
Hordern, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Howell, Sir Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Robert B (W Hertfdshr)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Key, Robert
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, Sir David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Legg, Barry
Leigh, Edward
Lennox-Boyd, Sir Mark
Lester, Sir James (Broxtowe)
Lidington, David
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mans, Keith
Marland, Paul
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Dr Brian
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Moate, Sir Roger
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Needham, Rt Hon Richard
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Patnick, Sir Irvine
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Pickles, Eric
Porter, David (Waveney)
Powell, William (Corby)
Rathbone, Tim
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Riddick, Graham
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'r S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Sir Timothy
Scott, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Sir Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Nicholas
Speed, Sir Keith
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Sir Michael (S Worcs)
Spink, Dr Robert
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stephen, Michael
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan

Streeter, Gary
Sumberg, David
Sweeney, Walter
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (N Tayside)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'fld)
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Dr. Liam Fox and
Mr. Simon Burns.

Question accordingly negatived.

It being after Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Housing Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Question agreed to.

Clause 63

MAKING AND APPROVAL OF REGISTRATION SCHEMES

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 44, in page 35, line 40, leave out from beginning to end of line 7 on page 36.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 52.

Mr. Clappison: The amendment has been somewhat foreshadowed. In Committee there was concern that exclusions to the houses in multiple occupation registration schemes in clause 63 were too extensive and would leave many houses in multiple occupation which were in a poor condition outside the scope of registration schemes. We have proposed that smaller HMOs and houses that have been converted entirely into self-contained flats should be exempt from registration as they are likely to be at a lower risk from fire than larger properties or to offer better facilities.

In the light of the concerns of which we heard in Committee, we decided that there was a case for looking again at the way the exclusions are framed. We have therefore decided to remove all the exemptions from the primary legislation. A similar set of exclusions will be included instead in the model registration scheme that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will prepare, subject to some changes which I shall mention in a moment. The model registration scheme will also exclude from registration other categories of property—for example, houses covered by specific regulatory regimes. We wish to exclude also those properties managed by institutions, which might include universities and properties managed by the national health service and housing associations—some of which were mentioned in Committee.

Removing those exclusions from the face of the Bill will allow local authorities more flexibility. In some areas, there may be justifiable reasons why they would wish to register a particular category of property that is normally exempt from the model registration scheme. It will also facilitate future changes to the excluded categories when the results of our proposed research into fire risks in houses in multiple occupation are available in a year or two.

In the model scheme, we are also minded to make some changes to the list of excluded categories currently set out in clause 63. We envisage that we will exclude houses where, apart from the household of the owner or the manager, there are no more than three other persons rather than four as we proposed originally. We are trying also to frame an exclusion to cover houses that have been converted entirely into self-contained flats, many of which are owner occupied.

As we discussed in Committee, the problem of framing an exclusion based on the tenure of the occupants has proved problematical. However, we are considering excluding houses where there is a significant percentage of owner-occupied flats—for example, where at least one third of the flats are let on long leases. We shall, of course, consult interested parties about the content of the model scheme, and consultees will be invited to comment on the proposed exclusions at that time.

The amendment demonstrates that we have listened carefully to, and endeavoured to meet, the concerns that have been put to us. I hope that all the amendments will be welcomed on both sides of the House.

10.15 pm

Mr. Raynsford: The Minister knows that we welcome the decision to withdraw the very restrictive provisions in clause 63(2). However, we are concerned about what will be put in its place.

The Minister has begun to flesh out his proposals in that regard. We are concerned that he has talked about exclusions similar to the existing provisions in clause 63. We are particularly concerned that he did not refer to the size of buildings. Do the Government intend to exclude buildings of two storeys or less? If so, the kind of property that I described in Harrow, where the dreadful fire occurred, would not be covered.

We welcome the decision to reduce the number of people from four to three in the category of houses that are occupied by no more than a specified number of people. We welcome the decision to distinguish owner-occupied, self-contained properties from tenanted properties where there are more likely to be problems—although we recognise the potential difficulties involved with a definition.

This is a complex issue that will require careful attention if we are to get the detail right. It will clearly be difficult for the Minister to do that in the Bill's later stages in the other place. I hope, therefore, that all interested parties—particularly the local authorities and the voluntary organisations, including the Campaign for Bedsit Rights, which has done much stalwart work in that area—will have an opportunity to look at the proposals in detail before the Government proceed. I hope also that the Government will listen to the responses to that consultation.

We need arrangements that will work and will ensure that people at risk in such properties have proper protection. While welcoming the Government's decision to remove the highly restrictive provisions in clause 63(2), we remain concerned that the Government's replacement provisions could be still too restrictive and would, unfortunately, leave some people at risk. I hope that the Minister will pay close heed to what is said by all concerned and will be flexible in his approach to the matter.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 64

REGISTRATION SCHEMES: CONTROL PROVISIONS

Amendments made: No. 45, in page 38, line 21, at end insert—

'(d) to impose such conditions relating to the management of the house during the period of registration as the authority may determine.'.

No. 46, in page 38, line 26, leave out second 'or'.

No. 47, in page 38, line 28, at end insert 'or ( ) impose conditions relating to the management of the house.'.

No. 48, in page 38, line 35, after 'application,', insert—

'( ) notify an applicant that they intend to impose conditions relating to the management of the house'.

No. 49, in page 39, line 3, at end insert—

'( ) Where the decision of the authority was to impose conditions relating to the management of the house, the court may direct the authority to grant the application without imposing the conditions or to impose the conditions as varied in such manner as the court may direct.'.

No. 50, in page 39, line 23, at end insert—

'(2A) Control provisions may enable the local housing authority to revoke a registration if they consider that there has been a breach of conditions relating to the management of the house.'.

No. 51, in page 39, line 28, after '(1)', insert 'or (2A)'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 65

REGISTRATION SCHEMES: SPECIAL CONTROL PROVISIONS

Amendment made: No. 52, in page 41, line 28, leave out '(in accordance with section 346(2))'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Amendment proposed: No. 53, in page 42, line 1, leave out 'the Rent Acts or'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 54 to 57.

Mr. Raynsford: We welcome the amendment in part as it deals with an issue that we highlighted in Committee whereby under the original provisions tenants risked losing their tenancies. The Government have accepted our logic to the point of deleting the phrase "the Rent Acts" so that tenants who enjoy regulated tenancies will no longer be subjected to that risk. A tenant with an assured tenancy, however, could lose his or her tenancy, so we are surprised that the amendment does not cover those tenants.

I hope that the Government will reflect on that. Our intention was simply to ensure that landlords could not override tenants' normal security on a technicality because of the poor condition of the property. I hope that the Government will think again and ensure that that is not a consequence of their action.

Mr. Clappison: As the hon. Gentleman said, the amendment reflects concerns that were expressed in Committee. It goes so far as assisting those with security of tenure when local authorities invoke occupancy directions or take other measures. We are always prepared to reflect upon those circumstances, but I cannot promise to meet the further concerns that the hon. Gentleman has outlined today.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 66

OFFENCES IN CONNECTION WITH REGISTRATION SCHEMES

Amendment made: No. 54, in page 43, line 32, leave out '3' and insert '4'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 67

STEPS REQUIRED TO INFORM PUBLIC ABOUT SCHEME

Amendment made: No. 55, in page 44, line 30, at end insert—

'(2) In section 350(1) of the Housing Act 1985 (power to require information for purposes of scheme) for the words "a person" substitute "the person having control of the house or the person managing the house or any person".'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 71

DUTY TO KEEP PREMISES FIT FOR NUMBER OF OCCUPANTS

Amendment made: No. 56, in page 46, line 26, leave out 'knowingly'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 74

INCREASE OF FINES

Amendment made: No. 57, in page 48, line 22, leave out '4' and insert '5'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Consideration adjourned—[Mr. Brandreth.]

To be further considered tomorrow.

Habitual Residence Test

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

10.21 pm

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North–East): In October 1993, the Secretary of State for Social Security stood before the Conservative party conference and described a new scourge which he said was sweeping the continent. In the abusive terms that our European partners have come to expect from the British Government, he employed a range of "'Allo, 'Allo" accents to conjure up a vivid picture of benefit tourists—back packers and the like from around Europe who come to Britain, pretend to look for work and claim benefit.

If one can ignore the crudity of that speech, which may have been required to please the Conservative party conference, it is easy to feel some sympathy for the Secretary of State, who had identified a problem that required a solution. Benefit tourism certainly was not the largest fraud in the social security system—indeed, it had never satisfactorily been quantified—but it was an undesirable phenomenon.

Having identified the problem, the Secretary of State announced his solution—the habitual residence test. It was introduced in August 1994 and it soon became obvious that, whatever its original intention, the test was reaching well beyond the scope of benefit tourism. In its first 15 months of operation, only 36 per cent. of those who failed the test were from other European countries; 22 per cent. were from Britain and 42 per cent. were from elsewhere. The figures for February this year—the latest available in the Library although I am grateful to the Minister who today provided me with the figures for March—show that the proportion of non-Europeans failing the test remained at just 36 per cent. while the number of British failures has risen dramatically to the same figure.

The position is clear. The habitual residence test does not merely deal with the Secretary of State's benefit tourists from elsewhere in Europe; it casts a much wider net and it withdraws the means of subsistence from many people from whom the Government did not and should not intend to withdraw subsistence. By withdrawing support from UK citizens, the Government are failing the test. The Minister will be aware of an important study by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux published in February, "Failing the Test", which draws on evidence from more than 200 bureaux throughout the country. The report's conclusions are succinct, reasonable and fiercely critical of the Government. It stated:

> "After eighteen months of its operation, the CAB Service has concluded that the test should be withdrawn. It has proved expensive, unfair and unworkable and has no part in a sensible and humane welfare system."

That is a ringing and unequivocal verdict by an unimpeachable source. The report backs that conclusion with great detail, and shows that

> "in seeking to deal with one relatively small problem, the Government has created many more."

The report points out that the test has > "created a class of people who, whilst able to live freely and work in the UK, are denied access to its welfare system."

The report adds that many people from ethnic minorities

> "who lived and worked in this country for years have been excluded from help because they have travelled abroad for a period to stay with relatives."

The report states that

> "it has proved impossible to produce a workable definition of habitual residence" that can be consistently applied. Appeals against failing the test by CAB clients are won in the majority of cases, adding to the evidence that the test is being inconsistently and unfairly applied. The test is costing much more than was anticipated to administer. However one looks at the test, it is doing great damage that greatly outweighs the cash savings to which it has led. I will return to NACAB's detailed recommendations, but real, human problems are at the centre of habitual residency cases.

One welfare adviser in my constituency remarked recently that public attention has shifted from the hardship caused by the test in recent months. She does not think that things have got any better or that the hardship has become accepted, but that newer injustices equally forcing people into penury—she was thinking in particular of the removal of benefits for asylum seekers—have stolen the spotlight. One way to stem criticism of an unfair measure is to introduce another, but the Government must not be allowed to ignore the large number of real and unintended hardship cases caused by the test.

The Newham docklands advice bureau, which covers part of my constituency, was visited recently by a young woman who went temporarily to Ghana, where her mother lives. When she returned, she was forced to undergo the habitual residence test and failed. That woman is disabled and unable to find work, and now she cannot claim benefits. What is she supposed to do? She was born in Britain and is a British citizen, but that is how her country is treating her. Sometimes the hardship is temporary, but it is no less unjustified for that. A Newham pensioner went to visit relatives in Bangladesh for six weeks, and on his return was forced to undergo the test. While he awaited the result, his income support was withdrawn. His family was forced to borrow money to buy food to subsist. Where is the sense or humanity in a system that works that way?

The worst aspect of the test is that it often hits people who are already facing a crisis. Twin 17-year-old sisters who recently sought advice in Newham both hold British passports and had lived in the UK with their father since 1994. Last year, their father died and after a habitual residence test interview, the sisters were refused income support. In addition to their bereavement, the Government forced them to face destitution.

When the Secretary of State set off in pursuit of back-packing benefit tourists at the Tory party conference, did he have in mind any of the people to whom I have referred? The answer is no—but those people and thousands like them are being hit by the test. The Government responded to their critics by saying that no one has devised a fairer measure that would make the same savings, but that argument is indefensible. It is absurd to say that a measure is good because it saves money, regardless of its ill effects on innocent people. It is like saying that the way to stop football hooliganism is to ban everyone from soccer grounds. If Ministers are really saying that they will do anything to cut the social security budget, irrespective of its effect on people who were not intended to be affected, they must accept that they will lose any claim to decency that they retain.

It is not true that critics of the test have not offered constructive proposals to refine it and to reduce its injustices while keeping loopholes to Euro-scroungers firmly closed. The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux set out seven specific recommendations in its report—short of abolishing the test, which is what it and I believe should happen—to fulfil the objectives. The first three involve changes to secondary legislation. NACAB proposes, first, that benefit regulations should be amended so that those who are considered settled by immigration authorities are treated as habitually resident. Secondly, where a claimant is certified as having no other means of support, an appeal against a habitual residence decision must be held within four weeks. Thirdly, failed applicants should be paid income support pending their appeal.

In response to the first of those points, the Government told NACAB—I just received today the Government's response to its proposals—that under the European treaties it is not possible to discriminate on the basis of nationality. That is true within Europe and is why the regulation was framed in a rather convoluted way in the first place. The proposal is not that the Government discriminate in that way between citizens of European nations. NACAB points out that a person with settled status is, by definition, not an European economic area national, so no discrimination between member states can be involved.

On the second proposal, the Government implicitly concede that the tortuously slow processes of their appeal system cause hardship, but they argue that it would be unfair to relieve that hardship in habitual residence cases and not in others. We are talking about the means for people to subsist. Surely something must be done to speed the process up and end the extremely long periods that people must currently endure with no means of subsistence other than that gained from borrowing from friends.

In response to the third NACAB proposal, the Government told it:

"The intention behind the habitual residence test is to curb abuse of the benefits system. It would be contradictory to deny these people benefit on one hand only to pay it on an emergency basis on the other."

The Department's logic is alarming. Whatever the merits of the arguments I am proposing, whether we believe the habitual residence test is right or wrong, I am sure that we can all agree that there are occasions when emergency aid should be provided while eligibility for long-term help is determined. In many cases there is reason to believe that an initial adjudication on habitual residence may be wrong, and the number of reversals on appeal prove that. Sometimes it is simply good governance to offer short-term, emergency help. Neither of those possibilities seems to be recognised by the Department in its response to the CAB report.

In addition to those three suggestions for changes in secondary legislation, the CAB report also offered three proposals concerning the collection of information on the effect of the habitual residence test. First, it proposed that information should be collated on the ethnic group of passed and failed test applicants. There is growing circumstantial evidence that black and Asian people are more likely to be subjected to the test than others. That is alarming.

Secondly, the CAB proposed that data should be gathered on the appeals process, including the overall number of appeals and how many are successful. Thirdly, it proposed that the time taken to process appeals should be monitored and published.

The Government told NACAB that they had no intention of collating information on those subjects. They argued that principally on the grounds of cost. Although no estimate of that cost had been made, or at least not to my knowledge, it is hard to believe that any extra cost could not be found in the £37 million saving that the Government claim to have made from introducing the test.

There is certainly a need for more information. Even those statistics that are available do not seem to be understood by the Department of Social Security. For example, in their response to NACAB, the Government assert:

"the majority of people found not to be habitually resident are EEA nationals."

That is simply not true. On Government figures, only 36 per cent. are EEA nationals; that is confirmed by the new figures that the Minister has given me for March 1996 and by the cumulative figures from August 1994 to March 1996. Significantly fewer than 40 per cent. of those affected by the test are EEA nationals. I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that.

There is one other important matter that I want to raise. After we debated the subject in March last year, I asked the Minister to place the results of habitual residence tests every month in the Library of the House. I am grateful that he agreed to do that for the year 1995-96; I have asked him if he will continue to publish the details for the coming year, and I am glad that he has confirmed that he will do that—it is most helpful.

More information, however, is needed. It is little wonder that NACAB expressed its disappointment at the Government's response to its report, which was an impressive one. There are grave concerns about the operation of the test and the human hardship it causes my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who I am pleased to see in his place this evening. Critiques such as the one produced by NACAB are constructive and valuable, and I hope that the Government will respond in similar vein.

The national association has produced a devastating critique of the test. The Government's response has been weak and, in at least one respect, simply wrong. It is as if the Government are not taking seriously the points that have been made. I hope that they will give careful consideration to the future of the test before the damage becomes too great. I hope that the habitual residence test will be scrapped, because I am quite sure that if it is not, more and more hon. Members and others will be raising the serious problems that it causes in the weeks and months ahead.

10.36 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Roger Evans): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) on obtaining, for the second time in just over a year, an Adjournment debate to discuss this subject. It is a matter of considerable concern, and of general importance.

I was pleased to hear the hon. Gentleman say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in identifying the problem of benefit tourists, had identified a problem that required a solution. The question he asked was whether the solution implemented was the right one. The hon. Gentleman mentioned a number of percentages; it would perhaps assist the House if I gave the up-to-date absolute figures since August 1990, when the new arrangements came in. Sometimes absolute figures give a better impression than percentages.

[Mr. Roger Evans]

These figures are to 31 March; answering oral questions on the last occasion, I gave figures to the end of February. Fourteen thousand European Economic Area nationals have passed, while 14,032 have failed. Of British citizens, 95,973 have passed; 9,738 have failed. I cite those figures because it appears, by a factor of nine to one, that British citizens succeed—as one might have expected—in establishing themselves as habitually resident in Great Britain more easily than do people from other European countries.

It is not contested that the drawing up of a test to prevent benefit tourism was a very difficult task. The treaty of Rome obliges us not to discriminate on grounds of nationality. At first blush it might seem enormously attractive to the man in the street to give residents of several years in this country favoured status under some arrangement. Under European law, however, we simply cannot do that.

We picked on habitual residence, because it is a test embodied in the relevant European directive: 1408/71. It is a concept of European law that we are entitled—we believe, and so far we have been vindicated by the courts—to apply for the present purpose.

The hon. Member has not suggested how we should replace the test. He has rightly and properly said that there are some very hard and difficult examples of its application. They are bound to be sad and cause considerable anguish. The NACAB report—which, of course, I have read carefully, and which Ministers and officials have studied carefully—gives several detailed examples. I cannot comment upon the three specific cases in the hon. Member's constituency, for which he did not give names, because I do not have particulars. No doubt there are circumstances in which the test is not a happy test to apply.

Nevertheless, we are not prepared to entertain the situation that obtained in summer 1994, when larger and growing numbers of Europeans—Spaniards, especially, were cited by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security—were coming to this country on holiday and claiming income support, housing benefit and council tax benefit. The news had got around in Europe, and more and more were coming. Unless and until something was done, the problem would not have diminished or remained static, but would have grown.

The NACAB report primarily—as the hon. Member for Newham, North-East emphasised—recommends rejection simpliciter of the habitual residence test, and I think that that is what the hon. Member would like to see. The report argues that labour market conditions, such as the tightening up of the availability test and the requirement actively to seek work—which will apply when the Jobseekers Act 1995 comes into force—would be sufficient. We are not satisfied that labour market conditions would be sufficient at all.

Some people came to this country for relatively short periods, and they enjoyed all the benefits that our welfare state provides. That was one-way traffic, because, when British nationals visited France or other European countries, they did not have the same kind of entitlement. The equivalent social assistance benefits in those countries are usually locally administered and highly discretionary.

The unique British feature, which the Labour Government introduced in 1966, was that supplementary benefit—later income support—was a matter of legal entitlement, provided that a person was in the United Kingdom and met the other conditions. Until we imposed habitual residence as an additional requirement, everyone was entitled to the benefit as a matter of right; that was what was so attractive about coming to this country, and it did not apply in reverse.

NACAB argues that we should simply abolish the test. We are not so persuaded. As for NACAB's secondary recommendations, which are designed as an alternative, we regret that either the totality of them is not sufficient or there are problems in some of them.

The first recommendation to which the hon. Member referred was the suggestion that people from third countries—that is, non-European Economic Area nationals or British citizens—recognised for settlement purposes in the United Kingdom for immigration status, should be treated automatically as habitually resident. On the face of it, that sounds plausible, until one realises that the recommendation would involve putting that category of persons in a better position than British citizens. I do not believe that that is likely to be generally acceptable.

The second proposal is to create a special class of appeal on such cases which must be heard within four weeks. I readily accept, and Ministers are concerned, that the independent tribunal service should dispose of appeals as quickly as may practically and properly be done. We wish to see the time taken from beginning to end of appeals speeded up, but whether a particular appeal or particular class of appeals should be expedited is essentially a judicial matter for application to the relevant tribunal at the relevant time.

It is easy for the hon. Member for Newham, North-East and myself, given the circumstances of especially sad and difficult cases, to say that they should have priority in the queue. But that is essentially a judicial matter, and we do not believe that it is appropriate that Ministers should interfere.

The other recommendations are perhaps properly described as subsidiary, and they relate to the collection of statistics. The Benefits Agency is fully aware of its responsibilities to ethnic minorities and for the delivery of the benefits, but we are trying to reduce the administrative costs of the Department, not to increase them. We do not see that there is an administrative need to record the statistics.

Similarly, the recommendation made on statistics on appeals seems plausible, until one realises that income support is a complex benefit. There are a number of conditions to be satisfied, as we all appreciate. But what are we measuring? The claimant may win on the issue of habitual residence and lose on some of the other many conditions.

We are talking about a matter of administration that would be expensive to bring up to date, if that were desired, to deal with the detail that has been requested.

We would find ourselves undertaking some form of manual, clerical, statistical sample. That is not entirely satisfactory.

I have dealt with the time that is taken to process appeals. The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux has special experience in these matters. We should never forget that all the most difficult cases, if they have not found their way to the hon. Gentleman's surgery, or mine, are likely to end up in the local CAB. It is a body that receives public assistance from Government and from local authorities. It performs an excellent job. It sees the problems raised by the hon. Gentleman at the hardest and sharpest points. It deals with human problems in individual cases.

As a Department, we have responsibility to the taxpayer. The lacuna in the argument so far presented by the hon. Gentleman, and by NACAB, is what to do to stop benefit tourism. If we abolished the habitual residence test, we would provide opportunities for fraud and exploitation of the system. That was the position before August 1994. It was catching on. People knew increasingly about the opportunities. How do we stop that?

We cannot discriminate in favour of British citizens, however much that may seem the simple, easy, logical, politically desirable, practical and humane solution, because of the restrictions of the treaty. What do we do? My right hon. Friend took the concept of habitual residence, which I readily accept is a complex idea. It is not something that can necessarily be simply applied, because it involves guidance, the expertise of the adjudicating officers, who are independent, and the appeals process.

There have been numbers of appeals. Being turned down matters a great deal. The law has a vagueness that sometimes attaches to European legal concepts. It is a concept that people want properly to test. Inevitably we shall have many appeals.

We are familiar with the test of domicile. The Inland Revenue has a test of ordinary residence, to ensure that it gets its tax out of us. Habitual residence was a slightly related and not entirely unfamiliar test. Inevitably, as I have said, there have been a number of appeals.

We have seen what we hope is the last word—at the moment it is—in the form of a decision by Commissioner Howell. It sets out some general guidance. It may or may not be binding, but that is a matter for the independent tribunal service, the commissioners and the courts to decide. It appears to give some general guidance on how the test should be applied.

The point in it, apart from distinguishing it from other legal concepts, is a practical consideration. A British citizen who has lived in this country for a long time is likely to be able more readily, easily and in a readily shorter period to re-establish habitual residence, if it has been lost, than someone who has never set foot in the country before, or someone who has done so only for a short and transitory period.

We readily accept that there will be some hard cases. We are driven to the conclusion, however, that there is nothing else in European law that we have yet heard of, or that anyone, to my knowledge, has suggested, that would prevent benefit tourism and at the same time produce a more favourable result for British citizens. The general figures show that, by nine to one—95,000 to 9,000-odd—British citizens pass the test. I accept that there are hard cases, and I have no doubt that each one of the 9,738 involves a human problem. We suggest that that is a test which, in practical administrative terms, does the best possible.

I summarise the matter as follows. There was a problem, as the hon. Gentleman has fairly recognised. We had to find a solution within the European treaty, and we believe that we have done so. It is a solution for which the vires have been tested, and, as litigation presently stands, it has been upheld.

I accept that the habitual residence test has problems in terms of its exact meaning, but it appears, as the case law evolves, that we are getting a clearer picture, and that the adjudicating authorities are getting a clearer understanding of how properly to operate the test as they receive guidance from higher appeals to tribunals and the commissioners.

We believe that, at the end of it all, what we have implemented is as fair as any system can be to the British citizen and, at the same time, protects the interests of the British taxpayer and prevents the abuse of benefit tourism that we had.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has read out to the House on several occasions—I shall not weary us at this late hour with the extracts from the Spanish and other continental press—evidence that the fact that London was an easy touch had become generally appreciated. That was not a problem to which we could simply turn a blind eye, and we could not just try to tighten up the administration of fraud, which is what the NACAB report ultimately suggests. We had to do something more than that.

We decided, because we were advised that it was the sensible solution—and, as far as we can yet see, the only solution in European law—to introduce the habitual residence test. That is working. I cannot say that it is working perfectly, but, in a less than perfect world, given the restraints of the European treaty, it appears to be working at least as well as anything for which either the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member has contended.

The hon. Gentleman and you, Madam Speaker, will not be surprised to know that I have received numerous letters from hon. Members on both sides, asking the simple question, "Is there some better way in which to do it?" We are not yet aware of it.

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at nine minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Tuesday 30 April 1996

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Westminster Council

1. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the level of revenue support grant settlement in 1996–97 with respect to Westminster council. [25671]

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): I have received a number of representations, including some that point out that, when compared with a city such as Liverpool, Westminster has been much less generously treated by the Government than it was under the previous Labour Government.

Mr. Jones: Will the Secretary of State confirm that if every council got the same help that Westminster gets, 336 out of the 358 councils would be able to pay a rebate and that 10 would be able to pay a rebate of more than £900 per council tax payer? Is not that political largesse completely unjustifiable by anyone outside the Conservative party? It is a political fix and he should admit it and be ashamed.

Mr. Gummer: What I will confirm is that if the same figures had been arranged under a Labour Government, more people would have been able to do more than that. That shows how ridiculous the hon. Gentleman's proposition is. If all councils were given the same money as Tower Hamlets, there would not be an area in the country that would not be able to do much better than he suggested, but the Labour party controls Tower Hamlets, so it does not like to say that.

Mr. Brooke: As the working population of my constituency exceeds the national average by a factor of almost 20 and exceeds that of any other constituency by a factor of five, will my right hon. Friend accept my representation that I am glad that he has noticed that my two authorities are different in category and not only in degree?

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend may also have noticed that all independent observers point out that the system that we use is objective and the most sophisticated in the world. The only person who does not believe that is the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who said that he does not accept what experts say. That is because they never agree with him.

Ms Armstrong: Does not the right hon. Gentleman recollect that the experts disagree that Westminster is the fourth most deprived area and say that this is a serious matter that the Government should address? Should not the Government address the fact that, if Trafford got the same council tax support as Westminster, it would be able to give every council tax payer £527 back; Rochdale would be able to give £303 back; and Oldham would be able to give £145 back? The Westminster skew is a fiddle; everyone knows it and will show it on Thursday.

Mr. Gummer: It is odd that, when the hon. Lady was asked about it, she said that she would not like to promise major changes in the system that we use. She is condemned out of her own mouth. She knows that what she says is not accepted by any of the Labour-controlled local authority organisations and that no one from any political party who understands the system agrees with her. She knows that she is trying to mislead the country. The country knows it, too, and will show it on Thursday.

Mr. Redwood: Does my right hon. Friend know that Wokingham district council is receiving no revenue support grant this year, yet, for the third successive year, Conservatives have offered a cut in the council tax while offering improved services? Unfortunately, the Liberals have forced through a 13 per cent. increase in the council tax and a deterioration in services. Does not that show that Thursday matters and that people must vote Conservative on Thursday for lower taxes?

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend is too kind to the Opposition parties—it is true not just in Wokingham, but throughout the country, that it costs £225 a year more to have a Labour council than a Conservative council. What is more, the Audit Commission shows that people get less for paying more. They pay more with Labour and get worse services. That is what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is trying to hide with his wholly spurious comments about Westminster.

Rents-to-mortgages Scheme

2. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the take-up of the rents-to-mortgages scheme in 1996. [25672]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): My Department has made no estimate of future sales.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister agree that the scheme has been another sunken disaster flagship policy for the Tory party—a waste of money and a waste of time? Would it not be more sensible, if the Government are really concerned about housing, to do something to help people with mortgage difficulties, perhaps by considering a mortgages-to-rents policy instead of a rents-to-mortgages policy?

Mr. Clappison: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman thinks that an effort to help people into home ownership is a waste of time. He will be aware that it is one of a range of policies through which we have promoted home ownership since 1979. Due to that range of policies, more than 1.5 million people are home owners, including 2,000 former council tenants in his constituency. I make no apologies for promoting home ownership. Tens of thousands of people are going into home ownership through such schemes every year. One of the interesting things about the scheme is that it is an attempt to help those on lower incomes into home ownership. The hon. Gentleman's party is turning its back on those people, just as it is turning its back on those who want opportunities in education by threatening to abolish child benefit for 16 to 18-year-olds. Labour is turning its back on home ownership and education.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that that attack on the rents-to-mortgages scheme and Labour's votes yesterday to restrict the right to buy show that new Labour has the same stupid prejudices as old Labour?

Mr. Clappison: The same instincts are there. Labour has criticised every attempt to help people into home ownership and it is still doing so.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Minister now admit that, despite 13 clauses in legislation, huge publicity efforts and £140,000-worth of promotional expenditure, the Government have managed to persuade just 15 people in the country to take up the scheme? Does the Under-Secretary of State recall his colleague, the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration, saying in Committee of another Tory white elephant—the infamous tenants' choice scheme—

"it is daft to leave in the Bill something that does not work and is therefore redundant, so we will get shot of it."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 2 April 1996; c. 1037.]

When will the Government get shot of the absurd rents-to-mortgages scheme and, more to the point, when will the country get shot of this absurd Government?

Mr. Clappison: The import of what the hon. Gentleman is saying is that it is wrong for Governments to explore opportunities for helping people into home ownership. The success of our policy is reflected in the more than 1.5 million people who have gone into home ownership since 1979. I am surprised that Labour's spokesman on housing is adopting the criticisms of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). He should be aware that, in his constituency, more than 7,000 householders have been helped into home ownership since 1979. We make no apologies for trying to help people into home ownership.

Workplace Safety Representatives

3. Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he intends to strengthen the position of workplace safety representatives; and if he will make a statement. [25673]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): The current system of workplace safety representatives works well, but we intend to bring forward regulations to extend consultation rights to workplaces where there are no trade union safety representatives.

Mr. Clapham: It is interesting that the Minister says that consultation procedures are to be modified, as he will know that safety representatives, working through their safety committees, have been an enormous influence in reducing accidents but that accidents have increased in some industries, such as mining. A couple of weeks ago, I drew to the Minister's attention the fact that a mining company operating in Northumberland—Stormgate Mining Ltd.—had not renewed its employer's liability insurance, yet men were working at that colliery. In his modified consultation procedure, will he arrange with the Coal Authority a register of all the activities of companies employed in the mining industry, to include a copy of the employer's liability insurance certificate, so that it can be viewed by the safety representatives at the colliery?

Sir Paul Beresford: We are looking at, reviewing and giving consideration to this case.

Home Renovation Grants

4. Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many mandatory home renovation grants were awarded by local authorities in 1995. [25674]

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): There were 34,300.

Mr. Pope: Tens of thousands of people live in unfit housing across east Lancashire. They struggle to get the grants to which they are legally entitled and, later today, the Government will seek to remove their legal right to mandatory improvement grants. Why is the Minister intent on taking away the only chance that my constituents and many other people have of getting a decent home?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman clearly has some difficulties with chronology—that does not happen in the Housing Bill, which we are to consider today. If he holds his breath and submits an application, he may be able to serve on the Committee that considers the next Bill, which will replace mandatory grants with discretionary grants. First, he should get his documents in order. Secondly, we cannot sustain a system that has a cash-limited grant and unlimited entitlement to it—the sums do not add up. Therefore, the sensible thing to do is to make a discretionary grant and to give local authorities the ability to focus it on the areas of greatest need so that they can serve the genuine interests of regeneration. That is what the Bill will do.

Mr. Pickles: Does my hon. Friend recognise that, sometimes, we need to go beyond these grants and that some housing estates require fundamental reorganisation? Is he aware that, for the past 10 years, an estate in Islington has been promised renovation work? Is he further aware that, for the past 10 years, Islington council has pontificated and promised the tenants some work, but that it has failed to fulfil its promise because of its incompetence?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is right: some of the older estates require much more substantial work. The Government have an estates renewal programme that is specifically designed to tackle the worst estates. What he has said about Islington council will surprise no one—it has a dismal record, which no doubt continues.

Ms Eagle: Will the Minister admit that the 1.5 million people who live in homes that are unfit to live in will be disappointed that the Government are abolishing this scheme and that they are replacing it with a discretionary scheme? When will the Government provide money so that people can look forward to having their homes made fit to live in? That is not really such a big ambition as we reach the end of the 20th century.

Mr. Curry: First, there has been a substantial programme for the improvement of homes. Secondly, many homes are unfit for simple or minor reasons. Thirdly, public expenditure constraints have to be observed. Fourthly, when the second Bill comes to this House, it will be interesting to see whether the Labour party will do what it did in the other place—refuse to give any commitment whatsoever to restore full mandatory grants. If the Labour party wants to make an effective point on this, it would be awfully nice to know what it plans to do in this area of public expenditure and on taxation. The two are linked, and we still know nothing.

Planning Policy Guidance (Countryside)

5. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to revise the Government's planning policy guidance for the countryside. [25675]

The Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency (Mr. Robert B. Jones): Following our well-received White Paper entitled "Rural England", we expect to consult on a draft revision of planning policy guidance note 7 and on a possible rural business use class before the summer recess.

Mr. Robathan: I congratulate my hon. Friend and his Department on the excellent White Paper entitled "Rural England". Is he aware—perhaps he will take account of this in his consultations—of the unhappiness in some rural areas, particularly in my district of Blaby and Harborough in Leicestershire, because district councils are being compelled to provide for a large number of new homes on green-field sites? Will he, in his consultation, look to encourage the regeneration and rebuilding of inner cities on derelict land rather than building new homes on green-field sites?

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments about the White Paper. It is precisely because we want sustainable development in housing, as elsewhere, that, for the very first time, we have set a target for the percentage of housing to be built on existing developed land. I have said to the Environment Committee that, if experience allows us, we will raise that target in time.

Mr. Vaz: Does the Minister accept that current planning policy guidance is a jungle of anomalies and inconsistencies? For example, why has he refused to publish the results of the review into planning policy guidance note 6 until after the local elections on Thursday? Does he realise that the delay is causing massive confusion? When will we have planning policy guidance that is clear, consistent and strategic, rather than the mess that we have at the moment?

Mr. Jones: Let me help the hon. Gentleman. He knows that there is a convention that announcements such as that are not made in the run-up to local elections. We shall make the announcement immediately after the local elections, in accordance with the right practices in government.

While the hon. Gentleman is posing a question on the subject, let me ask him about reports in the weekend's press that the Labour party was poised to reverse our policy on out-of-town shopping. I am sure that any squalid deals cooked up by the Labour party, along with the squalid deals that it cooked up with BT and with Rupert Murdoch, will show it for what it is.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

6. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps he intends to take to ensure that there is an equality of treatment when contracts are being let under compulsory competitive tendering between direct service organisations and the private sector. [25676]

Sir Paul Beresford: My hon. Friend will be aware that, earlier this month, we issued new statutory guidance to local authorities on compulsory competitive tendering. In addition, we will publish our proposals for changing the CCT system next month.

Mr. Congdon: I warmly welcome that guidance and my hon. Friend's efforts to root out anti-competitive practices in local authorities, but does he accept that many local authorities—especially Labour ones—will do everything possible to ensure that contracts are let to their own direct labour organisations? Will he take further steps to encourage the district auditor service more rigorously to try to root out those anti-competitive practices and to pay special attention to the terms of reference of direct service organisation boards, which appear to be set up to rig the system in favour of DSOs?

Sir Paul Beresford: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The shenanigans that some Labour and Liberal local authorities get up to to dodge the common sense of competitive tendering are staggering. The district auditors, or the external auditing system, have the power to act in many areas, and need encouragement to do so. We shall certainly continue the encouragement, along the lines that my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. Corbett: Does the Minister recall insisting that Birmingham city council should re-advertise its five housing management contracts when it had awarded them in fair competition with the private sector? Does he realise that that costs council tax payers in the city £1.5 million? Will he foot that bill?

Sir Paul Beresford: The answer is that it was not a fair competition. The fiddling of the books and the shenanigans that went on were incredible—not only in housing, but in other areas, time and again—and the people who lose are the people who pay and the people who receive the services. This is a blow of old Labour, and it is about time that people, including Opposition Members, understood the advantages of competitive tendering.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is my hon. Friend aware that a very good example of the importance of transferring contracts to the private sector may be found in Cambridgeshire, where nearly £2 million has been lost to direct labour organisations by the incompetent, half-baked Lib-Lab county council?

Sir Paul Beresford: There are repeated examples of such cases throughout the country. Bradford is a classic example. By shenanigans, it lost £1.2 million. When it was forced to repeat the tendering process, the new contract went out to the private sector, with a saving of £700,000.

Darlington and Westminster Councils

7. Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the local authority grant per head in (a) Darlington and (b) Westminster; and if he will make a statement. [25677]

Mr. Gummer: This year, £997 for Westminster and £621 for Darlington. That is a difference of 75 per cent. In the last year of Labour government, the difference was 84 per cent.

Mr. Milburn: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for those figures. Do not they show that, if Darlington received the same level of Government help as Westminster city council, this year, every family in my constituency, instead of paying a council tax bill, would receive a rebate of £681? Is it not a national disgrace that the local authority grant system has been skewed and rigged to favour one inefficient Tory flagship council?

Mr. Gummer: What it shows is that any skewing that took place took place a darn sight more under Labour than it does under the Conservatives. It also shows that the hon. Gentleman should not work out a supplementary question before he has heard the answer to the main question.

The Labour party is entirely wrong. All the figures show that Westminster did significantly better than many of the councils that have been cited when the Labour party was in power. The Labour party's fox has been shot: if Labour Members understood the system, they would not have started the argument.

Mr. Thomason: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, while a number of authorities may complain that the grant per head is not sufficient and that the methodology is weighted against them, whether one lives in Darlington or in Westminster, until the local government organisations controlled by the opposition parties can suggest alterations to that methodology that are acceptable to local authorities, it will be very difficult for the Government to make any changes?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend points out that all three local authority organisations that are run by Labour do not make the same claims as the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). They understand how the system works and they are part and parcel of it. The hon. Gentleman, who will not listen to experts, does not understand how that system works. Parties such as his charge people £225 a year more than would a Conservative council.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Secretary of State confirm that, under the present grant regime, council tax payers in Westminster contribute just 4 per cent. towards the cost of their council but that, in Darlington, council tax payers contribute more than 30 per cent.—and that council tax payers in Bromsgrove, Hertsmere, North Hertfordshire, Milton Keynes and Wyre Forest pay more than 30 per cent? In Basildon—the other Tory flagship—people must contribute 42 per cent. towards the cost of their council. Does not that show that the whole system is a rigged racket that favours Westminster, and that legions of Tory Members of Parliament vote for that racket, following the party line rather than standing up for local people?

Mr. Gummer: Where were the legions of Labour Members of Parliament when Westminster did better under Labour than it does under the Conservatives? The trouble with the hon. Gentleman's argument is that he has not done his homework. He thinks that, if he says the same thing again and again, people will believe him—even though what he says is fundamentally untrue, as anyone who understands the system knows.

The fact is that Westminster did better under Labour—it received a bigger proportion of funds under Labour—and Labour Members of Parliament voted for that year in, year out. The Government apply an objective system to everyone, including Camden, even though Labour runs its councils so badly.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the grant per head made to Suffolk county council is extremely generous? Does he share my shock at the way in which the Labour and Liberal county councillors are now ruthlessly switching resources away from the villages and the rural areas of Suffolk in order to prop up their friends in the towns? Does not that prove that, when it comes to rigging local authority finances, the Labour and Liberal parties are the experts?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is far too kind. He fails to mention the fact that, although Suffolk county council received an extra £11.5 million to spend on education, it spent only £8.5 million and put the rest elsewhere. He does not mention either that the council cut off funding for transport for 16 to 18-year-olds, thus underlining Labour's tax on A-levels. The Labour party has taken money from parents by way of travel allowance and it would also abolish child allowance for 16 to 18-year-olds. It is opposed to those who keep their children at school. The Labour party costs more and it spends public money where it wants rather than where the people want it to be spent.

Forestry

8. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding forestry in England. [25678]

Mr. Clappison: During the consultation on the rural White Paper, we received 54 written representations on forestry. We continue to receive representations on many aspects of forestry.

Mr. Michie: Will the Minister make representations to the Scottish Office, which has overall responsibility for our forests, to stop the back-door privatisation of Forestry Commission land by Forest Enterprise as that would restrict public access and reduce the environmental quality of our woodlands, which are a precious national asset?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that high-access woodlands are not included in the disposal programmes and that, in other cases, local authorities have opportunities to reach agreements on access. In view of his comments and concern, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the fact that the Government are improving access to woodlands by the creation of the national forest and the network of 12 community forests serving large parts of Britain, including the hon. Gentleman's constituency in South Yorkshire. I hope that his constituents will enjoy that access in due course.

Mr. Wilkinson: My hon. Friend will recognise that the few remaining areas of woodland and forest within Greater London and within the M25 are particularly important national assets. Will he ensure that those areas, many of which are green-belt areas and sites of special scientific interest, remain sacrosanct in respect of planning and development?

Mr. Clappison: I have every sympathy with my hon. Friend as my constituency is within the M25 and includes some of that woodland. He will be aware of the community forest that serves my constituency. It is Government policy to preserve open spaces and forests within the metropolitan green belt.

District Auditor Service

9. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received from local authorities regarding the role of the district auditor service. [25679]

Mr. Curry: None.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister will be aware that the district auditor service is highly regarded by many local authorities, including Labour-controlled Kirklees. If he wants to talk or shout about squalid deals and shenanigans, he should recognise that many people in local government believe that the Secretary of State brought undue pressure on the district auditor to delay the report on Westminster city council until after Thursday's local election. If on May 7 that report—the Tories, who are shouting, do not like this—names the individuals responsible for wasting £30 million of taxpayers' money on gerrymandering, will the Minister or the Secretary of State ensure that action is taken to drive those people out of public life for good?

Mr. Curry: That accusation is categorically untrue. It is a scandalous attack on the integrity of the auditor dealing with Westminster's affairs.

Mr. Barry Field: Will my hon. Friend tell that lot opposite that we do not like having district auditors' reports carried out at the behest of council tax payers and Liberal Democrat councillors refusing to publish the results? Does he agree that everyone considering voting Liberal Democrat on Thursday should know that that party should carry a financial health warning?

Mr. Curry: We can all agree that any sensible system of local government must have a system of independent audit and that sensible politicians will recognise that the auditors must be allowed to get on with their job without political intervention.

Mr. Rendel: Given the length of time that the auditor has had to report on Westminster city council, and acknowledging the great difficulties that have been created by the procrastination of former Conservative councillors—

Mr. Field: When will the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) answer my question about the district auditor's report?

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) has put his question. Let us hear someone else now.

Mr. Rendel: Given the delay in the publication of the report and its importance in respect of various people's continuance in public office, what steps is the Minister taking to ensure that major reports are produced rather more quickly in future?

Mr. Curry: The Government have no intention of intervening in the process of audit for any purpose. If local government is to be based on financial integrity, the audit service must be free of political interference and in the hands of an independent authority. I do not intend to intervene in that process. The Labour party plans to transform the Audit Commission into a super surrogate for local government. Nothing would be more dangerous. The matter is best left in the hands of the Audit Commission, which does its job very well.

River Thames (London)

10. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to enhance the use and amenities of the River Thames in London. [25680]

Mr. Gummer: My strategic planning guidance for the Thames will have as its three major goals quality building along the Thames, more freight and leisure traffic on the river, and the conservation of its natural environment.

Sir Sydney Chapman: Notwithstanding the fact that there are no elections in London this Thursday, is my right

hon. Friend aware that the initiatives and the actions he has taken to promote greater use of, and to enhance the amenities of, the Thames have been far greater than were ever achieved under the old and little-lamented Greater London council? Does he further agree that the siting of the major millennium project at Greenwich will give a glorious opportunity for the Thames, especially in central and east London?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend will accept that the planning of the Thames needs to have a strategy that reaches way beyond the old GLC area, right down to the coast. That is another example of the fact that one can deal with London's strategic problems only on a variable basis. Boroughs on both sides of the Thames are now working together inside and outside the old Greater London area in a way that they would never have done when they were borne down upon by the expensive, inefficient and failed Greater London council.

Miss Hoey: Does the Secretary of State agree that the River Thames is a wonderful asset for London and that there are many new developments, especially on the south bank in my constituency? Will he especially welcome the new millennium wheel? It will be a most wonderful monument to the millennium. Does he further agree that, if we are serious about developing the use of the River Thames, we have to make it much easier for piers to be provided along the river, and planning guidance should be changed to help to achieve that? If new developments had to provide a pier, that would do a great deal to ensure that the river could be used.

Mr. Gummer: I think that the hon. Lady will be pleased with the strategic guidance, because that is the sort of subject on which we have been working together in the all-party group that has directed the preparation of that guidance. I am also pleased to agree with her about the enormous advantages of the proposals that have been made for sites all along the Thames. It would be wrong of me to make an especial comment about the great Ferris wheel, but I am sure that the hon. Lady will agree that we need to show that we have the confidence in these years to make big changes and to stand up for this generation to show that we have something to offer to the next.

New Housing

11. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new houses have been constructed in the past two years; and if he will make a statement. [25683]

Mr. Curry: There were 370,100 completions in Great Britain in 1994 and 1995.

Mr. Coombs: Is my hon. Friend aware that the level of house building in Swindon rose from 664 houses in 1994-95 to 1,163 houses in 1995-96? Is not that near doubling in the number of houses under construction in those two years clear evidence of a very strong recovery of the economy?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is right. The basis for that recovery is the containment of public expenditure and ensuring that interest rates remain low. Both those would be threatened by a policy of spend and high taxation such as the Labour party refuses to deny. The Labour party will not give us any details on what it will spend and what it will tax.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Despite those figures, is it not the case that real housing need—that of the homeless—is not being met? Is it not the Government's policy to prevent local authorities from building the necessary houses for social rent and affordable housing? When will the Government do something about providing homes for the homeless?

Mr. Curry: As a matter of interest, I spent part of this morning at a conference run by the English Churches housing association, dealing with the problems of street homelessness in London. At that conference, there was a very warm welcome for the imaginative and forward-looking programmes to deal with people in the worst possible circumstances—the street homeless. The hon. Gentleman will know that we plan to extend those programmes to cities outside London, where a clear need can be determined and where the voluntary sector and the public and statutory authorities can work together. That is a remarkable attack on the problems of the people in the worst possible circumstances in the United Kingdom, and it works.

Water Bills

12. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding the use of a pre-payment card system for the payment of water bills. [25684]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: My Department has recently received representations on the use of budget payment units, which use a pre-payment card system, from the hon. Members for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock), for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) and from one charitable organisation. I am confident that the units have helped to reduce problems of water debt, as have the trusts that a number of water companies have set up to help customers who cannot pay.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is my hon. Friend aware that budget payment units are extremely popular with the 16,000 customers who voluntarily opted to have them installed? Is not it ironic that certain local authorities, mainly Labour, have sought to challenge the legality of the provision by water companies of budget payment units?

Mr. Jones: I agree that it is extraordinary. Not only have the units been helpful but MORI surveys have shown that 90 per cent. of customers are satisfied.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: Will the Minister make a distinction between budget pre-payment units that make payment easy and timing devices that shut off the water supply when the money runs out, thus leaving the household without a supply? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that representations have been made against the latter devices by the National Consumer Council, local authorities, the National Federation of Housing Associations and environmental health officers because those devices pose a risk to public health? Will the Minister at least ensure that the number of people whose water supplies are cut off by such devices is published alongside disconnection figures, which are generally published?

Mr. Jones: The hon. Lady ought to acknowledge that both methods are popular and voluntary. I am sorry that there is a split in the Labour party on the subject. Clive Wilkinson, the former Labour leader of Birmingham city council, said:

"The overwhelming view of customers in my area who have had them installed is that these units are a good thing. I have not received a single complaint about the units from customers. I do not want to see customers being denied the choice if they want to opt for one of these units."

Chemical Waste Recycling (Worcester)

13. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the proposal from NORCHEM to establish a chemical waste recycling facility at Warndon, Worcester. [25685]

Mr. Clappison: My Department has received 125 representations on that subject.

Mr. Luff: Does my hon. Friend agree that that number of representations shows the depth of anger in my constituency at an unwelcome and totally inappropriate proposal, which has already led to the deselection of the local Labour county councillor who argued for NORCHEM and against the interests of my constituents? Will my hon. Friend do all in his power to ensure that the Environment Agency refuses a licence, and re-examine the city and county council planning procedures that led to this unfortunate situation?

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend is correct when he says that there is clearly huge interest in this serious subject among the people of Worcester. My hon. Friend will be aware of the restrictions on me and on the Department in respect of planning cases and the actions of local authorities. I assure my hon. Friend that I will take a particular interest in the matter.

My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the Environment Agency's powers over waste management, and over licensing in particular. The system is highly acclaimed and those powers will be available in this case, if necessary.

Water Industry

14. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the regulation of the water industry. [25686]

Mr. Gummer: The regulatory system for the water industry in England and Wales ensures that the companies can finance their investment programmes while protecting the interests of customers and the environment.

Mr. Dalyell: If Britain has a dryish May, June and July, who will pay for the emergency measures in August and September? Will it be the water companies, consumers or Government?

Mr. Gummer: Happily, the likelihood is that, even if this year is as difficult as last year, no one in England will be subject to rota cuts or standpipes. If that is so, the privatised water companies will have achieved something that was never achieved by the nationalised companies at any time in the history of similar water situations. It is for the water companies to make provision.

Mrs. Peacock: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the problem being encountered by Batley city challenge, in being prevented by Yorkshire Water from using water for stone-cleaning activities? What advice can my right hon. Friend give that city challenge?

Mr. Gummer: I am pleased to say that the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), has agreed to look into that problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) will know that Yorkshire Water has made major changes and considerable investment, to ensure that the water problems of last year are overcome.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply, I hope to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Standard Spending Assessments

15. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of recent representations he has received on standard spending assessments. [25687]

Mr. Curry: We consider all representations received on SSAs. Proposals for change are examined with the local authority associations in the standard spending assessment sub-group of the settlement working group.

Mr. Jones: Why did the Government show favouritism to Westminster council?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman clearly does not understand the system of local government finance. We direct the funds where the needs are greatest, which is why in London the single biggest recipient of Government support is Tower Hamlets, followed by councils such as Southwark, Lambeth and Islington. If we did not do that, that would indeed be wrong. The idea that there should be a pro rata rate across the country is both fundamentally wrong and extremely silly.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 April. [25701]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Has the Prime Minister had drawn to his attention the article that appeared in the British Medical Journal last week, which stated that the Committee on Safety of Medicines recommended the prohibition, for pharmaceutical purposes, of all beef products from potentially bovine spongiform encephalopathy-infected herds as far back as 1989? In view of that information, will he tell me why the Department of Health did not make similar recommendations about beef consumption at that time?

The Prime Minister: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will weigh very carefully what he has to say in these matters. That is most emphatically not what his hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) did some time ago. We take and make public the advice that is appropriate in terms of safety in this country. That is our responsibility and that is what we do.

Q2. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 April. [25702]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and his cohorts on the Opposition Benches fall over themselves to try to get the votes of the gin and Jag brigade—the middle classes—but is the Prime Minister aware that it is the Conservative party that speaks for those in my constituency, in Cleethorpes and Immingham, who are still proud to call themselves working class? Is it not a fact that those people look to the Conservative party and the Conservative Government to ensure that they have the chance to buy their council house, to escape from trade union rule, from the closed shop, and to ensure that child benefit is protected for their children, who want better and further education? [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: The latest recruit to the middle classes, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), is heckling from a sedentary position. I hope that his arrival among the middle classes did not cause them too much distress. The policies that he advocates certainly would: higher taxes on people—[Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East says it on his aircraft. The shadow Transport Minister says it publicly and then does not subsequently deny it. There would be an extra tax, of course, on parents who have children at school between 16 and 18—a special tartan tax if someone happens to be a Scot. Those people can have that sort of tax as well. If someone happens to be a Londoner, they can have a top-up tax. Tax after tax. The Opposition know that that is their position. We are cutting taxes now. The Opposition plan to increase them.

Mr. Blair: I think that what most people remember is the 22 tax rises since 1992, and VAT going on—from the Prime Minister who said that it would not.

Is it correct, as has been reported today, that recorded crime in January and February of this year was substantially above recorded crime for the same period last year?

The Prime Minister: The minute that was leaked, which has caused some correspondence between the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, is not accurate. When the figures are available to us, we will publish them in the normal way, but I understand that the leak that appeared this morning was not accurate.

Mr. Blair: I hope that the Prime Minister will publish the full figures. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order—all of it. That includes the Front Bench below the Gangway.

Mr. Blair: The same memorandum says that recorded crime has now risen for six consecutive months. Is that correct? Is it also correct that the trend in crime is upwards, as the memorandum additionally says? If those two points are correct, will the Prime Minister accept that, since the Conservatives came to power, crime has actually more than doubled?

The Prime Minister: As I said a moment ago, we will publish the detailed figures at the usual time in the usual way; but, as it happens, parts of the figures in the memorandum that was leaked were wrong. Although monthly figures are always volatile, there is no doubt that crime fell in the last two months of 1995, so it cannot have just risen for the past six months, as the right hon. Gentleman said it did.

If the right hon. Gentleman is concerned about reducing crime, perhaps he can explain to us why he and his party vote against every measure that we introduce to be tough on crime. Why do they always make excuses for the criminal, and ignore the pleas of the victims?

Mr. Blair: This party was advancing constructive proposals for law and order while the right hon. Gentleman's Ministers were still boasting about the numbers coming out of prison.

If the Prime Minister says that parts of the memorandum are wrong, perhaps he will now tell us which parts are right. Perhaps, instead of talking nonsense about Labour policy, he will admit the truth about his own—that people are less safe in their own homes, less secure in their jobs and less confident of their future, and that it is precisely because of that weakness, failure and incompetence that people will be so justified in punishing his party on Thursday.

The Prime Minister: That comment was a long time coming, and it was not really worth waiting for. We will publish the figures in the usual fashion at the usual time.

As for being constructive on proposals, I am surprised that the leader of the Labour party thinks that he is constructive on crime. We reformed the right of silence; he opposed it. Was that constructive? We gave the Attorney-General the right to appeal against soft sentences; the right hon. Gentleman opposed it. Was that constructive? We increased the penalty for cruelty to children; Labour opposed it. Was that constructive?

On issue after issue after issue, the Labour party shows that it is soft on crime. It is not prepared to take the measures that will attack the criminal and protect the citizen, and, however the right hon. Gentleman tries to make partisan points, that is what the public know about his policy.

Q3. Sir Graham Bright: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 April. [25703]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Sir Graham Bright: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that child benefit for children who stay at school for a further two years to study for A-levels is worth in excess of £1,000? Can he also confirm that child benefit has its origins in tax rebate? If that were abolished, as Labour proposes, it would be equivalent to putting 5p on the basic rate of tax for the average parent. [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: I note that Labour Members laugh at the thought of 5p on tax for people on average incomes. So much for their claim that they would not increase taxes. Child benefit was a tax allowance benefit; it was made into a cash payment for mothers to ensure that it was used on behalf of their children. Now Labour proposes to provide a disincentive to stop children from staying on at school.

Mr. Faulds: Don't be so childish. You are Prime Minister, for God's sake.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must keep his cool.

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) studied his party's policy on this issue, he would be right to be angry at the way in which it proposes to treat people up and down the country.

Mr. Ashdown: The Prime Minister is, I believe, an honourable man. [Interruption.] Yes, he is. Will he therefore confirm that he understands that, if once again Conservative Members of Parliament try to change the Prime Minister, while denying the country the chance to change the Government, it will be totally unacceptable to all the British people? Will he therefore confirm that if, after Thursday, they try to get rid of him, he will ensure that we have a chance to get rid of the Government?

The Prime Minister: I fear that the right hon. Gentleman is dealing in fantasy again.

Q4. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 April. [25704]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marshall: Will my right hon. Friend welcome the article in today's Evening Standard about tube and bus fares in London? Is that not good news for Londoners, who can look forward to the extension of the Jubilee line, improvements to the Northern line, Thameslink 2000, the Heathrow to Paddington link, improvements to the docklands light railway and the Croydon tramway link? Does that not show that we act, and the Greater London council just talked?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend, who has been lobbying on many of those matters for many years, has clearly studied the transport document with great care. He is of course right. It is good news for passengers in London, and so of course is the policy of capping fares. We expect London transport fares to rise at a significantly lower level than in the past as part of a strategy of making public transport more attractive.

Q5. Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 April. [25705]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. O'Brien: With reference to the previous question, which the Prime Minister did not really answer, will he say whether he has ever discussed an understanding whereby, if the Conservatives do not do well in the local government elections this week, he will make way for the Deputy Prime Minister? We need a reassurance on that, as the Prime Minister must understand. Will he take it from me that he has the support of much of the House to remain leader of the Conservative party up to a general election? He has the support of at least half the Conservative Members, and of every Labour Member.

The Prime Minister: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is in mischief-making mode—[Interruption.] Clearly, he was not; clearly, he was just being silly.

Mr. Pawsey: My right hon. Friend had a very successful breakfast meeting with business men in Warwickshire on Friday. Will he therefore repeat, for the benefit of the House, the points that he made about the social chapter and the damage that it would do to employment and prosperity in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: I noticed over the past few days that countries abroad, particularly Germany, are now beginning to take action to bring down some of the high social costs that have created fiscal difficulties and unemployment in their countries. In this country, we are not prepared to have a social chapter, which is damaging as it stands but would be infinitely more damaging if we signed it, the rest of Europe brought their social expenditures into the social chapter, had them approved by qualified majority vote as they could, and then imposed them on British employers at the cost of British jobs. We are bringing unemployment down. I intend to see it come down further. I do not intend to take this country into the social chapter, to stop the fall in unemployment and to see it begin to rise again. That is no bargain for the British work force.

Q6. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 April. [25706]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Prime Minister realise that not only is his deputy after his job but the Home Secretary and the Health Secretary are as well? We therefore need a categoric assurance that, however many seats the Conservatives lose on Thursday, the Prime Minister will lead his party into the next general election. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) said, the Prime Minister has the support of almost half his party, and the support of all the Labour party.

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman heard what I had to say just a moment or so ago, and I have no intention of accommodating his silly questions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Given the interest in what happens after the next general election, did my right hon. Friend see the poll in The Times at the end of last week, which showed that the majority of people expected that, if there were to be a Labour Government, unemployment would go up, interest rates would go up, inflation would go up and there would be more control for the unions? Is that not the real reason why the Labour party wants to delay an election for as long as possible?

The Prime Minister: Of course people would expect that of a Labour Government. People know from experience that that is what has happened with every Labour Government we have ever had at any stage in the past, and that that would occur again—unemployment up, interest rates up and tax rates up. There is absolutely no doubt that that is what happened in the past, and that is what would happen in the future.

Q7. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 30 April. [25707]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Prentice: Does the Prime Minister appreciate that this is the last day of work for Mr. Cedric Brown, who retires with a pension of £250,000 and a continuing consultancy with British Gas of £144,000? Does the Prime Minister care to comment on today's press release from the North West gas consumers council, which states that complaints in the north-west region increased by 97 per cent. last year? Does he believe that Mr. Cedric Brown warrants that largesse?

The Prime Minister: I believe that when people get an unsatisfactory service they are right to complain. They are right to complain to British Gas, and, now that British Gas is in the private sector and faces competition, people can expect that their complaints will be taken seriously, which they certainly were not when British Gas was in the public sector—when prices were rising dramatically and when the service was falling. Under plans for competition—for which I see no support from the Labour party—people who are not satisfied with British Gas will have the opportunity of going elsewhere. That is what competition means.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(4) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

FAMILY LAW AND SOCIAL SECURITY

That the Social Security (Adjudication) and Child Support Amendment Regulations 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 182) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

That the Social Security (Industrial Injuries and Diseases) (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 425) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.

FAMILY LAW

That the Child Support Departure Direction (Anticipatory Application) Regulations 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 635) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

That the Income-related Benefits Schemes (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 462) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Question agreed to.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I draw your attention to this House of Commons envelope, which has just been sent out in County Durham, enclosing a Westminster report from the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) with club news for the City of Durham Labour club? It seems to be a flagrant misuse of the paid post, which has been drawn to my attention by the Conservative prospective parliamentary candidate in Durham. I wonder whether you would look into the matter.

Madam Speaker: We have procedures in the House that I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows. I should be very much obliged if he would supply that material to the Serjeant at Arms, who will carry out an investigation. If it is necessary, a charge for the cost of the—[Interruption.] Order. I am talking. If it is necessary, a charge for the cost of the stationery and the postage will be levied against the hon. Member concerned.

I caution hon. Members from both sides of the House that House of Commons stationery and postage must not be used in this way. In any instance in which it is, the Serjeant at Arms must be informed right away, and he will keep me informed of his investigations. Would the hon. Member please let the Serjeant have all the information without delay?

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I was certainly unaware of the situation. As every hon. Member knows, these things get sent out from one's office without our giving instructions to do so. I apologise to the House that this has happened. I will certainly make investigations and make sure that any money that is owed to the House is paid directly back. It was a mistake by my office. I am sure that many hon. Members leave it to their staff to do these things, and I shall certainly reimburse the House if there are any problems.

Madam Speaker: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman has just said, but I should be grateful if all hon. Members would make it clear to their staff, particularly in their constituencies, which is where the problem occurs, that House of Commons stationery must not be used in this way.

Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am grateful to catch your eye on such a noisy afternoon.

My point of order relates to Her Majesty's Stationery Office. I wonder whether you have had the opportunity this morning to read The Guardian article about HMSO. You will remember that, some weeks ago, we discussed the privatisation of HMSO, when hon. Members of all parties expressed a great deal of concern about its future. This morning's news shows that there has been a £3 million wipe-off of the debt owed to HMSO by the Republic of Uzbekistan. Has any Minister made an approach to you about making a statement? That news was available at the time of the debate, but we were not given the information.

Madam Speaker: No Minister has made an approach to me about making a statement in the House, but I understand that a written question is on the Order Paper. I believe that the answer is available. Perhaps I could refer the hon. Gentleman to it.

[Madam Speaker]

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I am a little surprised to hear you say that no Minister wants to come and make a statement on that matter. I understand that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster invited selected journalists into his office yesterday, and gave them full information. I understand that, subsequently, a written answer gave much less information than was given to the press.

There has been a £40 million loss in respect of HMSO for the first time in its history, £26 million of which was due to redundancies in preparation for privatisation. The House deserves a full statement on that matter, and on the matter raised by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I do not usually take further points of order, because they can become a debate, but, exceptionally, I will hear the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bottomley: As the House has received a written answer and the HMSO accounts are in front of the House, what we have seen is a Member on the Opposition Front Bench asking a question as a point of order. If that habit is allowed to start, there are many written answers, and many of us could do the same thing.

Madam Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman will leave the matter to me, I was ready to reply.

The answer will be seen in Hansard of Monday 29 April at column 331. As for the last point of order, perhaps the hon. Gentleman may wish to raise that matter with the Leader of the House and seek a debate or a statement. As he knows, it is not within my authority.

Part-Time Employees (Equal Rights to Sick Pay and Leave)

3.37 pm

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide that employers give the same entitlements to sick pay and leave to their part-time staff as they do to their full-time staff.

This is the second of three ten-minute Bills—each, I am pleased to say, with cross-party support—which argue for the principle of equal and fair treatment for part-time workers. Only with a level playing field of rights and entitlements between full-time and part-time work can we look forward to the economy finding the most efficient distribution between the two.

Ultimately, no economic good will come if part-time work is just a cheaper alternative. A deregulated labour market such as ours will tend to produce too much of it, at the expense of full-time work. Lower pay will remove spending power in local economies. Lack of national insurance benefit entitlements will lead to poverty in childbirth, sickness and retirement, and exploitation will lead to lower productivity and fewer skills in our work force. Ultimately, that will undermine our competitiveness, not enhance it.

There are plenty of signs that that is already happening. The Trades Union Congress has been collecting case studies of the exploitation of part-time workers going on in Britain. Diane, a coach driver from Cornwall, is classed as part-time by her employer because he does not guarantee her any hours. She works anything from 96 hours a week in summer to 10 hours a week in winter. She says:

"I get laid off for a fortnight over Christmas with no money and I don't get paid holidays or sick pay—I earn £3 an hour".

Karen is employed by a video sales and rental business in Staffordshire. Part-timers aged over 25 are paid £2.75 an hour, and, if aged under 25, just £1.75 an hour. They work nine hours on Sundays and bank holidays for no extra money. Holidays and time off for sickness are unpaid.

Mr. D is employed as a part-timer by a privatised utility. He says:

"from day one, I have been working between 35 and 40 hours a week. Yet I'm not entitled to any of the usual benefits. Three weeks ago, me and all the other 'part timers' were told our services were no longer required. If companies can treat people like this, I hold out little hope for the future of our country."

Those case studies are not unique. They are not even unusual. They are typical of the sort of exploitation and discrimination that part-time workers face the length and breadth of the country.

All too often, part-time workers are treated as second-class by their employers. That attitude has been condoned and encouraged by the deregulation mania on the Conservative Benches. We must remember that, behind every tale of exploitation, there is a human being with feelings and with a life to plan and to organise.

Part-time work is an increasing feature in Britain, rising from 12 per cent. of the work force in the 1950s to 25 per cent. in the 1990s, and it is expected to reach more than 30 per cent. by the turn of the century. Six million of our fellow citizens work part-time. Most part-timers are women. Many choose to work shorter hours because it best enables them to juggle their caring responsibilities with their need or desire to earn their own living.

Many such women, however, have found themselves full-time breadwinners as part-time service jobs have replaced full-time manufacturing jobs. As I have shown, many people classified by their employers as "part-time" are working full-time hours, but failing to qualify for full-time rights.

Part-time work is not a hobby. It is not done for pin money, although it often pays peanuts. It makes a vital contribution to the household budget. People who work part-time deserve dignity, rights and access to such things as holiday and sick pay. It is about time hon. Members took part-time workers' needs seriously. Most are happy to work part-time, but they are unhappy that they are treated differently from their full-time colleagues. They want equal and fair treatment. The Bill would help them to achieve it.

Until recently, part-time workers were actively discriminated against by official Government policy. The deregulators in the Government have made a virtue out of discrimination. They have systematically stripped away protections from all people at work, but especially from part-timers. They used to have to wait five years before they qualified for any employment rights at all, but, thanks to a House of Lords judgment, their treatment has been equalised with that of full-timers.

Now is the time to extend that principle to other areas, because discrimination is still rife. The pay gap between full-time and part-time workers is large and widening. More than 500,000 part-timers earn less than £2.50 about hour. Low pay means that 2 million part-timers do not earn even the £57 a week needed to pay national insurance contributions. With no record of such payment, they are ineligible for any contributory benefits, so, if they fall ill, they have no access to statutory sick pay.

As the deregulators in the Government have declined to require employers who provide occupational sick pay schemes to ensure that they cover all their employees, those benefits do not plug the sick pay gap, either. One in every three part-timers is completely excluded from sick pay benefits by his or her employer.

Paid holiday entitlement is an equally important issue. Most full-time workers have it, but it is often denied to part-timers. Britain is unique in the European Union in having no statutory right to paid holidays at all, yet most full-time workers have managed to preserve their entitlements, despite deregulation mania, and 84 per cent. of them get at least 20 days a year. Yet 1.7 million part-timers get no paid holiday at all, despite the fact that, as the House has heard, some of them work long hours.

All that would change if Britain were to adopt the working time directive due to come into force in November. Far from welcoming that modest civilising measure, the Government have pulled out all the stops to defeat it. First they tried to veto the directive. They failed. Now they are spending lots of taxpayers' money at the European Court arguing for the constitutional principle that national Governments should be allowed to condone whatever exploitation of their citizens they see fit, without interference from nasty foreigners. The European Court, by the way, is the institution that 77 Conservative Members last week voted to have nothing to do with.

It is not an edifying spectacle to see the party of Macleod and Macmillan, and even of Disraeli, reduced to that slavish devotion to a cruel and out-of-date economic dogma. Of course the ideological gurus of Thatcherism will oppose my Bill. The deregulators who have taken their Adam Smith a bit too literally will be lining up to denounce it.

Those people have a dream for Britain: they see us as the sweatshop of Europe, and in their delusion, they fondly imagine that we can compete and earn our way in the world by having labour costs lower than those in places such as Albania—and presumably, lower even then those in the Chinese gulag. They have a simple mantra, and we shall probably hear it chanted at us again today. They say that lower wages and worse conditions mean more jobs, while higher wages and better conditions destroy jobs—unless, of course, one happens to be Cedric Brown.

Logically, that means that no wages and no conditions would create an infinite number of jobs. Why do those people not take their policy to its logical conclusion, and reinstate slavery to solve the unemployment problem? Even Adam Smith did not think that things were that simple—but why let reality intrude on a good piece of economic dogma, even if it did cause widespread starvation and misery when it was first tried during the industrial revolution?

The classical economic dogmas that were used to oppress starving weavers and to justify the workhouse are now being applied, albeit more subtly, to the 6 million of our fellow citizens who work part-time. The ever present prospect of arbitrary treatment at work with no redress is one of the major causes of the fear and insecurity now stalking the land. It explains the non-appearance of the feel-good factor, it is unfair and inefficient, and ultimately it will destroy our competitiveness.

We can compete in a global market only on the basis of education, skill, and the real flexibility that comes from having a stake at work and in society. Rights and entitlements for all workers are a part of that, and it is time for the House to recognise the contribution of part-time workers, by granting them full-time rights.

3.47 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): I am grateful for the opportunity to oppose the Bill, because I maintain strongly that it is really an Unemployment (Increase) Bill. In many ways, the debate is timely, because last week the German Government announced a package of public spending cuts totalling £22 billion, and admitted that economic growth in Germany would be worse than previously expected.

One of the main objectives cited by the federal Government was a cut in non-wage labour costs. As the Financial Times reported last Friday, the German Government hope to make a big dent in their 4 million army of the unemployed by exempting many small companies from employment rules and from compulsory sick pay.

The Bill would simply add to Britain's non-wage labour costs, at a time when our competitors are fast realising that their costs are too high, and that we are at a competitive advantage because ours are lower. One look at youth unemployment proves that. In Spain, it stands at 38.2 per cent., and in France at 27.7 per cent., but in the United Kingdom it is below 14 per cent. As the hon. Lady pointed out somewhat ironically, we have one of the highest participation rates in the labour market, and the Bill would destroy that.

Like so much of what purports to be Labour party policy, the Bill is born of the mistaken notion that passing legislation can improve life just like that, without any adverse effects. It is born of a lack of experience of how the world works. It shows no understanding of the world of work or of the world of business decision making.

[Mr. Alan Duncan]

It is like saying that, if I were to introduce a ten-minute Bill to make everyone a millionaire, I could in one fell swoop abolish poverty and make everyone rich. It looks at only one side of the equation, and conveniently ignores the basic truth, that anyone who wants to employ someone has to count the cost of doing so. That cost involves not only the weekly pay cheque but all the other costs, risks and obligations that legislation and commercial reality add to the basic pay packet.

It is often small companies that employ people part-time. What is paid by the employer and what is achieved by the employee are often matched penny for penny, with little room for movement. Anything that might put financial obligations on the employer that went beyond the wealth-creating, productive effort of the employee could destroy the business, and would certainly destroy the job opportunity.

At the very least, the imposition of higher non-wage labour costs would put downward pressure on the level of wages paid in hard cash by the employer to the employee in the first place. Many employers and small businesses count their pennies closely. The last thing they want as they get off the ground and struggle to grow is legal obligations such as this, that may hit them in a way they cannot predict or afford.

It was astonishing that the hon. Lady went on about slave labour, while showing no understanding of what creates job opportunities and underpins their survival. But perhaps we should not be so surprised. The Labour party's entire economic programme, such as it is, is a well-crafted platform of deceit. It talks about creating jobs, while intending to do everything in practice to destroy them. It talks about low pay, yet it would tax jobs with further burdens such as this Bill, which would lead to lower pay or joblessness. It talks of the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer, while wanting to introduce measures such as this, which would end up making the poor poorer still. It talks about financing mass unemployment, yet this Bill would create more unemployment and require even greater Government finance to pay for it.

The Bill is designed—and cunningly designed—to make people feel that they would be better off under Labour, when the cruel truth is that they would be thrown out of work by a party that remains anti-business and largely ignorant of it.

Where do Labour Members acquire their experience of business? From the trade unions? From their council work? From their work in the media or as lecturers? It rarely comes from the real work of wealth creation. [Interruption.] Let us consider, in the face of this barracking from Opposition Members, Labour's Front-Bench Department of Trade and Industry team. It comprises Members who at one time or another have been a policy researcher, a poverty lobbyist, a journalist, a welfare rights officer, a lecturer, a radio presenter, a National Association of Local Government Officers official, and a local authority adviser.

That those hon. Members have had no experience of government is at least explicable, but that they have had no experience of anything very much at all leaves them insultingly ill-equipped to understand the interests and mechanisms of Britain's wealth-creating sector. Take their leader, their shadow Chancellor and their absent spokesman on trade and industry; take the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle); take almost all of them—the only thing they have ever run in their lives is a bath.

The extension of full employment rights to all part-time, temporary and casual workers—a commitment included in the Labour document, "A New Economic Future for Britain"—would cost British firms an estimated £1.5 billion. That is a punitively high tax on jobs. It is a massive bill with which to saddle some of the most vulnerable, smallest and newest businesses. That is a foretaste of what would happen if there were ever to be a Labour Government.

I must say one thing to the hon. Lady and those on the Opposition Front Bench. If she and others want to make a spending commitment, let them do so honestly and openly, instead of disguising it in a Bill of this sort. It is part of the Labour party's sly attempt to raise expectations of what various groups would enjoy under Labour. It is a ploy born partly of wilful deceit and partly of staggering naivety on how the real world of business works. Those hopes would be raised only to be cruelly and cynically dashed.

Who on earth would employ a student part-time? Who would bother to take on youngsters whose opportunity in life might already have been blighted by a Labour Government's £1,000 tax on their study for A-levels? Let us be absolutely clear about the effects of the hon. Lady's legislation. On behalf of all those whose jobs she would destroy, having first manoeuvred to buy their votes, let me make it absolutely clear that we will hound her and remind her until kingdom come that her Bill, if it ever becomes law, and the policy of the Labour party, are a comprehensive job destruction package, which would achieve the very opposite of what I hope she genuinely wants.

I urge the hon. Lady to forget the Bill, and to drop it. It is no more than a misguided act of wishful thinking that would destroy the job prospects of thousands, who deserve a far better opportunity in life than that on offer from the hon. Lady today.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Ms Angela Eagle, Ms Jean Corston, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Ms Roseanna Cunningham, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Miss Emma Nicholson and Mr. Hugh Dykes.

Part-Time Employees (Equal Rights to Sick Pay and Leave)

Ms Angela Eagle accordingly presented a Bill to provide that employers give the same entitlements to sick pay and leave to their part-time staff as they do to their full-time staff: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 12 July and to be printed. [Bill 116.]

Orders of the Day

Housing Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New clause 10

COLLECTIVE ENFRANCHISEMENT: REMOVAL OF NEED FOR PROFESSIONAL VALUATION OF INTERESTS TO BE ACQUIRED

'In section 13 of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 (notice by qualifying tenants of claim to exercise right to collective enfranchisement) subsection (6) (tenants to obtain professional valuation of interests proposed to be acquired before giving notice) shall cease to have effect.'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.58 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 21 to 25.

Mr. Clappison: These amendments arise from considerations in Committee, when the Government undertook to give further consideration to the position in respect of the current statutory requirement that leaseholders in blocks of flats who want to exercise their right to collective enfranchisement must first obtain a professional valuation of the interest that they want to acquire.

The original purpose of the provision was as a safeguard for leaseholders. The process for collective enfranchisement can often be complicated, and that is especially so when a large number of leaseholders are involved. Normally, they will be required to enter together into some form of participation agreement, in order for negotiations with the freeholder to proceed. From the outset, it seems sensible that they should be informed of their likely financial commitments arising out of potential enfranchisement.

However, the Government have considered carefully the arguments that were put forward during deliberations in Committee, and we have accepted that they carry some weight. In most cases, it would still seem prudent for leaseholders to take professional advice at an early stage. However, we accept that not every case will be as complicated as others and that there should be more flexibility in the avenues open to leaseholders. For example, they may be able to take advantage of advice offered by the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service. In addition, several leasehold valuation tribunal decisions are now available and a number of groups representing leaseholders have gained substantial experience and can often help in that area.

I accept that a statutory requirement to seek an initial valuation does not apply to the enfranchisement of houses and to lease extensions. Although collective enfranchisement for blocks of flats can be more complicated, there is an anomaly in that respect. I also understand that the removal of that requirement is supported by a number of leaseholder groups, which believe that it involves them in unnecessary expense. Therefore, the Government accept that there is a danger that the provision is over-prescriptive.

New clause 10, together with the related consequential amendments, will remove that requirement from the collective enfranchisement procedures set out in the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): As the Minister has made clear, new clause 10 removes the requirement of a leaseholder to obtain a valuation before he can proceed with an enfranchisement claim. This new clause is in response to a new clause that the Labour party moved in Committee, which had a similar effect. In Committee, the Minister said that he was unconvinced by the need for it, but he agreed to reflect on the issue.

We are delighted that the Government, on mature reflection, have concluded that our proposals were appropriate and that they have now come forward with this reform. We welcome it, like many other leasehold reform measures that we moved in Committee. We know that they are worth while, that they will assist leaseholders and that they will help to make a reality of leasehold enfranchisement. We shall be delighted to see this new clause added to the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 11

PROVISION OF GENERAL LEGAL ADVICE ABOUT RESIDENTIAL TENANCIES

'.—(1) The Secretary of State may give financial assistance to any person in relation to the provision by that person of general advice about—

(a) any aspect of the law of landlord and tenant, so far as relating to residential tenancies, or

(b) Chapter IV of Part I of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 (estate management schemes in connection with enfranchisement).

(2) Financial assistance under this section may be given in such form and on such terms as the Secretary of State considers appropriate.

(3) The terms on which financial assistance under this section may be given may, in particular, include provision as to the circumstances in which the assistance must be repaid or otherwise made good to the Secretary of State and the manner in which that is to be done.'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In Committee, a number of hon. Members paid tribute to the work of the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service. The service was established shortly after the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 came into force, with joint public and private sector funding. Its principal role has been to provide initial information to landlords and tenants on the legislative provisions relating to leasehold enfranchisement. Since its inception, it has dealt with approximately 8,000 inquiries.

[Mr. Clappison]

The Government's commitment to the service has been to provide initial funding for three years, ending in December this year. That commitment will be honoured in full. The commitment was limited to three years because it was envisaged that a growing familiarity with the provisions of the Act would develop in that time. It was thought that leaseholders would be less in need of such an advice service, as a wider range of solicitors, valuers and practitioners would gain experience in that area.

However, in practice, the progress on enfranchisement has been less rapid than our initial expectations in some respects. Leaseholders have been exercising their rights to lease extension enfranchisement, and the leasehold valuation tribunals have been hearing a number of test cases and resolving disputes between landlords and tenants.

There is still a way to go and all parties are agreed that there is a useful role for an advice service to perform beyond the end of this year. A further factor is the new package of leaseholders' rights contained in the Bill. They involve new and, in some cases, necessarily complex procedures. The Government believe that there is further scope for an impartial advice service to help in that area.

The Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service has been funded for the first three years through the Department's special grants programme. Projects supported in that way are expected to generate matching private sector funding with public sector support. That funding would normally have been phased out after the initial three-year period. The purpose of the new clause is therefore to give the Secretary of State a specific power to provide financial support to an advice service dealing with landlord and tenant issues, on a more permanent footing. We shall still seek a substantial private sector contribution, but a further period of support under the special grants programme would not be appropriate.

My Department will shortly enter into detailed discussions with the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service about how it envisages the development of its longer-term role. I make no commitment that the Department will defer the funding beyond the end of 1996, but we shall consider the case of the advisory service along with the other competing claims on my Department's resources. The new clause keeps open the possibility of longer-term funding of the service.

Mr. Raynsford: As the Minister said, new clause 11 was tabled in response to a case made in Committee. I am pleased to say that in Committee we had all-party support on the issue. The right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) and the hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby) backed my calls on behalf of the Opposition for continuing funding of the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service.

As the Minister rightly acknowledged, the service provides excellent, impartial advice to leaseholders on very complex matters relating to leasehold enfranchisement, and it receives an increasing number of requests for help on aspects that are currently outside its remit. There is, therefore, a case for not only continuous funding for the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service, but a wider remit to enable it to deal with other leasehold matters, especially disputes relating to service charges and so on, which cause a great deal of concern to leaseholders and about which requests for help are made to the service.

As the Minister acknowledged, leasehold enfranchisement has not progressed as fast as the Government initially hoped. Whatever the reasons—some of which we shall explore in later debates—there is agreement on both sides of the House that we should assist enfranchisement. The provision of expert advisory services is a very important way of doing so.

The costs involved in obtaining expert assistance from lawyers and other professionals can be a very serious deterrent to leaseholders, and the availability of a free, expert service is, in my view and that of most people who have studied the matter, essential if the process of leasehold enfranchisement is to proceed. We shall explore other essential issues in later debates.

For all those reasons, we very much welcome the Government's decision to table the new clause. The Minister was cautious in what he said about how it may be applied. I understand that he cannot give a cast-iron commitment, but he is aware that, under current arrangements, the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service does not have funding beyond the end of this year—a period of only eight months.

It is unreasonable for such a service, which provides valuable expertise to numerous leaseholders, to be unable to guarantee its continued operation more than eight months ahead. I hope that the Minister will move swiftly to enter the discussions that he described.

Mr. David Ashby (North–West Leicestershire): The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that later amendments relate to further enfranchisement, about which more advice will be required. That makes the service even more important.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. Not only is financial uncertainty hanging over the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service, but the service is likely to have rather more work if, as a result of our considerations today, we substantially advance the opportunities for enfranchisement.

For all those reasons, I urge the Minister to enter into discussions urgently with all the parties, to try to ensure that the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service has the necessary financial resources to maintain its service in the immediately foreseeable future and build on a stronger financial footing for the long term.

Mr. Peter Brooke (City of London and Westminster, South): I shall be brief. My constituents enter on both sides of the equation, as advisers and advisees. I declared a tangential and anticipatory interest in Committee, and I declare the same interest now.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the speed with which the Government have reacted. I only serve quiet notice that we shall maintain vigilance on the conduct of and developments in the conversations.

Mrs. Diana Maddock (Christchurch): I welcome the Minister's commitment to examining the problem. In Committee, we expressed our appreciation of the valuable work done by the Leasehold Enfranchisement Advisory Service. I am only disappointed that the question whether and when it will definitely be funded remains open-ended. I hope that the Minister will consider the matter and come back to us as soon as possible. There is all-party support, and he is aware that people need advice desperately.

Hon. Members have pointed out that more advice will be sought in the future. As the costs and difficulties associated with often very complicated legal matters increase, people will need a proper advice service. I urge the Minister not to let the matter slide—although I am sure that hon. Members will ensure that he does not.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 21

LOW RENT TEST: EXTENSION OF RIGHTS

'. Schedule [Low rent test: extension of rights] (which makes provision for conferring an additional right to enfranchisement in relation to tenancies which fail the low rent test and for introducing an alternative to the low rent test in the case of the right of collective enfranchisement and the right to a new lease) shall have effect.'.—[Mr. Gummer.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendment No. 152.

Government new schedule 2—Low rent test: extension of rights—

Right to enfranchisement

1. In the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, after section 1A there shall be inserted—

"Additional right to enfranchisement only in case of houses whose rent exceeds applicable limit under section 4.

1AA.—(1) Where—

(a) section 1(1) above would apply in the case of the tenant of a house but for the fact that the tenancy is not a tenancy at a low rent, and

(b) the tenancy falls within subsection (2) below and is not an excluded tenancy,

this Part of this Act shall have effect to confer on the tenant the same right to acquire the freehold of the house and premises as would be conferred by section 1(1) above if it were a tenancy at a low rent.

(2) A tenancy falls within this subsection if—

(a) it is granted for a term of years certain exceeding fifty years, whether or not it is (or may become) terminable before the end of that term by notice given by or to the tenant or by re-entry, forfeiture or otherwise,

(b) it is for a term fixed by law under a grant with a covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal, unless it is a tenancy by sub-demise from one which is not a tenancy which falls within this subsection,

(c) it is a tenancy taking effect under section 149(6) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (leases terminable after a death or marriage), or

(d) it is a tenancy which—

(i) is or has been granted for a term of years certain not exceeding fifty years, but with a covenant or obligation for renewal without payment of a premium (but not for perpetual renewal), and

(ii) is or has been once or more renewed so as to bring to more than fifty years the total of the terms granted (including any interval between the end of a tenancy and the grant of a renewal).

(3) A tenancy is an excluded tenancy for the purposes of subsection (1) above if—

(a) the house which the tenant occupies under the tenancy is in an area designated for the purposes of this provision as a rural area by order made by the Secretary of State,

(b) the freehold of that house is owned together with adjoining land which is not occupied for residential purposes, and

(c) the tenancy was granted on or before the day on which section [Low rent test: extension of rights] of the Housing Act 1996 comes into force.

(4) Where this Part of this Act applies as if there were a single tenancy of property comprised in two or more separate tenancies, then, if each of the separate tenancies falls within subsection (2) above, this section shall apply as if the single tenancy did so.

(5) The power to make an order under subsection (3) above shall be exercisable by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament."

2.—(1) In consequence of paragraph 1 above, the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 shall be amended as follows.

(2) In section 1(3A)(b) (extension of rights not to apply to existing lettings by charitable housing trusts), after "1A" there shall be inserted ", 1AA".

(3) In section 3(3) (provision for aggregation of successive tenancies), after "this Part of this Act" there shall be inserted ", except section 1AA,".

(4) In section 9(1C) (price payable by tenant on enfranchisement by virtue of section 1A or 1B), after "1A" there shall be inserted ", 1AA".

(5) In section 9A(1) (compensation payable where right to enfranchisement arises by virtue of section 1A or 1B), after "1A" there shall be inserted ", 1AA".

(6) In section 32A(1)(b) (extensions to right to enfranchisement not to apply in relation to existing tenancies of property transferred for public benefit), at the end there shall be inserted "or if section 1AA above were not in force".

(7) In section 37(4) (treatment for the purposes of Part I of tenancy granted to continue as a periodical tenancy after the expiration of a term of years certain), after "this Part of this Act" there shall be inserted ", except section 1AA,".

(8) In Part II of Schedule 3 (procedural provisions), in paragraph 6 (which makes provision about the contents of a tenant's notice under Part I), after sub-paragraph (1) there shall be inserted—

"(1A) Where the tenant gives the notice by virtue of section 1AA of this Act, sub-paragraph (1) above shall have effect with the substitution for paragraph (b) of—

"(b) such particulars of the tenancy as serve to identify the instrument creating the tenancy and show that the tenancy is one in relation to which section 1AA(1) of this Act has effect to confer a right to acquire the freehold of the house and premises;"."

(9) In that Part of that Schedule, in paragraph 7(4) (admission in landlord's notice of tenant's right to have freehold to be binding on landlord, so far as relating to matters mentioned in section 1(1)(a) and (b)), for "mentioned in section 1(1)(a) and (b) of this Act" there shall be substituted "relevant to the existence of that right".

Right to collective enfranchisement

3.—(1) Chapter I of Part I of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 (collective enfranchisement in case of tenants of flats) shall be amended as follows.

(2) Section 5 (qualifying tenants) shall be amended as follows—

(a) in subsection (1) (which defines a qualifying tenant as a tenant of a flat under a long lease at a low rent), for "at a low rent" there shall be substituted "which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term", and

(b) in subsection (2)(c) (which excludes from the definition a tenant under a lease granted in breach of the terms of a superior lease which is not a long lease at a low rent), after "rent" there shall be inserted "or for a particularly long term".

(3) After section 8 there shall be inserted—

"Meaning of "particularly long term"

8A.—(1) For the purposes of this Chapter a long lease is for a particularly long term if—

(a) it is granted for a term of years certain exceeding 50 years, whether or not it is (or may become) terminable before the end of that term by notice given by or to the tenant or by re-entry, forfeiture or otherwise,

(b) it is for a term fixed by law under a grant with a covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal (other than a lease by sub-demise from one which is not for a particularly long term),

(c) it takes effect under section 149(6) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (leases terminable after a death or marriage), or

(d) it is a lease which—

(i) is or has been granted for a term of years certain not exceeding 50 years, but with a covenant or obligation for renewal without payment of a premium (but not for perpetual renewal), and

(ii) is or has been renewed on one or more occasions so as to bring to more than 50 years the total of the terms granted (including any interval between the end of a lease and the grant of a renewal).

(2) A long lease which does not fall within subsection (1) above shall nonetheless be treated for the purposes of this Chapter as being for a particularly long term if it is a long lease by virtue of paragraph (c) or (d) of section 7(1).

(3) Where this Chapter applies as if there were a single lease of property comprised in two or more separate leases, then, if each of the separate leases is for a particularly long term, this Chapter shall apply as if the single lease were for such a term."

(4) In section 13(3)(e) (particulars to be included in initial notice which relevant to whether person a qualifying tenant), in sub-paragraph (ii), for "a lease at a low rent" there shall be substituted "at a low rent or for a particularly long term".

Right to new lease

4.—(1) Chapter II of that Part (individual right of tenant of flat to acquire new lease) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In section 39(3) (provisions of Chapter I which apply for the purposes of Chapter II), at the end of paragraph (c) there shall be inserted ", and

(d) section 8A,".

(3) In section 42(3) (particulars to be included in notice by qualifying tenant of claim to exercise right), in paragraph (b)(iii), there shall be inserted at the end "or, in accordance with section 8A (as that section so applies), a lease for a particularly long term".

5.—(1) In Chapter VII of that Part (general), section 94 (Crown land) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (3) (disapplication of restriction imposed by section 3(2) of the Crown Estate Act 1961 on term for which lease may be granted by Crown Estate Commissioners), in paragraph (a), for "at a low rent" there shall be substituted "which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term".

(3) In subsection (4) (power to shadow statutory rights), for "at a low rent" there shall be substituted "which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term".

(4) For subsection (12) there shall be substituted—

"(12) For the purposes of this section "long lease which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term" shall be construed in accordance with sections 7, 8 and 8A."."

And the following amendments thereto: (a), in line 9, leave out from 'tenancy' to 'is'.

(b), in line 14, leave out from beginning to end of line 34.

(c), in line 47, leave out from beginning to 'this'.

(d), in line 82, leave out from beginning to end.

Government amendment No. 153.

Mr. Gummer: The new clause and amendments deal with the qualifying condition for enfranchisement rights, either under the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 concerning houses or under the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 concerning flats. I have a particular interest in that area, both as Minister responsible for London and because reference was made in debate to the particular, and some would say peculiar, circumstances of rural areas such as the one that I represent.

The policy has been to give enfranchisement rights to leaseholders who might be regarded as owner-occupiers. That policy lies at the heart of the discussions: how does one distinguish between those who are leaseholders, as one understands that term, and those who may be leaseholders in the sense that they hold a lease but who have been paying a proper market rent as tenants would? In such cases, the lease is a matter of convenience between them and the landlord. It may well have been chosen by either side, or by both sides, at some past date.

Two tests establish whether the leaseholder is an owner-occupier. First, there is the length of the lease, which should generally be more than 21 years. Secondly, the tenant must pay only a nominal ground rent rather than a market rent. If those two conditions are satisfied, except during the final years of the lease, the tenant is likely to have a greater financial stake in the property than the landlord.

There has always been a low-rent test. It was a mechanism for distinguishing between the real leaseholder—I use the word "real" in the sense of the person whom we understand to be the leaseholder—and someone who has a lease but who is a tenant in all other respects. The form differs slightly according to the circumstances, but it generally requires that the rent should be less than two thirds of the rateable value of the property. The purpose of the test is to distinguish in the way that I have suggested.

There are always arguments about how one establishes such a figure, and discussions at every stage have sought to arrive at a sensible position regarding leasehold enfranchisement. There were heated discussions about the principle—and particularly about the mechanisms by which one establishes that principle.

[Mr. Gummer]

An amendment was carried in Committee, to remove the low-rent test. That decision was based not on the idea that renting tenants should be given enfranchisement rights, but on the fact that the low-rent test has caused difficulties in practice. In other words, I do not think that people sought to give enfranchisement to those who manifestly were not, in common parlance, leaseholders of the sort that we are describing. They felt, perfectly reasonably, that the present mechanism for distinguishing between the two types of leaseholder is faulty and occasionally leads to anomalies and sometimes to downright hardship.

There are leases where the rent is technically above the low-rent limit, but is closer to being a nominal ground rent than a rack rent. In some cases, that has arisen by accident, perhaps because properties were not revalued for rating purposes between 1973 and the end of the rating system in 1990, although ground rents crept up slightly in line with inflation. In other cases, some landlords intentionally set rents slightly above the limit. The discussions in Committee were directed at those very people. That is why I accepted the arguments in Committee for reform.

4.15 pm

The test currently excludes some tenancies, which, on any reading of the previous legislation, should enjoy enfranchisement rights.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Secretary of State now tell the House how many such tenancies exist?

Mr. Gummer: I cannot say exactly how many there are, but later in my speech I shall tell the hon. Gentleman the precise percentage of tenancies that the measure is intended to cover. I am sure that he will be happy about that, but he must listen to my proposal.

Mr. Ashby: Does a long lease at a rack rent exist? In my understanding, there is no such thing.

Mr. Gummer: I have to tell my hon. Friend, for whom I have great respect, that on this occasion, he is wrong. He must not believe that because I cannot tell him how many elephants there are in Africa, there are no elephants in Africa. That is not a reasonable argument. There are such leases. To put it simply, if there were not, my hon. Friend would have no worries, as everything that he seeks would be achieved. There are such leases and it is only reasonable to deal with them equitably. In the same mode in which I have approached the whole issue, I am seeking merely to achieve equity. That seems perfectly reasonable.

Mr. Ashby: On equity, does my right hon. Friend consider it right that there should be different forms of long lease? Is it not fair for one group of long leaseholders to be treated the same as the other? That is equity.

Mr. Gummer: If my hon. Friend had followed the argument, he would know that that depends on the nature of the leaseholding. If, to all intents and purposes, a long leaseholder is an owner-occupier who pays a ground rent, that is one class of leaseholder. Other long leaseholders pay a full tenant's rent. They are not leaseholders in the sense that he and I understand it or those to whom many of my hon. Friends, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) and my hon. Friends the Members for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) and for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) referred—leaseholders who, for one reason or another, are excluded from the enfranchisement legislation. My proposal relates to those people.

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State will be aware that the Leasehold Enfranchisement Association has enormous experience of enfranchisement. It has represented leaseholders for many years and has done stalwart work to advance enfranchisement. Mrs. Joan South, the secretary of the Leasehold Enfranchisement Association, wrote to me as follows:

"In our organisation we have never come across a single 'long' lease that has anything like a market rent."

If the Secretary of State cannot tell us how many such properties exist, will he accept the verdict of the Leasehold Enfranchisement Association that it is a chimera, not reality?

Mr. Gummer: I wish to make three points to the hon. Gentleman. First, I have made my way through complicated legislation on a whole range of matters, including all the detailed problems of agricultural tenancies and the like, and I have learnt that anyone who suggests that circumstances cannot arise is usually wrong. Such complications need to be considered extremely carefully, and one needs to recognise that even those with experience may well find that their experience is almost entirely with people who see themselves as long leaseholders of the sort with which the Bill is concerned. Therefore, it is perfectly reasonable that those who never have seen themselves as long leaseholders and have always seen themselves as full-blown tenants who happen to have a long lease would not be in touch with the organisation to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I do not find that surprising.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Gummer: I wish to give the hon. Gentleman the three reasons, because it is important to face them.

The second reason is as follows. Let us say that I am entirely mistaken. If so, no harm is done because those few people who may be in that position will find themselves properly protected, and those who are not—I am told by the hon. Gentleman that they are the vast majority, and my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby) said that there are only three or four in the first position—

Mr. Raynsford: There is none.

Mr. Gummer: However small the number is, I do not find it possible to believe that they will be disadvantaged. It is possible for a reasonable relationship between landlord and tenant to be entered into, in which the landlord decides that he would like to have a long lease and gives a long lease in permanence to a tenant, who is then responsible for renovations and who pays the full market rent—not a ground rent, not even a pseudo-ground rent, nor even a bit above ground rent—as a tenant. That is all that we suggest, and I cannot see that that is a disadvantage.

My third reason is that it is very important that we should recognise that there are other areas, outside the centre of London, which are thus affected. Some of those areas are in the country and, for large estates in particular, it is part of how they operate to have long leases for proper tenants who are seen as tenants. Happily, continuity still reigns in many of those estates and the long leases are seen as a means of maintaining continuity. I would therefore like to protect those people in particular, and I think that there is no disagreement about them across the Floor of the House.

Mr. Raynsford: As the Secretary of State will know from studying our amendments, we accept entirely the position on rural areas. We shall debate later an amendment that makes provision for that, because there are genuine problems that we are keen to address. As for the notional existence of long leases at a market rent for which the Secretary of State is making special provisions and creating a new 50-year test in new clause 21, there is no evidence for them. The Leasehold Enfranchisement Association says that it has no evidence, but it has brought substantial evidence of people who will be disadvantaged by the 50-year test that the Secretary of State proposes. Would not it be sensible to reconsider?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must listen to me when I come to the 50-year test. In contradistinction to the views that he has put forward, those who represent the landlords suggest that there are significant numbers in the long-lease category. All I say to the hon. Gentleman is that it would be better, when considering such matters, to consider them from the point of view of equity. I was brought up to believe that if one person was accounted just, he should not suffer for all the 90 and nine who were not. If that is the case, we should have a system that includes even a small number of cases. My hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire has said that there are only three or four cases—I believe that all the evidence points to many more—but even if that were so, we should take account of them.

Perhaps it would be better sometimes for people to have the confidence of a long lease even if they were full-blown tenants. To exclude or discourage that option would be a pity. The hon. Gentleman has not so far objected to the principle, but fears the 50-year term. I shall come to that aspect in a moment. I want to establish that we are trying to enfranchise real leaseholders and that it is not unreasonable to distinguish between them and tenants who have a long lease. That distinction is not new, but is found in both the previous substantive pieces of legislation, which introduced a low-rent test to make the distinction. It would be odd if we were suddenly to discover that provision is not needed because no such tenants exist. Landlords believe that they do and have cited examples, so it does not seem unreasonable to make appropriate provision—and to examine the disadvantages of doing so.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Lest my right hon. Friend be discouraged by constant criticisms and questions, people such as myself complained in respect of the 1993 legislation that while good landlords, such as the Duke of Westminster, were being protected by enfranchisement, a large number of retirement leaseholders in properties built by companies such as McCarthy and Stone and others were excluded. It appears that the Government are now proposing that long leases for retirement leaseholders will have the same advantages as other leases. Does my right hon. Friend agree that as that is the case, the Bill is a major step forward and will give rights to tenants who were previously unfairly excluded?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. I have considerable sympathy with the need to enfranchise retirement leaseholders. There are a number of retirement developments in my constituency—as I share with my hon. Friend the clement weather and pleasurable areas of East Anglia, to which many people go to retire and to whom a protected lease is important. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that there is a distinction between the person who buys accommodation but on a lease, for the obvious reasons in such circumstances, and the person who has a long lease but pays a normal tenancy rent. Everyone has sought to make that distinction year after year. Labour has produced the entirely novel concept that such tenants do not exist. If that is so, why did Labour suggest such a distinction in its legislation and support that distinction in later legislation?

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Duke of Westminster is one of the finest landlords in the country? He is marvellous at maintaining his properties and does not charge exorbitant rents. The duke went to great trouble some years ago to ensure that he was allowed to keep properties in London to let to people described as working-class tenants—which he does at considerable financial cost to himself.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to point out that we must be careful not to suggest that the word "landlord" equates with a bad landlord. There are many good landlords in London, but they are not helped by the activities of the kind of person for whom the Bill is primarily designed. There are bad landlords and freeholders, and many of them have recently entered the business. They view their involvement not as a long-term commitment to a part of a city, as do the Westminster or Cadogan estates, but as a means of providing income in ways never envisaged by the freeholding system.

That is why I personally took the decision that this part of the Bill should include protection. As the Minister responsible for London, I could see how damaging the absence of such protection could be. All that I am trying to introduce is equity. We need to protect people from the activities of poor landlords—or downright bad landlords—but in a way that respects the excellence of the good ones, not least because there is much to be said for encouraging them. One of the problems from which the nation as a whole has suffered is the way in which landlords have been discouraged because there has not been a distinction between the good and the bad. That is what I am trying to do in the new clause.

Mr. Ashby: I understand what my right hon. Friend is trying to do, but does he not accept that he is turning existing laws upside down? Why not introduce a paragraph into the schedule, perhaps in another place, to say that, where the rent on a long lease approximates to the rent, so that a rent officer would establish that, such a test would be absolutely fair, because that is a rack rent? We could say that, if it was within 20 per cent. of a rent that a rent officer would fix for the premises, it would be excluded from enfranchisement. That would deal with the matter.

[Mr. Ashby]

4.30 pm

Mr. Gummer: We have tried all sorts of mixes and they have not stood the test of time. Therefore, I think that my hon. Friend will see—if I am allowed to proceed a little, on the mixture of things that I propose—that what we propose is a helpful way in which to deal with the problem that he sees.

Some leases of more than 25 years have rack rents, and in those cases the tenant's stake has never been anywhere near as significant as that of the landlord. Some landlords, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman)—who is still with us but, rather confusingly, has moved to another seat—referred, wish to let properties for rent. They want to give tenants a substantial period of security, and there is no reason why they should not do so. Indeed, there is every reason to make that possible. So it is a question not only of their present number, but of the possibility of having them in the future. Those leases run for 25 to 35 years at market rents, and we need to recognise that we have responsibilities on both sides.

I want to try to take seriously the argument on which the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) previously justified enfranchisement, taken from the 1966 White Paper, that the land belongs in equity to the landowner and the house belongs in equity to the leaseholder. That equity would not apply where the rent is a market rent. The Government's new clause, offered as an alternative to the current clause 95, allows tenants with leases of more than 50 years to qualify for enfranchisement rights, irrespective of the rent paid. The first thing that we do is remove the need for a low-rent test when one has such a lease. That applies both to houses and to flats. Those tenants will have to pay a fair market price if they wish to exercise their rights, on the same basis as houses and flats that became enfranchiseable as a result of the 1993 legislation.

Why 50 years? The fundamental purpose is to make the distinction that we have agreed needs to be made. Most leases are for 99 years or more. When we say 50 years, we are referring to the original length of the lease, not the time that it has to run. Leases were so long—99 years or more—because that was the only way in which people could get a mortgage. Properties would not have been mortgageable if they had had a shorter lease. Therefore, conventional mortgages were almost impossible to obtain on properties when the length of the lease was less than 60 or 70 years. If freeholders wanted to sell a property that had what one would call a proper lease, the lease was bound to be for such a length. Our amendment means that the great majority of leaseholders would no longer need to be concerned about the low-rent test.

The hon. Member for Greenwich—quite reasonably—is concerned about numbers. The great majority of leases of 50 years or less—the percentage is in the high 90s—constitute a specialist market: because they are not mortgageable in normal circumstances, they are usually sold only to cash buyers or to those who can raise bank finance. Such leases are found on some London estates, and sometimes in rural areas, where they are granted as part of a management strategy for looking after a farming estate. The terms vary considerably. Some will be at low rents, while in other instances the figures will be much closer to the full market rent. They are often granted where property is very expensive, and a shorter lease more similar to renting than full ownership may suit some purchasers.

The hon. Member for Greenwich has tabled amendments to my new schedule that would allow all leases of more than 21 years to enfranchise. The issue between the hon. Gentleman and me therefore concerns a relatively small number of leases with a length of between 21 and 50 years when granted. I accept that the hon. Gentleman does not now wish to extend the arrangement to the countryside, recognising that there are special circumstances there. Let me point out, however, that many of the considerations that make both of us not unhappy with what happens in the countryside—I am trying to put this in as unbiased a way as possible—could apply in towns. I think that that ought to be so, and that it would be better if such an arrangement were more widely used.

Mr. Raynsford: Like me, the Secretary of State will have received representations from the Country Landowners Association. It specifically points out that arrangements in the countryside essentially revolve around agricultural arrangements. Where are those arrangements likely to be replicated in London?

Mr. Gummer: I was trying to suggest that what the arrangements essentially revolve round is the need for continuity felt by many estate owners. I do not think that that need for continuity is to be found only in agricultural contexts. I do not disagree with those who want what some large landowners have—the ability to let, not sell, an albeit limited number of properties to real tenants at market rents. Letting such properties on a long lease will confer the continuity that owners of historic estates want in regard to tenants: they are looking not to one generation or even two, but back to many generations and forward to many more. I do not see why we should consider that inequitable; I think that it is rather a good idea, and I do not want to exclude it. Although I am a member of the Country Landowners Association, I am not bound by its view that all the arrangements must revolve around agriculture, horticulture or Welwyn Garden City.

Mr. Raynsford: I accept, inevitably, that we are not bound by the CLA's views. I am simply trying to establish—and I invite the Secretary of State to agree with me—that there is a fundamental difference between the circumstances applying in rural and agricultural communities and those applying in cities. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that, in its evidence to us, the CLA states:

"The reasons that surround the letting of houses on farms and estates on long leases are very different from the position in urban areas, where the leasehold system is widespread and akin to a business in its own right."

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that?

Mr. Gummer: I do not know why the hon. Gentleman wants to fall out with me. What the CLA has said is perfectly reasonable, but I suggest that what I have said is also reasonable. I have said that the existence of additional reasons why the arrangements are necessary in country areas does not mean that one aspect that is important in the country—continuity, and the wish for continuity that is so much part of long-established estates—should not be replicated in similarly long-established estates in the centre of London. I do not think that there is any difference between us in that regard: I think that my view is perfectly reasonable.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): The ability of the great estates in London to maintain continuity, which is so important to them, is entirely dependent on the financial contributions of their leaseholders. Such continuity surely denies equal continuity to leaseholders and their being able to pass on, in the words of the Prime Minister, what they own to their own. Such an ability is at present denied to leaseholders.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Lady must not have been present for all my speech or she would have heard me address precisely that. She and I disagree on almost everything on this earth, and I am right in almost every case. She must accept it from me that it is no good coming into the House, gathering together her prejudices, and assuming that I have said what I have not said. I have in fact said the opposite to that which she assumed, and I am sorry that what has so far been a reasonable debate has been changed by her.

Ms Jackson rose—

Mr. Gummer: I will not give way to the hon. Lady if she cannot debate reasonably. We are trying to discuss a fundamental issue. I have spent about 25 minutes trying to explain a crucial issue, and it is not helpful to the House to go over it again.

The real question is the 50 years and whether it is a sensible figure. I am trying to be as helpful as I can to my right hon. and hon. Friends and to Opposition Members. I took the 50 years from the tax legislation, so it is a natural break point, although I accept that it is not as significant as 21 years is in landlord and tenant legislation. It was suggested on Report during the passage of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, but I am not absolutely wedded to it.

My right hon. Friends the Members for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) and for Chelsea, and my hon. Friends who represent some other constituencies in central London, may wish to argue for a slight change. I shall happily look at any evidence. Although I would not say that the matter concerns no areas outside central London, it concerns almost entirely the centre of London, because only there were such shorter leases with real leaseholders possible. Elsewhere, the mortgageability of the place demanded a longer lease and there were fewer people who could buy relatively expensive properties on a cash basis.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): I am particularly pleased at my right hon. Friend's flexibility on the 50 years, which is important. I think that he recognises that the 50 years is an arbitrary figure and that it might be better if it were slightly lower. Whatever it should be, it should be pitched so that it enables the maximum number of people to benefit from the legislation. That could mean 45 years, so I am very grateful that my right hon. Friend has expressed his willingness to be flexible and to consider changes.

Mr. Gummer: As I said, I should like to look carefully at the examples. In setting the period at 50 years, we are dealing with up to 90 per cent. of cases. I am very happy to say to my hon. Friend that I do not want to exclude people. I am trying to do what previous legislation has sought to do, but—many of us feel—has not achieved. I am trying to find a way in which one can make a distinction between the leaseholder who is in our sense a real leaseholder, the sort of person to whom the hon. Member for Hampstead referred—

Ms Glenda Jackson: And Highgate.

Mr. Gummer:—the sort of person to whom the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) referred. If she had been present, she would have heard that I was trying to distinguish, as Labour as well as Conservative legislation has tried to do, between such real leaseholders and the sort of person who is affected by a long lease in a wholly different way, because he is a full-time tenant in the sense that he pays full rent, and the lease is long because it gives continuity and stability.

I want to meet the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire, so I hope that he will be happy with what I have done. I do not think that there is any longer any disagreement about rural areas.

If the House accepts the amendments, some consequential amendments will have to be made. In particular, there will need to be an opportunity for landlords to apply for estate management schemes, to cover properties that become newly enfranchised as a result of the changes. The Government will bring forward the necessary amendments in another place. I shall be able to consider at that time any suggestions made by my right hon. and hon. Friends and Opposition Members.

I hope that the House recognises that, in the proposals and with the flexibility that I am offering, I have sought to reach a reasonable solution on a very complicated matter. I have sought in a spirit of compromise to find an answer. I took issue with the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate because the accusations that she flung at me were exactly the opposite of what I said. I want to enfranchise all those who are real leaseholders, precisely for the reasons that she raised. I do not want to consider all landlords as bad landlords. Nor do I want to ignore landlords who have shown themselves to be not only poor, but thoroughly bad.

As the Minister with responsibility for London and because I recognised the concern, I was the one who proposed the change to the Bill. I hope that the House will accept that the compromise will meet the overwhelming range of worries, and at the same time the good freeholder, who does his job properly—the good landlord who has proper tenants and wants them to have a long lease—will be protected in equity.

4.45 pm

Mr. Ashby: It would be churlish of me if I were not to say how grateful I am that the Government have tabled the new clauses and the new schedule, following as they do the decision in Committee. The Committee was very good, interesting and genial, and there was much agreement in it. On the other hand, we give with one hand and we take away with another. I find that very worrying.

[Mr. Ashby]

As a deselected Member, who cannot expect to be in the next Parliament, I feel much freer to talk about political matters than others. I am conscious that we are talking about people who often own fairly expensive property and may well be expected to prop up a Conservative majority in a future Conservative Government. It struck me that not only would it be wrong for the Government not to agree in principle with my point, but they would shoot themselves in the foot if they did not. I want to put that warning across.

We are talking about abolishing the low-rent test. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will listen to me, as I hope to be constructive. The new clause goes only half way. It follows the wrong line of reasoning. Leases of 21 years and above have always been accepted—it is enshrined in principle and in law—as long leases, and that is all that we have to think about and maintain.

I am not one who would knock a landlord. Increasingly, through the policies of my right hon. Friend and the Government, the rented sector is expanding. It is a very buoyant sector, and I support it unreservedly. There is absolutely no reason why anybody should not establish that he wants to grant someone—if a nice family, whom he has known for a long time, wants to live in a property permanently—a long lease of 25 years at a rack rent. There is no reason why he should not do that for 30 or 40 years, or why he should not let it pass to the children at a rack rent.

One would have to find several things in such a lease, such as regular rent reviews, and one would expect the rack rent or the rent being paid to be slightly—not a long way—behind the market rent. The rent might be five or 10 years behind, according to rent reviews, which is to the advantage to the tenant of a long lease. There will undoubtedly also be such features in the long lease as provisions covering maintenance and alterations to property, allowing the tenant to make certain alterations. Many of those leases would cover derelict property, expecting the tenant to bring it up to standard before he starts paying rent. One finds such situations with a long lease, and we should be wholly supportive of them.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is trying to examine and to deal with the matter, but he is starting at the wrong end of it. He is putting 50 years on to the lease and turning the law upside down. That is absolutely the wrong way in which to go about it, and I beg him to consider the matter again.

The matter is complicated, but it is not beyond the wit of all the officials sitting in the Box over there to produce clauses that will describe precisely and exactly the type of tenancy that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wants to protect. He will know that that is a possibility, because a paragraph in new schedule 2 could introduce the provision that it would be a defence to an enfranchisement for a freeholder to allege that it is a tenancy not covered by the low-rent test but a proper tenancy at a market rent.

The freeholder would be able to give evidence of rents for property on either side of his property and for similar properties in the area. The same type of procedure would be adopted as that for the application for enfranchisement. He would be able to produce such evidence and show that it might not be quite the market rent, but it may be within 20 or 30 per cent. of it. He would be able to show that it is not a tenancy that falls within the type of tenancy to be franchised. That is the way in which to go about this matter.

What we are doing is talking percentages—possibly 90-plus percentages—on the basis that some landlords have been talking about tenancies that match what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has talked about, but, "No, we cannot produce any numbers." The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) referred to the Leasehold Enfranchisement Association. We cannot throw aside such people, as has been suggested, and say, "These people do not know what they are talking about." These people—such as lawyers—are knowledgeable about the property market.

I have never come across a tenancy such as that described by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I have no doubt that such tenancies could be created—anything can be created in a legal document—but they are not the norm. It is no good legislating for a handful of people when there will be so much inequity for the majority. As I said in my intervention, one must be equitable about this. We cannot treat one lot of people differently from another. One cannot say, "I am going to give it to you, but I am not going to give it to you."

People have written to me about the issue. Having, in Committee, voted on the matter with the Opposition, I have had many marvellous letters from people. It was heartening to receive such letters—only to find that those people's hopes will be dashed. I feel that we are letting people down—our own people and all sorts of people. I believe that we are absolutely wrong about this issue.

I am glad to hear that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is flexible about the 50-year issue, but I beg him to be more flexible—or I beg him to be inflexible. I beg him to examine what is a long lease, which is 21 years, and then to redefine the exclusions and say, "These long leases are not covered by this section." He is absolutely right that it would be totally inequitable if we were to allow enfranchisement in cases in which there is a landlord who is genuinely trying to help people and genuinely letting property at close to the rack rent. As I said, the rent will be close and will not be absolutely up to the market rent because, by its very nature, it will be a few years behind.

Let us protect leaseholders. Why not table new clauses to protect them? I beg my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State not to play around with the issue—because this is playing around. When one gives something with one hand and takes it away with another, one creates real enemies and a great deal of unhappiness. We found that to be true on a number of occasions. Legislation that comes into effect in two or three years' time gives time for opposition to mount. It would be wrong, and totally inequitable, to give with one hand and to take away with the other.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary has my agreement entirely on his reasoning, but I beg him to re-examine the issue. I ask him to go back to the standard that we all now accept: it is equitable, just and right that a 21-year lease is a long lease. We must maintain that period; we cannot take it away. There will be cases when there is a form of lease that should be protected from enfranchisement, and that is what we must protect. Let us get down to it and define that, because the schedule and new clauses do not.

Mr. Raynsford: I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby), who spoke movingly about the problems that will be created if the Government's new schedule is passed without amendment, and who also has done a great service to leaseholders by his brave decision to support in Committee our amendment to remove the low-rent test.

In speaking to this group of new clauses and new schedule, I should like in particular to explain why we have tabled the amendments (a) to (d) to new schedule 2, about which I should say two things immediately.

First, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am grateful to you and to Madam Speaker for allowing the starred amendments to be debated today. The Government gave us an undertaking that they would table their amendments to appear on last Thursday's Order Paper, to allow us time to prepare our amendments to them. That of course was necessary because of the amendments' immense complexity, as all hon. Members understand about leasehold amendments. Unfortunately, the Government—for reasons beyond the Minister's control—were not able to honour that undertaking. Therefore, the new schedule appeared too late for us to be able to table amendments to it that would be in order without being starred. I am grateful to the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration—who is not in the Chamber—for agreeing that we should approach Madam Speaker, asking that those amendments be taken today.

Secondly, I should explain to the House that, I am afraid, the gremlins have got at schedule new schedule 2. If hon. Members study it closely, they will discover that, in the numbers down the left-hand side, there is a gap of seven rather than five lines between numbers 10 and 15. Any assiduous hon. Member who is trying to follow where our amendments to the new schedule should fit in will, therefore, find himself in some difficulty if he follows the numbers as printed. I advise hon. Members to assume that the right line comes two before the number printed, from number 15 onwards. I hope that that will be helpful to hon. Members in understanding the technical details, although I shall explain in much more detail why, in our view, the amendments are essential.

5 pm

We are dealing with one of the crucial—indeed, one of the defining—issues that the House must resolve if leaseholding enfranchisement is to proceed as an effective policy for the benefit of the hundreds of thousands of leaseholders who long to own the freehold of their homes. In theory at least, there is political unanimity on the merits of the policy of enfranchisement. The then Labour Government introduced the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, which gave large numbers of leaseholders in houses the opportunity to buy the freehold and so, in many cases, to avoid the fear of homelessness on the expiry of their lease. The Act was unquestionably a great success.

The present Government introduced the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993, which aimed to give similar rights to leaseholders in flats to buy the freehold of their homes collectively. When he moved the enfranchisement provisions in Committee, the then Minister for Housing and Planning, who is now the Secretary of State for Transport, spoke of the inherent problems of the leasehold framework. I should like to quote his words because it is important that the House should be aware of the Government's policy, as stated in 1992. He said:

"there are two substantial disadvantages with leasehold tenure. First, a lease is a wasting asset. The value of the leaseholder's interest declines inexorably as the term expires. At times of rapidly rising house prices, such as the 1980s, that decline may have been offset by inflation, but in the longer term the value of a leasehold flat falls. That poses a particular problem for the majority of people who must buy their flats with a mortgage.

Leasehold as a form of tenure sits uneasily with today's financial regime for funding owner-occupation. Lenders normally insist that the unexpired term of a lease is at least double the length of the mortgage, so that there is adequate security throughout its term. However, that means that leasehold properties become increasingly difficult to mortgage—and hence to sell—once the lease becomes less than perhaps 60 years. So a 99-year lease, which might have cost the same as a freehold, may be tradeable for only 20 or 30 years before its value begins to fall quite sharply. There is a market for fag-end leases in central London among cash buyers, but that is not typical.

Secondly, control of the property remains with the freeholder. That is a particular problem with flats. Although those living in the flats will have effectively paid for the building and are responsible for all the costs of upkeep and insurance, they are in the hands of a freeholder who has only a small residual interest. Increasingly, freeholds and reversionary head leases are coming into the hands of speculators and people with short-term interests who seek to maximise returns. They do not have the long-term interests in the property and the tenants shown by the best of the remaining old-style paternalistic landlords. Those problems are at their worst where direct conflicts of interests occur between the freeholder on the one hand and the leaseholder on the other.—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 10 November 1992; c. 31-32.]

Having spelt out the inherent disadvantages, the Minister made it clear that the Government's policy was to move away from leasehold as a form of tenure.

In a subsequent sitting of the Committee, the Minister said emphatically:

"The Bill is carefully structured so that not everybody has the right to a new lease. Its purpose is to move away from leasehold as a form of tenure, and that is why its thrust is towards encouraging enfranchisement rather than leasehold extension."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 12 November 1992; c. 73.]

That was a clear commitment to leasehold enfranchisement. At that stage, it was expected that the Government would introduce a commonhold Bill to create the new tenure of commonhold, which would be similar to the Australian strata title system, under which people living in flats could own their home individually and the whole block collectively, thereby getting out of the landlord-tenant relationship which has proved a bugbear in much of the leasehold system.

Sadly, that Bill has not yet materialised, despite considerable pressure from many hon. Members on both sides of the House and the efforts of the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait), who introduced a private Member's Bill earlier this year with the objective of achieving commonhold. She had the misfortune of seeing it talked out on Second Reading by hon. Members on her own side of the House.

While there has been no progress on commonhold, the hopes for extensive enfranchisement which arose from the 1993 Act have generally been disappointed. The Secretary of State conceded in an earlier intervention that the number of people enfranchising was fewer than had been hoped for. Only a limited number of leaseholders in flats have to date successfully negotiated the process of enfranchisement and acquired the freehold of their home. That does not reflect a lack of interest on the part of leaseholders. On the contrary, to my knowledge, hundreds of thousands of leaseholders would love to buy the freehold of their home, but are frustrated by the many obstacles that stand in their way.

[Mr. Raynsford]

Some of the obstacles are financial and based around the valuation arrangements, the costs of pursuing an enfranchisement claim and other such matters. The hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire highlighted some of those problems in Committee. Some of the obstacles relate to the complex rules which govern who may and who may not qualify, of which the low-rent test is one. We shall deal with others later today.

The low-rent test is one of the most objectionable obstacles. It is, as I shall seek to demonstrate, unnecessary. It is arbitrary in its impact and it has caused serious injustices. That is why in Committee, we moved successfully, with the support of the hon. Members for North–West Leicestershire, for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) and for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock), amendments to abolish the low-rent test. Our success in that and other amendments has struck a vital blow for leaseholders. It is fundamental that that progress should not be undermined today, as it will be if Government new schedule 2 is passed unamended.

Let us examine in detail the low-rent test. In effect, there are three tests; it is not a single test. The first test covers leases initially granted before April 1963. The ground rent must be less than two thirds of the letting value for the leaseholder to qualify to enfranchise. The second test covers leases granted between April 1963 and April 1990. The ground rent must be less than two thirds of the rateable value. The third test covers leases granted since April 1990. In order to qualify, the ground rent must be less than £250 outside London and £1,000 a year in London.

I suspect that simply by describing the hugely complex arrangements, I have helped to advance my case for their abolition. The figures are arbitrary and their impact is capricious. They provide ample scope for reluctant landlords to frustrate the wishes of their leaseholders to buy the freehold. Let me give just one example, which I quoted in Committee. It involves a lady who wrote to me early this year in the following terms. She is a leaseholder living at 78 Cadogan place in London. Her name is Mrs. Loder Dyer. She said:

"I wrote to the Prime Minister in 1992 when his Government's Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Bill was being considered by Parliament. At that time leaseholders such as myself were assured that we would be able to buy our freeholds. This has proved well nigh impossible.

I acquired my long leasehold house on the Cadogan Estate in 1949. It was requisitioned during the war and was derelict. To restore, improve and maintain it over many years has been a great personal and financial sacrifice, particularly since my husband died.

The Cadogan Estate refused to renew my lease. Their solicitors wrote it 'would be the appropriate course for them to institute possession proceedings' against me at the end of the lease which would force me out of my only home. They know I have no statutory security of tenure because I'm disadvantaged by London's high rateable values.

As soon as the Leasehold Reform Bill became law in 1993, I had to exercise the only statutory right open to me by giving notice to my freeholders of my intention to acquire the freehold of my home. They would not admit my claim, obstructing me calculatingly on the sole point that my annual ground rent of £100 was not a low rent. They knew, in the case of leases granted between 1939 and 1963, I would have to prove that the ground rent is not more than two thirds of the letting value at the start of the lease. This has been the most tortuous and time consuming task for me and my experienced advisers.

I have been forced to go to the County Court on legal aid to establish the letting value. Despite having one of the acknowledged experts in such matters, the Judge completely failed to understand the complexities of how to ascertain the letting value of a lease granted over forty years ago. I now have no other recourse but to seek justice in the Court of Appeal. In a further attempt to obstruct me my freeholders are seeking to raise arguments not previously relied on by them.

The huge financial costs and the distressing personal effect upon me has severely impaired my health. My lease is a long lease at a low rent. It should fully qualify under the legislation. I am still no nearer achieving my vital legal right. I must earnestly seek your help that steps will be taken to remove this disastrous anomaly."

In case anyone should believe that that is just one hard case, let me also give the House—

Mr. Ashby: There are hundreds.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman is right, but let me give the House the benefit of one of the country's leading experts on the subject: chartered surveyor Mr. Marr-Johnson, partner in Marr-Johnson and Stevens, who wrote to me at the same time and whose evidence I also quoted to the Committee. He wrote as follows:

"I have no hesitation in saying that section 4(1) of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 is extremely difficult to interpret in any particular case. It affects only leases starting before April 1963, so the valuer is put to proof as to the letting value of a property more than 33 years ago. Frequently I find that the County Court has serious problems in understanding the valuation aspects of a case, and more often than not, the matter goes to appeal."

He then cited a series of cases and concluded:

"Although most of these mistakes were put right on appeal, many lessees fall by the wayside. I have just settled two cases where the claims were lodged 18 years ago in February 1978, and the lessees have lived under the threat of Court action and uncertainty throughout the interim . . . From time to time, I am instructed to advise on doubtful cases under section 4(1); only too frequently I am obliged to include words in my report such as 'I am certain that the rent at the start of the lease was indeed low within the meaning of the Act, but I am far from certain that I would be able to prove it in Court.' The section works in a capricious manner, and in my opinion it often does prevent proper claims under the Act from getting through the qualifying process."

The low-rent test, therefore, is complex, arbitrary and capricious in its impact. Its result is serious injustices, not to mention appalling costs to leaseholders who have to try to argue their case through a variety of different channels.

So why is that arcane provision there in the first place? The Secretary of State rightly and reasonably said that a Labour Government put it in the 1967 Act and asked why it was there. We contend that it is a product of history for which there may have been justification in 1967, but that it has continued long after there ceased to be any justification for its continuation. The purpose of the low-rent test and the justification offered by the Government for its retention is that it is designed to distinguish leases from tenancies. A lease is sold at a premium and, in consequence—so the argument goes—there is a low ground rent. By contrast, a tenancy is let without a premium at a correspondingly higher rental.

Twenty to 30 years ago, when all tenancies were subject to Rent Acts controls, some tenancies may have been granted—indeed created—by landlords on terms designed to evade those Acts' provisions. As such, those terms could, without a low-rent test, have been confused with a lease. We accept that, but times have changed. Most tenancies are now let on assured shorthold tenancies and no landlord is going to offer a tenancy for a period lasting more than 21 years when he can get a market rent by letting on an assured or assured shorthold tenancy—the latter requiring a term of no more than six months—so the situation in which the test was incorporated in 1967 no longer applies. If there ever was a case for the low-rent test, it has certainly passed. Remember that, to qualify, leaseholders must demonstrate that they have a lease lasting 21 years or more—that is the key distinction between a lease and a tenancy. That is properly recognised as the fundamental distinction.

5.15 pm

In case anyone still has any doubt on the issue, as my final piece of evidence on this point, let me call the Lord Chancellor's Department. In framing its proposals for the introduction of commonhold, which, as I have explained, was designed to provide an alternative tenure to leasehold, the Lord Chancellor's Department considered whether there was a need for a low-rent test. Its conclusion in 1990, when it published a consultation on commonhold, was that a low-rent test would not be appropriate and was not necessary. It was unambiguous about it. It found no need for a low-rent test to distinguish commonholds from tenancies, even though it envisaged people being able to convert to commonholds from leaseholds. The same logic applies to leaseholds. If the Lord Chancellor's Department six years ago said that there was no need for a low-rent test, surely the Department of the Environment can come to the same conclusion.

The low-rent test is a complex anachronism. It is not necessary, yet it causes serious problems and injustices, blocking the way to leasehold enfranchisement for all too many leaseholders, so why are the Government not supporting the Committee decision to abolish the low-rent test? It is simply because, as in 1987 and 1993, the Government are hamstrung: unfortunately, their supposed commitment to leasehold reform is countered by the pressure from the large landed interests, which remain utterly resistant to the concept of leasehold reform. Unfortunately, they continue to exercise far too great an influence on the Government's policies. Some people suspect that that is because the Government—or the governing party—are in too many respects financially dependent on some of those interests.

The resistance of those landed interests made the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, supposedly designed to safeguard leaseholders, unworkable. As we will discuss in subsequent debates, to our knowledge, no one has been able to benefit from the provisions of part II and part III of the 1987 Act, which are supposed to give protection to leaseholders against bad landlords, because the procedures are so complex and tortuous. There is so much scope for costs to mount against the leaseholder that leaseholders have not been able to make use of it. Landlords have found it an easy device to get around.

There was similar resistance on the part of the big landowners in 1993 as a result of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act, which was designed, as the Minister at the time, now Secretary of State for Transport, said, to give enfranchisement opportunities to 750,000 leaseholders. The vast majority have not been able to do so because, again, the big landowners nobbled the Government and, through a series of amendments, created legislation that is so riddled with anomalies and so full of loopholes that it is virtually impossible for all except the bravest and the most determined leaseholders to get through it.

If the Government push through their proposed new schedule 2, it will be one more surrender to the big landed interests, and will set up yet another obstacle to enfranchisement when, ostensibly, the low-rent test obstacle is being removed.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman said that parts II and III of the Landlord and Tenant Act had never been used. I do not think that he is right on that. I thought that I would ask when it was last used. I am sure that he will be pleased to know that, only last week, in the Wandsworth county court, a group of tenants was able to acquire compulsorily its freehold under part III. I do not see why he should be unhappy about its use. It is true that I want to make it rather easier to use, but it is used already.

Mr. Raynsford: I am delighted to hear that, but I said what I did because on two previous occasions—in 1992-93, when we were debating the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993, and again in Committee on the Bill now before us—I put it to Ministers that we had no evidence of cases successfully coming through under the 1987 Act, and they could not give me chapter and verse.

I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues could not provide the evidence, and I am delighted that he can provide it now. However, I am sure that he will accept that, none the less, the legislation has proved largely ineffective. If it is not ineffective, why does he propose to change the procedure, with a leasehold valuation taking the place of the court in relation to the transfer of management, which we shall discuss later?

Mr. Gummer: No one suggests that the 1987 Act is effective enough, but in this debate, in which it is easy to overstate certain matters, we must get the balance right. I thought that the hon. Gentleman strayed somewhat into the realms of fantasy when he talked about the relationship between myself, for example, and the great landed interests. I found what he said amusing, and enjoyed it, but it did not have much connection with reality or truth. I am merely suggesting that accuracy is important here.

Mr. Raynsford: I am happy to tell the Secretary of State that I entirely accept the need for accuracy. I have tried to be scrupulously accurate, and I immediately accepted his statement that there had been some use of the 1987 Act. However, I have explained that I had no knowledge of that use because his colleagues had not been able to provide me with chapter and verse.

Mr. Ashby: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Raynsford: May I finish my answer? Then I shall happily give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The 1987 Act promised a great deal and failed to deliver. So did the 1993 Act. When the Secretary of State tries to persuade the House that landed interests have no influence, will he explain the input of the British Property Federation to new schedule 2?

Mr. Ashby: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that, in response to my inquiries I, too, have found that the 1987

[Mr. Ashby]

Act has hardly been used at all? It is incredibly difficult to use, although I am delighted to hear that, in ornithological terms, one swallow has made the summer.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point.

At this stage, perhaps we should consider the two main effects of new schedule 2. First, it will exclude a limited number of properties in rural areas let as part of agricultural arrangements on terms involving long leases, but with no premium payable. As we have already established in earlier exchanges, the Country Landowners Association has made a case for the exemption of such properties. We understand that there are not many of them—perhaps 200 or 300 in the whole country. Nevertheless, the CLA's case for their exclusion is valid, and our amendments (a) to (d) would provide for the exclusion of such properties on the face of the Bill.

The second feature of new schedule 2, however, is very different, and creates an entirely new obstacle by establishing a 50-year qualifying period during which the low-rent test would still apply. Leases of 50 years or less will remain subject to the low-rent test. There is no justification for that arbitrary new test. The Secretary of State himself has conceded that 50 years is an entirely arbitrary limit. By contrast, 21 years is well established as the period that defines the distinction between a lease and a tenancy. I have yet to hear any convincing argument for adding a further test of whether the lease was for a period of 50 years or longer.

Indeed, the British Property Federation, whose representatives probably spent much time with the Secretary of State and his officials—

Mr. Gummer indicated dissent.

Mr. Raynsford: They certainly spent time trying to talk to me about the subject—and they could not provide any convincing justification for the period of 50 years.

We are considering a Government new schedule that would create an entirely new test that would significantly disadvantage individuals with leases shorter than 50 years. It would be capricious and arbitrary in its impact, just as the existing low-rent test has been. No justification has been advanced for it. The Secretary of State himself cannot produce figures to justify it. We do not know how many people may be affected. However, we do know that, if the new schedule is agreed, it will create criteria that will deny to many leaseholders the opportunity to enfranchise, and will provide yet another opportunity for freeholders to seek to frustrate leaseholders' hopes.

As evidence, I can do no better than refer to the case to which I alluded earlier—that of Mrs. Loder Dyer, who found herself blocked from enfranchisement by the low-rent test. The abolition of that test at last offered her the chance to buy her freehold, for which she had longed for many years. Imagine her horror when she discovered that new schedule 2 would dash her hopes yet again.

Mrs. Loder Dyer wrote to me on 26 April, and the House should know the terms in which she wrote:

"Dear Mr. Raynsford,

Re: Low Rent Test—Housing Bill

Mrs. Joan South of the Leasehold Enfranchisement Association telephoned me yesterday evening to notify me of the Government's intentions to amend the low rent test, namely to confine it to those with leases of 50 years or less. This is a catastrophe and it is quite unjustifiable.

I have a 45¾ year lease and therefore will again be discriminated against by this Government. There are many others in a similar position to me who stand to lose their homes as they have no statutory protection.

I attach for your convenience a copy of my original letter to you which you kindly read out to the Standing Committee"— that is the letter that I have already read to the House—

"I sincerely hope that there will be some means open to you to persuade sufficient Conservative and Opposition MPs to examine their consciences on this matter when a vote is taken."

That is precisely what we shall do. The Secretary of State said earlier that if even one person suffered an injustice, that would be wrong and unacceptable, and that we must not create such a situation. Yet he proposes to cause injustice to that woman and to many other people, on the basis of no evidence, no figures and no justification whatever, simply relying on a hunch that a 50-year test is somehow appropriate.

That move will merely create one more unreasonable, unjustified anomaly in legislation that has for too long been bugged by unreasonable anomalies and arbitrary distinctions of that nature, which have created injustices. Our amendment to the new schedule, while accepting the rural exemption—the change suggested by the Country Landowners Association—for which there is justification, would remove the arbitrary and unjustified 50-year test that the Government seek to introduce, which will discriminate so unfairly against people such as Mrs. Loder Dyer.

Mrs. Loder Dyer is not alone. The Leasehold Enfranchisement Association tells me that there are many others. The hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire, too, knows that. As a result of his brave vote in favour of leasehold enfranchisement earlier this month, he has had a big mailbag. Many leaseholders would suffer a serious injustice if the Government did not accept our amendments (a) to (d) to new schedule 2, and I therefore hope that the House will stand up for their interests, rather than leaving them to be betrayed again.

By voting for our amendments, the House can demonstrate that it is determined to bring justice at last to all the leaseholders whose hopes have been so cruelly disappointed in the past. If Conservative Members, knowing as they do that what we are advocating is right, none the less decide to support the Government in the Lobby, they will demonstrate in the clearest possible way that they are prepared to subordinate the interests of their leaseholder constituents and the interests of justice to the short-term interests of political expediency, and to pressure from the party Whips.

That would be wrong, and if Conservative Members do it, we shall have no hesitation in ensuring that leaseholders, of whom there are many throughout the country, are well aware of the fact that tonight they voted to deny leaseholders the justice that they deserve. I hope that that will not happen. I hope that Conservative Members who know the justice of our argument will join us in saying to the Government that leasehold reform must go through.

We cannot go on with shabby compromises that create more obstacles and problems, and that ultimately deny the object that all of us say that in principle we support—leasehold enfranchisement. If that is to become a reality, we have to sweep away the anomalies and loopholes that provide easy opportunities for the enemies of enfranchisement to block the way of leaseholders. Our amendments are just; the issue is simple.

Mr. Ashby: Would not the right way to deal with this be for the Government to accept the amendments and, in another place, add a clause that clearly defines the sort of tenancies that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been talking about?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman, perfectly reasonably, seeks a compromise. I put it to him that the right compromise, which we have adopted, is to move the amendment to new schedule 2. Where there is a genuine reason, such as the rural tenancies, for an exemption, we are prepared to accept it, but something that is based on conjecture and speculation, such as the arbitrary figure of 50 years—which he knows is unjustified—cannot remain in the Bill.

We would be irresponsible to allow the Bill to proceed when it contains measures that we know in our hearts to be wrong. Our amendments are right. They are a compromise and accept the need for justifiable safeguards. I sincerely hope that all hon. Members who are aware of the significance and importance of the issue will, in Mrs. Loder Dyer's words, examine their conscience when they vote. I hope that they will vote with us in favour of amendments (a) to (d).

5.30 pm

Mrs. Maddock: It must be clear to the Secretary of State that there is cross-party support for dealing with leasehold enfranchisement, which was not properly tackled in 1993. In Committee, there was all-party support for the view that we had to get it right this time.

The problems have been around for several years. We have been incredibly well briefed by those who want real change and to get it right. The hon. Members for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) and for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby), and the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), brought their expertise to bear in Committee. I asked the Minister to take account of all the lobbying and discussions that had taken place, and, if he could not accept our amendments then, to try to settle the matter once and for all and to get it right on Report.

Many people have suffered greatly in trying to deal with what can only be described in many cases as a legislative nightmare. In Committee, I pleaded with the Minister to turn those nightmares into sweeter dreams. I am disappointed that today we have nightmares only slightly less worse than those that we had before. The Government amendments and new clauses are not in line with the will of the Committee, which had all-party support. They attempt to reverse the vote in Committee.

Mr. Gummer: Does the hon. Lady agree that to say that a nightmare is only slightly less worse when our proposals apply to well over 90 per cent. of cases is to overdo the perfectly reasonable case that she is putting forward?

Mrs. Maddock: I still believe, having been advised by others with experience in the matter, that there will continue to be many nightmares. That is shown by many of the eloquent examples that have been given today. We have all had letters from people whose nightmares will continue if the Government's proposals are passed.

The Government have made two attempts to get this right. First, in Committee, we had to wait for their proposals, and had little time to discuss them. On the second attempt, the Opposition had to plead with Madam Speaker to ensure that we got amendments tabled for today. This is the third attempt. The Secretary of State said that, when it goes to another place, there will be other attempts to change the Bill and get it right.

There is plenty of evidence from individual groups caught up in the problems of leasehold enfranchisement to allow Government to get the legislation right. The Secretary of State has had helpful suggestions from many hon. Members today. I cannot understand why it is so difficult to get it right. It simply requires the political will.

The plea of the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire summarised the Committee's cross-party view that we should keep the 21-year period. By all means let him come back with exclusions, but can the Secretary of State please propose better exclusions and get it right? There is plenty of evidence to allow him to. He has a Department to deal with it. I hope that he will listen carefully today. We may be successful in the Lobby. I cannot emphasise enough the cross-party support outside the House for getting it right, keeping the 21 years and ending the nightmare that people will still suffer in dealing with such matters.

Mr. Carrington: I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this debate. As I was not on the Committee, I have sometimes felt that I have been listening to a quarrel that has been going on for some time, which has continued into Report.

It has been a long battle to get leasehold reform. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the huge advances that he has made in the Bill. I greatly welcome the changes in new clause 21 and new schedule 2. They will go a long way to remedying the problems that face people in trying to get enfranchisement under their existing leasehold. There are still problems, but they involve less the legalities of what constitutes a long lease than what in reality is a long lease and what was recognised as a long lease by the parties when they entered into it. We must get equity between the rights of the leaseholder and the genuine rights of the freeholder.

I have long campaigned for the rights for leaseholders and for their right to be enfranchised, because I well know from experience in my constituency and across London of the great problems that have been caused to leaseholders by the evil practices of a few freeholders. However, they are a small number. It is only right that legislation, which by its nature is retrospective, to allow enfranchisement should recognise that freeholders have certain rights.

It has been suggested that the low-rent test should be abolished, and an amendment to that effect was passed in Committee. That would mean that any lease longer than 21 years would qualify for enfranchisement. We must consider whether, in practice, leaseholders and freeholders signed leases 21 or more years ago with the intention that they were long leases, or whether they recognised that the arrangement between them would come to an end in the fulness of time. There is no question but that, when parties entered into a 99-year lease, it was a surrogate for selling the freehold. However, when it comes down to 21 years, the question is much more clouded.

[Mr. Carrington]

Fifty years may well be a reasonable compromise. It certainly encompasses most of the abuses. It does not encompass them all, but most of the problems arise with leaseholds created in the late 1950s, the 1960s and the 1970s. They were created in London, when the big mansion blocks were converted from rented to leasehold properties, and in the mass of conversions of terraced property in the 1960s and 1970s. Those are the areas in which there have been the most abuses.

For the most part, those problems will be remedied by the 50-year rule. As I made clear in an intervention, I have doubts about whether 50 years is precisely the right term. I have little doubt that 21 years is probably too short. The balance probably lies somewhere between. Perhaps, as I suggested in my intervention, 45 years would deal with more problems than 50.

The hon. Member for Greenwich—an old sparring partner of mine from years ago—mentioned a case of great injustice faced by a lady who had written to him. Her lease was 45¼ years, so she would benefit if there was a small tinkering of the 50 years down to 45. I have no particular brief for 45 years, and have not done any studies to find out whether that is the right period—it might well be 40 years. I do know, however, that we have to find the right balance.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to look hard to ensure that we get a period that benefits the maximum number of people with the minimum injustice to freeholders, who entered into perfectly reasonable transactions all those years ago in the belief that they would be protected by the law, and that it would not be changed retrospectively.

Examples are important in this context. In London after the war, as many of the properties had been large family houses and were suffering severe neglect and in a poor state of repair, it was not uncommon—I know this from experience, as my parents were looking for a business property in Belgravia and the west end after the war—for landlords to grant leases of about 30 years, on the understanding that the leaseholder would repair and restore the property. Although I do not know the exact addresses, as I was a little boy at the time, I suspect that the landlord was Grosvenor estates.

Those were historic properties, even in those times, and they had to be restored to a condition in which they could survive as buildings and would not need to be knocked down. That meant dealing with dry rot, installing damp-proof courses, putting on new roofs and restoring the fine architectural features at a substantial cost. Consequently, the early years of the lease were charged at modest levels, with the later years being more of a rent. The intention was effectively for a rented period of up to about 30 years, after which the property would revert to Grosvenor estates.

It would be wrong to consider leaseholders who engaged in such arrangements as necessarily entitled to enfranchisement. There were benefits on both sides, and both parties entered into the arrangements understanding exactly what they were doing.

Similar arrangements are still entered into with historic properties. I understand that the National Trust enters into similar arrangements today. It would be wrong if such leaseholders were entitled to be enfranchised in the way that is being discussed.

There is a balance to be drawn. I believe that we are nearly there. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has ensured that we are close to remedying most abuses of the leasehold system. It has been a long battle—it was started by the predecessor of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn), Sir Brandon Rhys Williams, who sadly died before it could be incorporated into legislation. The battle has been carried forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and my right hon. Friends the Members for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) and for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott). Some of us have been battling hard for the rights of leaseholders.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has gone nearly the whole way towards providing for leaseholders the remedies they need. However, I urge him to reconsider the 50-year period to find out whether it could be fine-tuned. I also urge him to consider, in time, the introduction of commonhold, which would put the icing on the cake for leaseholders and would enable us to move forward to a form of tenure in urban property that would set us right for the next 100 or 200 years in London.

5.45 pm

Ms Glenda Jackson: I shall speak briefly. Unlike the Secretary of State, who was so outraged at what he clearly saw as my audacity in intervening on him when I had not been present to hear the first words that emanated from his lips, I have heard before the arguments that I am hearing this afternoon. I had the privilege to serve on the Standing Committee of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993, as well as that on this Bill.

I found the contribution of the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) fascinating. He presented a personal story, and charitably told the House that he believed that the arrangement that he had described was equal on both sides. I do not accept his interpretation. I read it as informing my view, that the maintenance of the great estates in London was almost entirely dependent on the willingness of those leaseholders to take on the sort of lease to which he referred, and to furnish out of their own pockets the enormous restorations to which he referred in his example. Indeed, they have had the responsibility for maintaining those great estates ever since, by virtue of the financial contribution to maintenance and repair ordained for them by their freeholder.

The introduction of the 50-year period does absolutely nothing to rectify the overwhelming injustice that so many leaseholders have lived under, and will continue to live under, if the House does not vote for the Opposition amendments. The argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) and that furnished by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby) have clarified the situation. The introduction of a different number of years will do absolutely nothing to advance the cause of leasehold enfranchisement. I do not think it an exaggeration to say that it will leave thousands of people in the same uneasy situation in which they find themselves today.

We have heard much talk of equity, land, landowners and freeholders. One of the elements that has been missing from the debate is that we are talking not simply about bricks and mortar, but about people's homes—often family homes in which there has been not only a financial requirement to maintain the fabric, at the behest of the owner of the freehold, but an emotional commitment.

As those of us who are privileged to have families know, their entirely individual histories are enshrined—I hesitated to use the word "enshrined", as it is too extreme and possibly sentimental, and I would hate to be either—within the confines of the home. The growth and development of the family and the emotional commitment and sense of continuity, to which the Secretary of State referred, are intrinsic, not only in the people involved but in the physical environment in which they live, raise their children and see them grow and develop their own families.

As I said in my intervention on the Secretary of State, it is a gross injustice that leaseholders are not allowed to pass property on to their families. I repeat: the Prime Minister has said that one of the central planks of Conservative party policy is that people can pass on what they own to their own—but they do not have a sense of what they have physically and economically maintained as genuinely their own.

The amendment moved by the Secretary of State will do absolutely nothing to remove the sense of temporary engagement, no matter how long it may be perceived that people will live in the home. The introduction of 50 years underlines what I believe to be gross inequity—that, in certain situations, leaseholders have absolutely no right to regard their home as their home.

I urge Government Members to vote for the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. As more than one hon. Member has said this afternoon, the low rent amendment received all-party support in Committee, and it was agreed. It would be quite wrong for the House to ignore that debate.

Many thousands of people, in London and around the country, are looking to the House today to relieve them of the anxiety and the burden of not knowing whether they can claim their home for their own. They are not trying to steal it—often, the properties would not be standing were it not for the financial and emotional commitment of the leaseholders—they simply wish to have the security that surely they have worked for and that they have committed themselves to. They want to know that their home is their home.

This is the second time that this issue has been debated in a short time, not only on the Floor of the House but in Committee. The issue has been meticulously examined, and the arguments, in the main, have been serious. Hon. Members should not allow the Government's newly tabled—and supposedly newly considered—amendments to be part of the Bill, as they would betray many thousands of leaseholders who have genuinely looked to us to speak for them. As we have been given a second opportunity to right a wrong, we should do so tonight.

Mr. Brooke: I spoke to the Bill in Committee, and I will not repeat what I said on that occasion—save to say that I recognised that, historically, there had been advantages in the leasehold principle, and that it had greatly benefited the aesthetic charms of central London and of other towns and cities that grew rapidly in the 18th century.

I acknowledged that, in the last decade of the 20th century, the principle of leasehold utility might have been diminished. I suggested that the opportunity of patient unravelling in the Bill should not be missed. I acknowledged the rights of freeholders and of landlords—I emphasise, particularly good freeholders and landlords—as well as the rights of leaseholders. The patient unravelling that I was envisaging was to take both sets of interests into account.

I said that I would support the Government in Committee—but I thought that the amendments owed more to impatient unravelling than to patient unravelling. I said that I hoped that the issues would be reconsidered by Her Majesty's Government in the interim between Committee and Report. The hon. Members for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) and for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) interpreted that as a part of all-party support—and I do not resile from the language that they have used. I need to be fair to the Government—they have reconsidered matters, and I am prepared to give them the benefit of the doubt.

The hon. Member for Greenwich concentrated his attack on the 50-year provision. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that there was nothing sacred about 50 years, which is his current best estimate. That is flexibility and good will enough for me. It would be churlish of me to throw back the Government's concessions when they have reconsidered the issue quite significantly between Committee and Report, as I asked them to do.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), I had the privilege of serving on the Committee considering the Bill, and of listening to the considerable and intricate arguments on the amendments that were eventually carried. As she said, there was all-party support in Committee. The Labour party supported the amendments that the Government are now seeking further to amend by their new clause.

There was support from the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby)—to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) has already referred—and he was very brave to make a stand, as a matter of principle, in defence of the rights of many leaseholders who have been substantially disfranchised for many years. He made a stand to ensure that the Bill contained clauses that would give leaseholders the rights they had sought and battled for over the years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich has referred to the work of Joan South and others struggling to ensure the enfranchisement of leaseholders and to give them their proper rights. Members of the Labour party, Liberal Democrats and Ulster Unionists supported the proposals we brought forward—in fact, many arguments were mounted in favour of our proposals.

The thing that influenced and convinced me most of all—it has been raised again today in our discussions about the Government's new proposals—was the fact that this matter has been before the House on so many occasions. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate said that, only three years ago, she served on the Committee that looked at exactly the same issue. On that occasion, the Labour party warned the Government that what they were doing was not satisfactory, that it would not give real and proper rights to leaseholders, and that it would not result in leaseholders being able to purchase the freehold of their property.

[Mr. Clive Betts]

In 1993, the Government were warned—as they have been on previous occasions—that they were passing words in legislation that would not give the people in question the rights they desired, words that would not change the fundamental relationship between leaseholders and their freeholders, and words that would not enable leaseholders to buy the freeholds that they desired. When we came to discuss these issues in Committee, it was all too apparent that the Government had not learnt the lessons.

I am most disappointed that, when we had had that debate in Committee, and had had amendments carried which would for the first time give real rights, exercisable rights, to the people fighting this campaign over many years, such as Joan South, the Government were not able to accept them but have come forward with another form of words.

I was not convinced by what the Secretary of State said. When my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich challenged him to show how anyone had benefited from the exercise of the previous legislation, only one case was presented. As the hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire said, it is a bit like one swallow making a summer, and does not prove the Government's case.

I listened with interest to what the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) said about the 50-year rule. He said that he saw no argument why the 50-year rule was necessarily applicable. A 45-year rule, a 40-year rule or a 35-year rule might equally be introduced. It is possible to argue in favour of any number of years, but those arguments would be based on hunches—on Ministers feeling that it might be the right thing to do.

The Secretary of State has made no convincing case that any research has been done, or empirical evidence collected, to show that 50 years is the right period. I still have not heard from the Secretary of State, or any Conservative Member, any evidence to show that 50 years is the right period. We are asked to vote for a Government new clause that provides for a low-rent test based on 50 years; on what evidence are we asked to do so?

6 pm

The House has been asked to overturn the Committee's decision—to overturn an amendment that would have tackled a low-rent test that has effectively prevented leaseholders from exercising their right to enfranchisement for several successive periods of years, following each successive process of legislation. Leaseholders have not been allowed to exercise their rights; they have been frustrated by the wording of successive pieces of legislation. All we have from the Government is yet another form of words, surrounding a 50-year rule, and no Conservative Member has given us any evidence that that 50-year rule is right, fair and reasonable.

Perhaps the Secretary of State will tell us why 50 years is the right period. Why does not he accept that 45 years, or 40 years, is right?

Perhaps the Secretary of State will also write to Mrs. Loder Dyer, and explain how the new clause will enfranchise her, and justify that. I know that it is not always possible to devise legislation on the basis of one case, but in this case it surely illustrates a matter of principle—the matter of principle, the just cause, for which that lady has fought for many years. That just cause was not supported by previous legislation, because the wording was lax and offered a freeholder enough loopholes and possibilities to take her, as she explained, through one court process after another—processes that she could not afford.

The lady finally believed that she would receive her entitlements as a result of the amendments that we passed in Committee, but now, because she has a lease of slightly more than 45 years, the 50-year rule will once again exclude her. What will the Secretary of State say to her? He must convince people like her on grounds of fairness and reasonableness if new clause 21 is to be worthy of being passed by the House tonight.

Mr. Gummer: We have had a useful discussion on this subject.

My hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby) suggested that there might be a different way of introducing the equity that he was kind enough to suggest was present in the amendment. I have considered the possibility of tying this in the way that he suggests, but I am happy to reconsider it to discover whether there is a way of using his suggestion. I should not like to over-emphasise the possibilities, because I genuinely have considered the issue carefully, but I am prepared at least to talk to him about these things to discover whether I can do anything.

I think I can honourably say that, because I put the measure into the Bill. I did so because I was Minister responsible for London and because, for many years, I had the considerable experience of listening to, among others, my old friend—now sadly dead—Sir Brandon Rhys Williams, who led this battle. He has been supported latterly by his successor, my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn), and by my right hon. Friends the Members for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) and for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington). That important group of people has pressed that argument upon me, and that is why the measure is in the Bill in the first place.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire should feel that I have been as flexible as possible, and I am surprised that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) attacks me for being flexible. It is very odd. I am afraid that her party is like that; it always wants it every way. She admitted that two sets of legislation have not got it quite right, but evidently believes that I can now get it absolutely right with a snap of my fingers. The hon. Lady might have phrased that more graciously.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) was a little unhappy in his attitude to freeholders, as I have tried to achieve a balance, and will continue to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham made that point carefully, and I was surprised that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) did not recognise what he recognised from experience—that there is something to be said on both sides.

The work that my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham and his colleagues have done was much more graceful, much more concerned with equity, and much more equal than the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate was in the rather sad way in which she expressed her view. I found her remark about temporary engagement in housing odd from someone who has opposed, at every step, the ability of council tenants to buy their own homes. She appears to have a very odd inconsistency of opinion.

Ms Glenda Jackson: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Gummer: No, I will not give way on this occasion. I have given way to the hon. Lady several times.

I was impressed by the comments by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts), but he repeated what others had said.

I believe that we have achieved a balance. I promise to consider exactly where the line should be drawn, and the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire. I hope that the House will feel that I have been as flexible as possible. I again pay tribute to those of my hon. Friends who pushed this in the first place.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 289, Noes 287.

Division No. 114] [18.05 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Aitken, Rt Hon Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkins, Rt Hon Robert
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Rt Hon Kenneth (Mole V)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Bates, Michael
Batiste, Spencer
Bendall, Vivian
Beresford, Sir Paul
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Sir Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Sir Rhodes
Brandreth, Gyles
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Sir Graham
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Brown, M (Brigg & Cl'thorpes)
Browning, Mrs Angela
Budgen, Nicholas
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Peter
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Sir Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sir Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Ru'cliff)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Coe, Sebastian
Congdon, David
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'ire)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dicks, Terry
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Sir Anthony
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Rt Hon Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Fox, Rt Hon Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Freeman, Rt Hon Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Sir Peter
Gale, Roger
Gallie, Phil
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, Sir John
Grant, Sir A (SW Cambs)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Grylls, Sir Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archibald
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Rt Hon Jeremy
Hannam, Sir John
Hargreaves, Andrew
Haselhurst, Sir Alan
Hawkins, Nick
Hawksley, Warren
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hendry, Charles
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Horam, John
Hordern, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howell, Sir Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (W Hertfdshr)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, Sir David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Legg, Barry
Leigh, Edward
Lennox-Boyd, Sir Mark
Lester, Sir James (Broxtowe)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
McNair-Wilson, Sir Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mans, Keith
Marland, Paul
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Dr Brian
Mayhew, Rt Hon Sir Patrick
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Moate, Sir Roger
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moss, Malcolm
Needham, Rt Hon Richard
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Patnick, Sir Irvine
Patten, Rt Hon John
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Pickles, Eric
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Rt Hon Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Rathbone, Tim
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Riddick, Graham
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Ryder, Rt Hon Richard
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Sir Timothy
Scott, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Sir Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Nicholas
Speed, Sir Keith
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Sir Michael (S Worcs)

Spink, Dr Robert
Spring, Richard
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stephen, Michael
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan
Streeter, Gary
Sweeney, Walter
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (N Tayside)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'fld)
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Simon Burns and
Mr. Derek Conway.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Mrs Irene
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Ms Janet (Ros'dale)
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Austin-Walker, John
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Margaret
Beggs, Roy
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Berningham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blair, Rt Hon Tony
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Boyes, Roland
Bradley, Keith
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (Dunfermline E)
Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burden, Richard
Byers, Stephen
Cabom, Richard
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cann, Jamie
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John
Dafis, Cynog
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Chris (L'Boro & S'worth)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge H'l)
Denham, John
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Dowd, Jim
Dunnachie, Jimmy
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Etherington, Bill
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Ewing, Mrs Margaret
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fisher, Mark
Forsythe, Clifford (S Antrim)
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foulkes, George
Fraser, John
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Garrett, John
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godsiff, Roger
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike
Hanson, David
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harvey, Nick
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Henderson, Doug
Hendron, Dr Joe
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Hoon, Geoffrey
Howarth, Alan (Strat'rd-on-A)
Howarth, George (Knowsley North)
Howells, Dr Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hume, John
Hutton, John
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, Adam
Jackson, Glenda (H'stead)
Jackson, Helen (Shef'ld, H)
Jamieson, David
Janner, Greville
Jenkins, Brian (SE Staff)
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Jowell, Tessa
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Kennedy, Jane (L'pool Br'dg'n)
Khabra, Piara S
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kirkwood, Archy
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Liddell, Mrs Helen
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loyden, Eddie
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAllion, John
McAvoy, Thomas
McCartney, Ian
McCartney, Robert
McCrea, The Reverend William
McFall, John
McGrady, Eddie
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Robert
McMaster, Gordon
MacShane, Denis
Maddock, Diana
Maginnis, Ken
Mahon, Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Martin, Michael J (Springburn)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll & Bute)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Mike (N W'kshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
Paisley, The Reverend Ian
Parry, Robert
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Powell, Ray (Ogmore)
Prentice, Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Raynsford, Nick
Reid, Dr John
Rendel, David
Robertson, George (Hamilton)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Roche, Mrs Barbara
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Ross, William (E Londonderry)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Salmond, Alex
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)

Smith, Chris (Isl'ton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smyth, The Reverend Martin
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Rachel (Dunfermline W)
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Steinberg, Gerry
Strang, Dr. Gavin
Straw, Jack
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Rt Hon John D (Strgfd)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Thurnham, Peter
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Walker, A Cecil (Belfast N)
Wallace, James
Walley, Joan
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert N
Watson, Mike
Welsh, Andrew
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Sw'n W)
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Wilson, Brian
Wise, Audrey
Worthington, Tony
Wray, Jimmy
Wright, Dr Tony
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Eric Clarke and
Mr. Greg Pope

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Mr. Henry McLeish (Fife, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Tonight, the Government have been defeated in Committee in yet another attempt to increase prescription charges. Surely that decision must be respected. It must be wrong for Ministers to ride roughshod over the clear decision of a statutory Committee of the House. Is it in order for me to ask you to protect the House and the public against the actions of Ministers?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): My job in the Chair is to ensure the safe passage of the Housing Bill, as amended. For the moment, that is my sole concern.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it a new point of order?

Mr. Bayley: It is on the same matter, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have ruled on that, so we shall move on.

New clause 15

APPOINTMENT OF MANAGER: TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION TO LEASEHOLD VALUATION TRIBUNAL

.—(1) Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 (appointment of managers by the court) is amended as follows for the purpose of transferring to a leasehold valuation tribunal the jurisdiction of the court under that Part.

(2) In the following contexts for "the court", in the first (or only) place where it occurs, substitute "a leasehold valuation tribunal": section 21(1), section 22(2)(b), section 22(3), section 23(1), section 24(1), (2), (9) and (10); and in every other context, except section 21(6), for "the court" substitute "the tribunal".

(3) In section 21(6) (exclusion of application under inherent jurisdiction of court) for "any jurisdiction existing apart from this Act" substitute "any jurisdiction".

(4) In section 23(2) for "Rules of court" substitute "Procedure regulations".

(5) After section 24 insert—

"Jurisdiction of leasehold valuation tribunal

24A.—(1) The jurisdiction conferred by this Part on a leasehold valuation tribunal is exercisable by a rent assessment committee constituted in accordance with Schedule 10 to the Rent Act 1977 which when so constituted for the purposes of exercising any such jurisdiction shall be known as a leasehold valuation tribunal.

(2) The power to make regulations under section 74(1)(b) of the Rent Act 1977 (procedure of rent assessment committees) extends to prescribing the procedure to be followed in connection with any proceedings before a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part.

Such regulations are referred to in this Part as "procedure regulations".

(3) Any order made by a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part may, with the leave of the court, be enforced in the same way as an order of the county court.

(4) No costs incurred by a party in connection with proceedings under this Part before a leasehold valuation tribunal shall be recoverable by order of any court.

(5) Paragraphs 2, 3 and 7 of Schedule 22 to the Housing Act 1980 (supplementary provisions relating to leasehold valuation tribunals: appeals and provision of information) apply to a leasehold valuation tribunal constituted for the purposes of this section.

(6) On an appeal to the Lands Tribunal from a decision of a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part—

(a) the Lands Tribunal may exercise any power available to the leasehold valuation tribunal in relation to the original matter, and

(b) an order of the Lands Tribunal may be enforced in the same way as an order of the leasehold valuation tribunal.

Leasehold valuation tribunal: applications and fees

24B.—(1) The Secretary of State may make provision by order as to the form of, or the particulars to be contained in, an application made to a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part.

(2) The Secretary of State may make provision by order—

(a) requiring the payment of fees in respect of any such application, or in respect of any proceedings before, a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part; and

(b) empowering a leasehold valuation tribunal to require a party to proceedings before it to reimburse any other party the amount of any fees paid by him.

(3) The fees payable shall be such as may be specified in or determined in accordance with the order; and the order shall be framed with a view to securing that taking one year with another the amount of the fees charged is sufficient to meet the reasonable cost of providing the service to which they relate.

(4) An order under this section may make different provision for different cases or classes of case or for different areas.

(5) An order may, in particular, provide for the reduction or waiver of fees by reference to the financial resources of the party by whom they are to be paid or met.

Any such order may apply, subject to such modifications as may be specified in the order, any other statutory means–testing regime as it has effect from time to time.

(6) An order under this section shall be made by statutory instrument which, unless the order contains only such provision as is mentioned in subsection (1), shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.".

(6) In section 52 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 (jurisdiction of county courts), in subsection (2)(a) for "Parts I to IV" substitute "Parts I, III and IV".—[Mr. Gummer.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new clause 16—Period after which acquisition order may be made.

Government new clause 17—Text of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, as amended.

Government amendments Nos. 92, 93, 140 and 141.

Government new schedule 1—Text of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, as amended.

Mr. Gummer: Earlier, we discussed matters of equity. I suggested that the Bill included these provisions because, as Minister responsible for London, I recognised the continuing problems involved in leasehold enfranchisement. The management of a block of leasehold flats is a particularly important issue. It was put to us that leaseholders should have a right to manage, irrespective of the actions of the freeholder—in other words, that we should ignore whether a freeholder was good, bad or indifferent, and say that in all circumstances leaseholders should be able to manage the property.

We propose to remove clause 81 from the Bill. It gives leaseholders in a block of flats the right to take over responsibility for its management, irrespective of whether the freeholder is doing a good job. We consider that removal to be the correct procedure, because the clause suggests that a right that the freeholder clearly has should be removed without compensation, even if he is an excellent manager. I find that difficult to accept in terms of equity. I say that as someone who has been extremely angry about the activities of so-called freeholders—people who have bought up freeholds for speculative purposes.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) made some pretty unpleasant comments about freeholders generally. To refer to all freeholders in that way removes the force of what I would say about those who do behave badly: they behave in a way that is wholly intolerable and damages the lives of their leaseholders. I have my proposals for change precisely because I find the action of those people unacceptable and current legislation does not provide proper protection.

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am not aware of ever having condemned all freeholders. Perhaps the Secretary of State could point out where I have made such allegations. I was certainly somewhat vehement in Committee in urging hon. Members not to believe that a freeholder who has a seemingly sound name is automatically a good freeholder or property manager.

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry if the hon. Lady feels that I have misjudged her. Certainly the tenor of her remarks in the previous debate did not allow the House to hear any exceptions when she suggested that all leaseholders had contributed more to the development, protection and maintenance of their properties than freeholders. I am afraid that that is not true. Many freeholders play a perfectly proper part in those arrangements.

I want to ensure that both sides are properly protected and that their rights are properly upheld. I do so having introduced measures to protect leaseholders who were not properly protected because I believed that they needed additional protection.

The difficulty with removing the rights of freeholders without compensation is that we would be removing something of value. Whether we like it or not, it is a fact that the price the landlord pays for property reflects the income available from management—not from exploitation, but from management—and genuine commercial business that would stand scrutiny about its fairness. The House must therefore think seriously before it removes the rights of people even when they have behaved wholly genuinely and absolutely properly.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Secretary of State give way?

6.30 pm

Mr. Gummer: In a second.

The House has to take that into account because the House is here—in part, at least, and perhaps some would say overall—to protect the rights of all. It is also true that the policy of an unqualified right to take over management would give a landlord the possibility of mounting a challenge to the legislation before the European Court of Human Rights, which allows deprivation of rights only if that can be justified in the public interest and when a fair compensation is paid.

The problem that arises is whether it is reasonable to remove the rights of a good freeholder—somebody who is doing the job properly—or whether we should look for a way to remove those rights when the job is not properly done.

Mr. Ashby: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gummer: I promised to give way to the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford), so I will give way to him first and then I will be happy to give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State has spoken at great length about the potential damage that would be done by removing freeholders' rights altogether. Will he recognise that the arrangement by which the right to manage would be exercised—we successfully included this in Committee and the measure now appears in the Bill—would involve the creation of a management company on which the freeholder would be guaranteed representation? That is a specific safeguard for the freeholders' interests.

Mr. Gummer: The best opinion I have had is that what is proposed would certainly give the opportunity to mount a challenge. As it stands, the Bill does not cover the rights that people have, and I wish to achieve equity. Therefore, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I am suggesting an alternative route that will meet the need.

Mr. Ashby: I know that my right hon. Friend will say that he has had the best possible advice, but I wonder whether that advice was the best possible, for the following reason: the freeholders do not have the right to income from the management of the lease of the freehold. Up and down the country, the Lands Tribunal has upheld the fact that the landlord has no rights to income from the management of the company. The advice must be wrong. I can refer my right hon. Friend to many cases and I have copies of detailed judgments in which a marriage value has been ascertained from the freehold. In every single case, the Lands Tribunal has said that the manager—that is, the freeholder, owner and landlord—has no property or financial rights that can be included in the marriage value. Will my right hon. Friend please reconsider the advice that he has been given?

Mr. Gummer: I do not wish to use my lawyers' arguments against my hon. Friend, but the advice of the best lawyers is that there are other aspects that could have intrinsic value and that would open up the possibility of challenge. I am not basing my argument on that; I am merely saying that very good authority believes that.

Mr. Ashby: I do not agree.

Mr. Gummer: I spend a lot of my time disagreeing with legal advice and I fight my argument through. I have argued this point and I have been convinced by that legal advice. I would like my hon. Friend to listen to the fundamental principle. It is very difficult to say to people who have carried out their duties wholly properly and without any fault whatever that, although they entered a lease on the basis that they were going to manage, other people have a right to take the lease away, irrespective of how they have behaved. I do not think that many people would view that as equitable.

Mr. Ashby: My right hon. Friend is wrong.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend can say that, but I do not think that I am wrong to say—even if his legal view is different from mine—that it would not be thought right in common fairness to take away people's rights when they have done nothing wrong and when, sometimes, they have done more than anyone might have expected. It is not possible for it to be fair in equity to do that. I looked for a way to overcome that problem.

Frankly, I was elected to the House to try to protect the interests of all, not of any one section. I also recognise that in this case there is a considerable difficulty with people getting the right to manage under the present legislation. The hon. Member for Greenwich and I had a joke between us about how many might have managed it or not. He is right: far too few do. I want to make it as easy as possible.

Mr. Raynsford: May I advise the Secretary of State not to be too harsh on the hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby)? The Secretary of State will be aware that, without his hon. Friend's vote, the Government would not have had a majority in the Division.

If the Secretary of State feels that it is right to give the right to manage to tenants of local authorities, why is it wrong to give the same right to leaseholders?

Mr. Gummer: First, I was trying to be as helpful as possible to my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby). The Lands Tribunal has ruled that commission is part of landlords' income. Therefore, there is no doubt that the provision would be justiciable in the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Ashby: I have the judgments here.

Mr. Gummer: I am trying hard to be as even-handed as possible, and the advice I have is that that is what the Lands Tribunal has ruled. Therefore, we can say that there is at least a doubt. I do not want a situation in which there is a doubt, either for those who wish to manage or for anyone else. I also want to protect the rights of landlords and tenants and leaseholders. Therefore, I am proposing a solution that will get around the problems.

First, I want it to be absolutely clear that if leaseholders have any reasonable wish to manage because the freeholder has not behaved properly, they should be able to do so rapidly, simply and at very low cost. If I can meet that aim, I will be able to be equitable on both sides. I propose to face up to the thoroughly unscrupulous actions of a minority of landlords and that is why I put a substantial package of measures in the Bill in the first place. That package is not in the Bill because of Opposition pressure: it is there because the Government put it there. The pressure came not from the hon. Member for Greenwich but from my right hon. Friends the Members for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) and for Hove (Sir T. Sainsbury) and from my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) and for Fulham (Mr. Carrington). It came from Conservative Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire, who has pressed those issues, as has my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). As Minister responsible for London, I could not have failed to see the problems, and that is why I brought forward a substantial package of measures.

The public expect the House to act with equity, and the first basic problem is that, whenever anybody tried to enforce a management arrangement, the unscrupulous landlord said, "If you lose in court, I will be in a position to get you out of your flat." That rarely happened, and I say that because I am not used to using the word "never". Nevertheless, the threat was often used and many people failed to take their landlord to court. I sought to have the decision made by a body that does not have the powers to remove somebody's leasehold right, so that no one need be frightened. Even though the worry that I have mentioned is largely, if not wholly, unreal, the tribunal seems to be the proper way of proceeding.

In addition, people would not take their landlords to court because it was too expensive. The freeholder would have the best legal advisers—no doubt some of them would be between us if I were to discuss the matter with my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire. Such actions could be expensive and dragged out, and people would give in.

Mr. Ashby: I have not received any legal advice, but I have studied Lands Tribunal judgment after judgment. I cannot possibly see why a landlord has any right to profit from the management of a premises. That view has been fully upheld by all Lands Tribunal decisions that I have seen, including recent decisions.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend's advice is challenged by people who have done precisely the same as my hon. Friend, but to an even greater extent. I am trying to be as helpful as I can to my hon. Friend. There is, at least, disagreement, so let us leave it at that.

One must devise a way of dealing with the situation that is not expensive and is readily available, which is why I have suggested that the leasehold valuation tribunal would be the suitable organisation. It will be able to make decisions immediately and reasonably cheaply. It will not be necessary for people to have legal representation, because applicable arguments will be much more readily understood by tribunal members, who will be able to use their professional expertise. My hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire would acknowledge that the problem with the courts is that a judge is not able to use his expertise, even if he has any. Tribunal members will be able to use their expertise and to seek from the freeholder details of how he failed to carry through his duty.

It seems to me that one should go further and reverse—I say this as a non-lawyer—the burden of proof. The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors will be publishing a guide to the way in which freeholders should manage property. It will be open to any leaseholder to say, "Here is the guide. My freeholder has failed to adhere to it"—then the tribunal will be able to introduce the manager to run the block of flats. That seems to be the proper way forward. It will ensure easy access to justice for people who need it, the cost will be reasonable and a landlord will have to prove that he has done the job properly—or that he has not for reasons readily acceptable as force majeure.

Labour's proposition would be difficult to defend because it would mean saying to a class of subject that something that they have will be taken away without compensation. I am trying to put in place a means of offering to anybody who wants to take over a property's management a clear, easy and accessible means of doing so.

The significant changes in the Bill are backed by a series of helpful mechanisms. We have added another ground for the tribunal to take into account in considering whether a manager should be appointed—that the freeholder has failed to comply with the relevant codes of practice to which I referred. The tribunal can refer to the code drawn up by the Association of Retirement Housing Managers, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East referred.

6.45 pm

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State referred to the association's code of guidance and other codes. Which other codes are in existence?

Mr. Gummer: I said that the RICS was finalising a code, which I can approve under the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 and make statutory. I hope to approve the code and to make sure that it has legal force shortly.

We are proposing to shorten from three to two years the period for which a manager appointed by the LVT must be in place before the tenants have sufficient grounds to apply to acquire the freehold interest. That offers an attractive route for tenants to purchase the freehold at open market value.

We have produced a means of easy, reasonable and accessible redress that protects people from the harassment that we have seen from bad freeholders yet preserves the equity that otherwise would lead us into grave difficulties—even if I do not go too far in meeting the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire, which I do not underestimate, who referred to LVT decisions about the price to be paid for the freeholder's interest on enfranchisement. The Lands Tribunal has ruled that no separate amount needs to be allowed in respect of insurance commissions, because the price fixed by reference to evidence of market transactions already includes that value. The Lands Tribunal, which is superior to the LVT, has confirmed that insurance commissions are part of the value of the freehold. The leading case is that of Calthorpe estate. On that ground, any estate could appeal to the European Court of Human Rights—not the European Court of Justice, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East knows. I do not want to be in that position. I want to give people certainty with equity, and the Government's proposals will achieve precisely that.

Mr. Ashby: The new clause and the schedule attempt to address the problem, and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for introducing it. I shall not be so churlish as to say that I totally disagree with it, as that is not the point, but we are almost dealing with this as though we are in Committee.

I am fundamentally opposed to leaseholds and always have been. They are a form of confidence trick, established 200 years ago, when the only form of investment available was land. All the great landowners owned land. There was no equity market. No other form of investment was available. Later, landowners transferred ownership of the land, but for only 99 or 125 years, and in three generations would get it back. The high value of the land is repeated time and again. Those are the people whom we are talking about. I believe that, in a sense, we have got it fundamentally wrong.

The interests of the landlord are traded time and again. I am not talking about the people to whom reference has been made in the Chamber in glowing terms, because there are good and bad landlords. By and large, as soon as the landlord has sold off the leasehold, he trades the freehold. I am thinking of a case, which I mentioned in Committee, in which there was a long lease of 120 years, with 117 left to run. The leasehold was traded at auction and bought for £5,000. The price paid was about six or seven times the annual ground rent.

Why does someone in that position buy the leasehold? Because he hopes that he can do something with it, that in time he will be able to trade it up and that it will be a good investment and make money for him. One of the ways in which he does that is by looking at the services. He is able to do two things: first, he is able to charge an administration fee. "I am the landlord," he says, "I am administering this property, so I shall charge an administration fee, which I assess to be £200 per year per property." That is nice and easy. That is lovely to have. That includes, of course, the cost of various other things. Secondly, he says, "Well, I must also look after the property." That is marvellous. "So I shall have to appoint a surveyor. I just happen to have one in my company." That means more profit for him, because it is his own surveyor. "Oh," he says, "the property needs to be repaired, doesn't it? I shall use my own company, which charges costs plus 25 per cent. for the work." At the end of the day his return is about 35 or 40 per cent.

That is what I object to very strongly indeed. It is the tenant who suffers and will continue to suffer these high costs. The landlord's interest is in the freehold. The tenant's interest is in the management. He is concerned to see that his property is properly serviced and managed, and there is absolutely no reason why he should not. I cannot understand my right hon. Friend when he says that landlords are entitled to make these great profits, or make profits.

Mr. Gummer: I shall try to help my hon. Friend. I have not said that they are entitled to make either profits or great profits. I said that in law it is established that they have certain rights, and if one took them away without compensation, one would be subject to an appeal to the European Court of Human Rights. That is all that I am saying. I am not saying whether I think that it is a good thing or a bad thing. I just think that we must take that into account when having these discussions. I am trying to find a way that avoids that issue while still protecting the leaseholder in the way that I know my hon. Friend wants, and that I also want. That is why I put it in the Bill. If I did not care about it, I would not have put it in the Bill in the first place.

Mr. Ashby: Why cannot we all be adventurous in this? I shall not criticise the Secretary of State. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) will not either. Let us say that landlords are not allowed to earn these profits and then see what happens in the European Court. We have a decision of the Lands Tribunal. It has not been taken to the Court of Appeal or to the House of Lords. The Lands Tribunal is just a court of first instance that has made a decision. It is not the law. It is merely a precedent. Parliament is sovereign and has the right to legislate and to make laws. I give the undertaking to my right hon. Friend that I would not dream of criticising the Government, and I know that the hon. Member for Greenwich would give the specific undertaking on behalf of his party that he would not dream of criticising the Government but would uphold them as trying their best to do the right thing and to be fair and just to everybody. Why not legislate and be damned? That is what we should do.

I am absolutely convinced morally, despite the decision of the Lands Tribunal, that landlords, by virtue of the fact that they hold the freehold, have no rights in that agreement other than to collect the ground rent and to nominate the insurance company that is to insure the building. Most leases are the same. Mine does not say that my landlord is entitled to commission, merely that he can nominate the insurance company, and when I next pay him his insurance, I shall deduct 15 per cent., because I know that that is his commission. He can take me to court for his 15 per cent. I shall put before him my lease and say, "It doesn't say anything, mate, about you being entitled to take commission."

We voted this in. We gave the right to manage. I cannot think of anything more fitting than that tenants should be allowed to choose their own management, to get away from the exorbitant profits of landlords who have bought these properties at auction. I am not talking about the good landlords, because good landlords do not "manage". The Grosvenor estate does not manage; it creates a head lease. Other people carry out the servicing. The big estates that we all want to praise do not manage.

I received a letter today from Mr. and Mrs. Mathew of Bristol. I grabbed it just before I came into the House. It says:

"Dear Mr. Ashby,

As members of a Residents' Association we are very much concerned with trying to manage our own flats, and were therefore pleased to read in 'The Times' April 3rd that you are supporting a 'right to manage' clause in the Housing Bill.

We are victims of extortionate management fees"—

this is important—

"which means that no-one in our block is able to sell their flat.

Knowing very little about procedures in the house, we would be most grateful if you could let us know how this bill has progressed and if and when it is likely to become law."

What am I to say in reply? I am to say, "Yes, we are giving you some sort of right. Let me tell you what you must do. It is very complicated. You must serve a notice, which must specify a number of things. Where those things are capable of being remedied by the landlord, he must 'take such steps for the purpose of remedying them as are so specified' before an application can be made." A landlord can be bad, and then put things right; he can be bad for another year, and then put that right; and he can do the same for another year. Tenants can be given lousy service year after year, but they cannot get very far in doing anything about it, because section 22(2)(d) of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 makes it so complicated.

7 pm

I would then have to tell Mr. and Mrs. Mathew, "There are other problems. You must prove not only that the landlord is a bad landlord, but that 'the circumstances by virtue of which he is (or would be) in breach of any such obligation are likely to continue'."

My gosh! I suppose that a medium could be summoned to give evidence, and to explain what "likely to continue" means. I can envisage landlords coming along and saying, "I am terribly sorry, but the circumstances are not likely to continue."

An order can also be made

"where the court is satisfied . . . that unreasonable service charges have been made".

What constitutes "unreasonable"? I suppose that an administration charge, plus use of the landlord's own surveyor, plus a mark-up on the cost of his contractor, is not unreasonable. A mark-up of 10 per cent. or 15 per cent. is not unreasonable; the administration charge in itself is not unreasonable. The fact that the surveyor is subject to a charge of £120 an hour is not unreasonable. We are talking about the sum total. That is where the poor tenant is having a lousy time of it.

What worries me most is the provision that

"A leasehold valuation tribunal may, on the application of any person interested, vary or discharge (whether conditionally or unconditionally) an order made under this section".

It is a temporary order. Someone has gone to all that trouble, getting the tenants together; they have all put money into the kitty; he has gone to court, and had a terrible time trying to sort everything out; then he finds that the order is only temporary. The landlord then comes along and says, "I have appointed another director, and there is a new management company. It is my brother-in-law—not my other brother-in-law, this brother-in-law. He is much better than the other one. We shall have no more problems: things will be put right." The leasehold valuation tribunal may well—probably will—discharge the application and management order. Then, six months later, the poor tenants will be back in the same boat.

[Mr. Ashby]

This is merely an attempt to deal with what I have complained about continually in regard to our whole approach to leasehold reform and the need to tackle rogue landlords. We make it so difficult for the tenant. We look at every way in which we can act, and always choose the most difficult path. Perhaps we consult too many lawyers. Why do we not consult the tenants, and ask them to tell us how to work things out? They will have a simpler approach: they will go straight to the heart of the matter. We have too many lawyers—and I say that as a lawyer myself. We view everything in the most complicated possible way. When I view leasehold reform as a whole, I see the complications involved.

In Committee, I tabled an amendment and two new clauses that would have simplified the whole matter, and gone to the crux of leasehold reform. We should get rid of marriage values and all that junk. When a person buys a freehold at auction, he looks at the ground rent and multiplies it by eight. Let us say that the value of the freehold multiplies it by 10—but no, that is not good enough; it is too simple. We have to turn to marriage values, which were created by surveyors so that they could give themselves more work and which are now enshrined in legislation. If I went to an auction, I should look at the return on the investment, as I would with a company, and save 10 times. That is good enough, surely. But people are buying the freehold at eight times, and asking whether there are ways of getting around it, such as the service charge. They will have a nice little business going, and it will be the tenant who suffers.

When someone buys a long lease, he has taken away most from that property. Let us think of it as a whole. When someone has bought a lease of 99, 125 or, in my case, 999 years, what is left? Nothing but ground rent: nothing of any value. All the talk of enhancing landlords' rights is nonsense. It is an anachronism from 200 years ago. We should view the matter in a cold, specific way, realising that we shall lose some friends on the way—although we shall lose very few, and make many more, while making our existing friends extremely happy.

I beg the Minister to examine the matter again. He has gone so far, but it is very complicated. We shall see hardly any applications. If the measure is passed, I shall write to poor Mr. and Mrs. Mathew telling them that there is not much hope. They can make the application, but it will cost them a lot of money and take a lot of time because the Government are not prepared to do anything substantial, simple and easy about that landlord. I hope that the Minister will tell me how I could write to them differently, but I am not sure that I can.

Sir Timothy Sainsbury (Hove): As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State knows, Hove—like parts of London—contains many long leaseholders. Like my right hon. Friend, I am angry about the fact that too many have suffered for far too long from bad and, in some cases, unscrupulous management. Freeholders have sought to make money to which they are not entitled. Regrettably, the problem remains, despite our four bites at the cherry in 1980, 1985, 1987 and 1993, and the considerable progress made by Conservative Governments in helping long leaseholders.

I am delighted that my right hon. Friend has introduced this package of measures in response, as he said, to representations from a number of his right hon. and hon. Friends. I agree with him that both sides must be properly protected, and that we must be fair to both sides. I say that particularly to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby). If we are not fair to both sides, it is unlikely that the proposed arrangements will stick. Let me also tell my hon. Friend that the landlord has an interest of value. It is not just a question of the ground rent; there is the reversion. The time involved may not be so long as his 999 years: in many cases, it may be 40 or even 30 years.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's new clause. In particular, on behalf of many constituents whose requests I have forwarded to him and whom I have seen personally—constituents who have asked for simple and cheap procedures—I welcome the use of tribunals. I think that there is a reasonable prospect of such simplicity and cheapness if they are used.

I wish to ask one more thing. Can we expect the tribunals to act with reasonable speed? If they do not and the leaseholders are left hanging around for some time while they try to get the right to manage, it will be very unsatisfactory.

The codes to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred are extremely important. Perhaps I should declare that I am an honorary fellow of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. I do not want to alarm my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire too much. It is a non-pecuniary interest. The codes will be a great help. Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State ensure that maximum publicity is given not only to the still further enhancement of the rights of leaseholders, but to the codes? It is very important that the codes are publicised so that leaseholders know the basis on which they may bring cases before the tribunal and when it would be appropriate to do so.

I thank my right hon. Friend for responding to the representations. We have struck the right balance and it is very important that maximum publicity is given to the Bill.

Mr. Carrington: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for proposing the measures. They enable leaseholders who suffer the depredations of bad freeholders to obtain some measure of justice. Whereas I accept the criticisms of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby), I think that it is possible to overcome them. Although, like him, I have an instinctive preference for leaseholders' right to manage, we should not pretend that it has no problems. The right to manage suggests that leaseholders must have a common interest and operate—at least in the majority—in the same interests as one another. Sadly, and indeed perversely, I have come across instances in my constituency where that has not happened.

The valuation tribunal is a vast improvement on having to go to court, but I should like to ask one or two questions on the way in which it would operate. I should be most grateful if my right hon. Friend could address them in his winding-up speech. The valuation tribunal will be successful only if it is possible to get a decision out of it very quickly—if the delays in hearings are brief and, once hearings start, the decision is taken speedily. That requires that, if there is overload in the number of cases going to such a tribunal, new valuation tribunals can be appointed. It also means that delays caused intentionally by the landlord claiming, for instance, that he is not yet ready with his evidence or other reasons, can be disregarded by the valuation tribunal. In other words, it means that a date can be set and justice can be delivered quickly. It also requires that the appeal process cannot be dragged out by the landlord. I am slightly concerned, not being a lawyer—as some of my hon. Friends who have spoken are—or a surveyor, that if the valuation tribunal decision is contested by the landlord, the landlord may take that decision to the courts and we might be back to square one and leaseholders having to undergo a very long and costly procedure to be able to get justice. We have to address the appeal process, and I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would consider it.

The principal mode of getting justice is through the guidelines of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, which of course we have not seen. To a considerable extent, therefore, we are taking the whole business on trust. I recognise that the guidelines will be improved and, one hopes, put into statute by the Department of the Environment. That is encouraging, but I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend would also confirm that the guidelines will be detailed, specific and prescriptive, so that it will not be possible for a landlord to claim that he is acting in accordance with the guidelines by taking, say, three quotations from related builders for maintenance work—the first being his brother, the second his cousin, and the third of course being himself in some guise. It is only right that the guidelines on the management of a building and whether the agent who is managing the building is related to the freeholder are very specific. Clearly, the latter should not be allowed under the guidelines.

On a happier note, I should also be grateful if my right hon. Friend would confirm whether individual leaseholders will be able to go to the tribunal. That is very important. If one leaseholder can go to the tribunal in his own right without having to refer to other leaseholders, the considerable problem in a very large number of inner-London blocks of flats that are owned by non-residential or foreign landlords who do not take a great deal of interest in the management of the block will be solved. If one leaseholder can go to the valuation tribunal and obtain justice and, in extreme circumstances, the appointment of an appropriate manager for the block, many of the wrongs that we see as Members representing inner-London constituencies will be put right. It is important that the right should be exercisable by the individual and not just by the group of leaseholders.

Having said that and in looking forward to the reassurances that I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will give me, I welcome the proposed move forward. It is capable of being made to work in a way that will benefit the vast majority of leaseholders. I hope that if the problems that my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire described start to appear, my right hon. Friend will revisit the matter either by order or in another Bill. No matter how long it takes, we must get the management of blocks of flats in London right and ensure that leaseholders have justice.

7.15 pm

Mr. Raynsford: In response to the concluding comments of the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), I can assure him that if the present Secretary of State fails to provide justice for leaseholders, as I fear he will, the next Labour Government will have no such hesitation in doing what we know is right, to ensure that leaseholders have proper remedies and redress for the many problems that have rightly been highlighted in Committee and in the House.

In the earlier part of the debate, there was what I can describe only as an element of fantasy politics, which started with the Secretary of State and continued with the right hon. Member for Hove (Sir T. Sainsbury). If either of them believes that the debate is simply because of pressure from a few Conservative Members, they are living in cloud cuckoo land, as their right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would say.

We are having this debate because leaseholders have rightly been campaigning energetically for many months against the scandalous abuses that have been all too evident. Such abuses have been particularly highlighted by the Evening Standard, which has done a great service, especially for leaseholders in London and in the south-east, in exposing the antics of Mr. Bebbington and others of his ilk, who have nakedly abused their opportunities and extorted money on false pretences from their leaseholders, threatening them with forfeiture if they failed to pay up.

The campaign has been spearheaded by the splendid Campaign Against Residential Leasehold Abuse. Leaseholders and hon. Members owe it a great debt of gratitude for all its work in exposing the problem. The debate has arisen because of that campaign and because of the vote in Committee for a right to manage. If the Committee had not taken that decision, I can assure Conservative Members that we would not be having this debate.

The Secretary of State has admitted that the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, which was supposedly designed to give remedies and redress to leaseholders, has not been as effective as it might have been. We agree with him. We warned him at the time that it would be ineffective, in just the same way as we warned the Government that the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 would be ineffective. The first main reason why the 1987 Act is ineffective is the cost of court procedures. That is well known, and I think that it is agreed by everyone.

The second reason why the Act is ineffective is the need for the leaseholder to prove that the landlord is in breach of his obligations, and that that breach is likely to continue. That is the wording of the Act, and, of course, it provides the easiest let-out in the book for the reluctant or dishonest landlord. All the landlord has to do is to come along to the court and say, "I am very sorry. I may have done wrong in the past, but I recognise it and I shall be a good boy in future. I shall not commit such offences again." Under the terms of the Act, the court has no option but to say, "Sorry, we cannot appoint a manager."

The third reason, or obstacle, is the immensely complex and bureaucratic procedures, to which the hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby) alluded.

[Mr. Raynsford]

The procedures require an endless serving of notices, and that all sorts of procedural antics are gone through, which makes it all too easy for unscrupulous freeholders—often able to deploy large batteries of qualified experts, lawyers and professionals—to bamboozle and tie up leaseholders in complications and threats of mounting costs should they try to pursue the issue any further. Those are the three elements of the problem.

The Government lifted those provisions from part II of the 1987 Act, and put them into this Bill—with one significant and crucial amendment, that procedures would in future be effected through leasehold valuation tribunals rather than through the courts. I grant that that provision addresses the issue of costs, but it does not eliminate it. There will be costs, because the well-heeled freeholder will be able to deploy much expert advice and mount a very successful case in a leasehold valuation tribunal, which will inevitably lead the leaseholder to incur substantial costs to counter the case. So it is not true to say that the provision will eliminate costs for leaseholders, although it will reduce them. On that one aspect, I grant that the Government's proposal is better than the 1987 Act.

The Government's proposal does not address the other two issues. The wording that the Government are now proposing for the procedure, under which the leasehold valuation tribunal will have the discretion to appoint a manager, still requires the leaseholder to prove that the landlord has been at fault and that those faults will continue. As I said, it will be all too easy for freeholders with expert lawyers to mount a case to try to demonstrate that, even if they have made mistakes in the past, they have now turned over a new leaf and will be well behaved in future. There will be endless scope for freeholders to evade the provisions.

On the third point, as I said, the procedures are still immensely complex and tortuous, which again will give all too many opportunities for unscrupulous and reluctant freeholders to frustrate the wishes of leaseholders.

Our view, and the view of leaseholders, is that this provision simply will not work. Like the 1987 Act, it will be a sop and not a remedy. In case any hon. Member has any doubts about that, I can only quote the comments of Chas Johnson, of the Campaign Against Residential Leasehold Abuse, who has been tireless in campaigning on the issue, writing to many hon. Members about it and making the case most forcefully. He said:

> "Do not be misled. The proposed amendment is wholly inferior to 'the right to manage' and dilutes the impact of the Bill dramatically. It is effectively a rehash of existing, unsatisfactory legislation that has remained unused since its introduction in 1987. Its only novelty is a shift in jurisdiction from the courts to the LVT to make its nebulous provisions available on a more affordable basis."

That is the expert commentator's judgment on the new clause—a judgment that we endorse entirely.

The right to manage, by contrast, offers effective redress for leaseholders, and it also offers safeguards for freeholders. As I stressed in an intervention on the speech of the Secretary of State, the model of the right to manage provides for the freeholder to be represented in the management company that would be set up. Freeholders would not have their rights taken away without any compensation. They would have a continuing role to play and a continuing voice, to ensure that the properties were properly managed. They would have the ability to seek the termination of the management agreement if the management company failed.

There is no threat in these provisions to good landlords. The case was put very forcefully in 1992 by the Grosvenor estate, which stated that it saw no threat in a right to manage. It is not good freeholders who would have anything to lose by the right to manage; it is simply the crooks—the Bebbingtons of the world—who are only too happy to exploit their opportunity to extort unreasonable sums from leaseholders and to threaten them in a scandalous manner if they fail to cough up.

Our right to manage gives leaseholders an effective remedy against such threats, and is widely recognised by leaseholders as the right response. It is utterly inconsistent of the Government to reject it. As I have already pointed out to the Secretary of State, the Government were prepared to introduce a right to manage for council tenants, to enable them to take over the management of their homes, not if their landlord was at fault, but if the tenants wished to exercise the right to manage. I ask the Secretary of State how he can possibly justify those double standards, arguing for a right to manage for council tenants, while denying that same right to leaseholders.

We once again see the malign influence of the big landowners who bankroll the Tory party. They have gone to the Government and said, "We cannot stomach a right to manage." The landowners have once again forced the Government to show their true colours. The Government may talk about aiding and supporting leaseholders, but they will never do so. They will never do so because they are financially dependent on the big landowners, and they will not sacrifice their financial interests to achieve justice for leaseholders.

Earlier today, the Government survived by a whisker a vote in defence of their financial interests and in defence of landowners. But their time is running out, and they will shortly have to face the electorate. When they do, many leaseholders across the country will rightly and harshly judge them for betraying leaseholders' interests in the past few years, and particularly for what they are doing today.

The hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire spoke of the need to be brave and bold. I invite him, and other Conservative Members who want to be brave and bold, to vote with Opposition Members today in defence of leaseholders—to ensure that leaseholders get justice in 1996 rather than having to wait until next year, when Labour will ensure that they get justice.

Mr. Gummer: I suggest to the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) that those final flourishes have no connection at all with the truth. Indeed, it is a pity to be attacked for something which it would be rather nice to have. Unfortunately, we do not have the substance, so we do not deserve the criticism. I wish that the hon. Gentleman had examined rather more carefully what we proposed. As my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) said very clearly, we are seeking very much more than the hon. Gentleman would give us credit for.

I can assure my hon. Friend that if there is overloading, I shall ensure that there are sufficient tribunals to cover the pressure. He need not be worried about appeals, because they will be not to the courts but to the Lands

Tribunal—so the simplicity continues at that point. The guidelines must be specific, as he said. I have the powers to put them into statute, and I shall ensure that they are as I want them to be. I am sure that he will be happy with them, and I give him my assurance that individual leaseholders can use that mechanism, which is one of the major advantages.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Sir T. Sainsbury) about publicity for what we are doing and for how the codes will operate. I also need the publicity, because there is no doubt that measures to help leaseholders have been taken by this Government, as a result of pressure from Conservative Members of Parliament. A Conservative Secretary of State and Minister responsible for London introduced the measure at the earliest opportunity. The fact that one or two Opposition Members have suddenly discovered that this might be a subject to be interested in has not escaped those who know. A very high proportion of them will benefit from the legislation that we have introduced. It would be a pity if they had to wait for the next Labour Government, because they would have to wait for decades.

The hon. Member for Greenwich should have looked at the facts before he made the comments that he made. The question of "likely to continue" does not apply to any but the first ground, which is a breach. A breach might, for example, be forced on people by force majeure. Something might arise that is not the landlord's fault and is outwith his power, which means that he cannot provide the service that is necessary. It would be reasonable to allow him to plead that the position was not likely to continue. However, when it comes to unreasonable charges or, for example, a departure from the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors' codes, no such claim can be made. So the protection is much greater than the hon. Gentleman suggests.

7.30 pm

I believe that we have found a means of protecting the leaseholder without opening ourselves up to the damaging process of law. It is equitable. It provides certainty and it protects. It is another example of the Government's defence of the leaseholder. I hope that the House will support the Government's proposals.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 288, Noes 279.

Division No. 115] [7.30 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Aitken, Rt Hon Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Rt Hon Kenneth (Mole V)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Bates, Michael
Batiste, Spencer
Bendall, Vivian
Beresford, Sir Paul
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Sir Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Sir Rhodes
Brandreth, Gyles
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Sir Graham
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Brown, M (Brigg & C'thorpes)
Browning, Mrs Angela
Budgen, Nicholas
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Peter
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Sir Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sir Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Ru'cliff)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Coe, Sebastian
Congdon, David
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'ire)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dicks, Terry
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Sir Anthony
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Rt Hon Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Fox, Rt Hon Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Freeman, Rt Hon Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Sir Peter
Gale, Roger
Gallie, Phil
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, Sir John
Grant, Sir A (SW Cambs)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Grylls, Sir Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archibald
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Rt Hon Jeremy
Hannam, Sir John
Hargreaves, Andrew
Haselhurst, Sir Alan
Hawkins, Nick
Hawksley, Warren
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hendry, Charles
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Horam, John
Hordern, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (W Hertfdshr)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, Sir David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Legg, Barry
Leigh, Edward
Lennox-Boyd, Sir Mark
Lester, Sir James (Broxtowe)
Lidington, David
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
McNair-Wilson, Sir Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mans, Keith
Marland, Paul
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Dr Brian
Mayhew, Rt Hon Sir Patrick
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)

Moate, Sir Roger
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moss, Malcolm
Needham, Rt Hon Richard
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Patnick, Sir Irvine
Patten, Rt Hon John
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Pickles, Eric
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Rt Hon Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Rathbone, Tim
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Riddick, Graham
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Ryder, Rt Hon Richard
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Sir Timothy
Scott, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Sir Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Nicholas
Speed, Sir Keith
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Sir Michael (S Worcs)
Spink, Dr Robert
Spring, Richard
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stephen, Michael
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan
Streeter, Gary
Sweeney, Walter
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (N Tayside)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'fld)
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Derek Conway and
Mr. Simon Burns.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Mrs Irene
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Ms Janet (Ros'dale)
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Austin-Walker, John
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Margaret
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blair, Rt Hon Tony
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Boyes, Roland
Bradley, Keith
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (Dunfermline E)
Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burden, Richard
Byers, Stephen
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cann, Jamie
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John
Cunningham, Roseanna
Dafis, Cynog
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Chris (L'Boro & S'worth)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge H'l)
Denham, John
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Dowd, Jim
Dunnachie, Jimmy
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Etherington, Bill
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Ewing, Mrs Margaret
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fisher, Mark
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foulkes, George
Fraser, John
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Garrett, John
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godsiff, Roger
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gunnell, John
Hall, Mike
Hanson, David
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harvey, Nick
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Henderson, Doug
Hendron, Dr Joe
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Hoon, Geoffrey
Howarth, Alan (Strat'rd-on-A)
Howarth, George (Knowsley North)
Howells, Dr Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hume, John
Hutton, John
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, Adam
Jackson, Glenda (H'stead)
Jackson, Helen (Sheffld, H)
Jamieson, David
Janner, Greville
Jenkins, Brian (SE Staff)
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Jowell, Tessa
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Kennedy, Jane (L'pool Br'dg'n)
Khabra, Piara S
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kirkwood, Archy
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Liddell, Mrs Helen
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loyden, Eddie
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAllion, John
McAvoy, Thomas
McCartney, Ian
McCartney, Robert
McCrea, The Reverend William
McFall, John
McGrady, Eddie
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Robert
McMaster, Gordon
MacShane, Denis
Maddock, Diana
Mahon, Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Martin, Michael J (Springburn)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll & Bute)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moonie, Dr Lewis

Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Mike (N Wkshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
Paisley, The Reverend Ian
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Pope, Greg
Powell, Ray (Ogmore)
Prentice, Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Raynsford, Nick
Reid, Dr John
Rendel, David
Robertson, George (Hamilton)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Roche, Mrs Barbara
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Salmond, Alex
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Chris (Islton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Steinberg, Gerry
Strang, Dr. Gavin
Straw, Jack
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Thurnham, Peter
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Wallace, James
Walley, Joan
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert N
Watson, Mike
Welsh, Andrew
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Sw'n W)
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Wilson, Brian
Wise, Audrey
Worthington, Tony
Wray, Jimmy
Wright, Dr Tony
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Jon Owen Jones and
Mr. Peter Hain.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 16

PERIOD AFTER WHICH ACQUISITION ORDER MAY BE MADE

'. In Part III of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 (compulsory acquisition by tenants of their landlord's interest), in section 29(3) (conditions for making acquisition orders: period since appointment of manager under Part II) for "three years" substitute "two years".'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 17

TEXT OF PART II OF THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT 1987, AS AMENDED

'. The text of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 as amended by this Act is set out in Schedule (Text of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, as amended).'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 12

FORM OF NOTICES UNDER SECTION 21 OF THE HOUSING ACT 1988

'.—(1) Section 21 of the Housing Act 1988 (recovery of possession on expiry or termination of assured shorthold tenancy) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)(b) (which requires the landlord under a fixed term tenancy to give two months' notice to recover possession), after "notice" there shall be inserted "in writing".

(3) In subsection (4)(a) (corresponding provision for periodic tenancies), after "notice", where it first occurs, there shall be inserted "in writing".'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 150, in clause 86, page 59, line 31, at end insert—

'(8) The notices referred to in paragraph (b) of subsection (1) and paragraph (a) of subsection (4) above shall be in writing and in such form as may be prescribed by regulations.'.

Mr. Clappison: This new clause clarifies my undertaking in Committee to reconsider whether written notices should be given by a landlord who is seeking possession. Although the previous practice does not seem to have caused any problems, I agree that it would clarify matters if such notices were required to be in writing. The new clause seeks to achieve that.

I agree that notices should be in writing, but the matter should not be taken so far that a prescribed notice be required, as is proposed in the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock). That would be an unnecessary formality and I advise the House to resist it.

7.45 pm

Mr. Chris Davies (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Following the proposal in Committee, the Minister's proposals simply do not go far enough. Amendment No. 150 is a simple, technical amendment that would reduce the need for clarification and for matters to be tested in court at a later date. It is in the Government's interest to accept it.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 13

DUTY OF LANDLORD TO PROVIDE STATEMENT OF TERMS OF ASSURED SHORTHOLD TENANCY

'. After section 20 of the Housing Act 1988 there shall be inserted—

"Post-Housing Act 1996 tenancies: duty of landlord to provide statement as to terms of tenancy

20A.—(1) Subject to subsection (3) below, a tenant under an assured shorthold tenancy to which section 19A above applies may, by notice in writing, require the landlord under that tenancy to provide him with a written statement of any term of the tenancy which—

(a) falls within subsection (2) below, and

(b) is not evidenced in writing.

(2) The following terms of a tenancy fall within this subsection, namely—

(a) the date on which the tenancy began or, if it is a statutory periodic tenancy or a tenancy to which section 39(7) below applies, the date on which the tenancy came into being,

(b) the rent payable under the tenancy and the dates on which that rent is payable,

(c) any term providing for a review of the rent payable under the tenancy, and

(d) in the case of a fixed term tenancy, the length of the fixed term.

(3) No notice may be given under subsection (1) above in relation to a term of the tenancy if—

(a) the landlord under the tenancy has provided a statement of that term in response to an earlier notice under that subsection given by the tenant under the tenancy, and

(b) the term has not been varied since the provision of the statement referred to in paragraph (a) above.

(4) A landlord who fails, without reasonable excuse, to comply with a notice under subsection (1) above within the period of 28 days beginning with the date on which he received the notice is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.

(5) A statement provided for the purposes of subsection (1) above shall not be regarded as conclusive evidence of what was agreed by the parties to the tenancy in question.

(6) Where—

(a) a term of a statutory periodic tenancy is one which has effect by virtue of section 5(3)(e) above, or

(b) a term of a tenancy to which subsection (7) of section 39 below applies is one which has effect by virtue of subsection (6)(e) of that section, subsection (1) above shall have effect in relation to it as if paragraph (b) related to the term of the tenancy from which it derives.

(7) In subsections (1) and (3) above—

(a) references to the tenant under the tenancy shall, in the case of joint tenants, be taken to be references to any of the tenants, and

(b) references to the landlord under the tenancy shall, in the case of joint landlords, be taken to be references to any of the landlords.".'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 17, in schedule 7, page 147, line 28, at end insert—'Tenancies excluded by absence of written tenancy agreement—

(4A) An assured tenancy for which there is no written tenancy agreement.'

Mr. Clappison: Amendment No. 17 deals with the question of what happens where a landlord and tenant do not put their agreement into writing. The amendment would cause such positions to result in a full assured tenancy being created. That is not a good idea. I have reflected on what the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) said in Committee about that. It is neither equitable nor logical that, when landlord and tenant do not put their agreement into writing, that consequence should follow.

It may not be entirely prudent for a landlord not to have an agreement in writing—not least from the landlord's own point of view—but a full assured tenancy should not be created for that reason, not least because that would defeat the landlord's intention. It is not fair—or right—when the landlord intends to create an assured shorthold tenancy and when a tenant agrees on that, for a full assured tenancy to be created merely because of the absence of an agreement in writing. The amendment should not be added to schedule 7 as one of the exceptions in relation to assured shorthold tenancies. I note that all the other exceptions where assured tenancies are created depend on the landlord's intention.

The amendment would defeat the landlord's intention. It runs contrary to what we are seeking to do throughout the Bill: it would create unnecessary formality and, in effect, a trap into which some unwary landlords might fall. It is reasonable, however, for landlords to provide more information to tenants. New clause 13 achieves that in a sensible way. It requires the landlord to provide the tenant, on request, with written details about the date that the tenancy began, the rent and other important details. That will provide tenants who have oral agreements with their landlords with the most important terms relating to rent and security of tenure, and will provide an adequate safeguard against the minority of landlords who might seek to exploit their tenants' rights.

Where a landlord fails to comply with his tenant's request within 28 days and there is no reasonable excuse for his failure, the landlord will be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine. That achieves an appropriate balance.

Mr. Raynsford: It will be no surprise to the Minister to learn that we profoundly disagree with him. His comments show the extent to which the Conservative party has, in the past decade, lurched to the right. When assured tenancies and assured shorthold tenancies were introduced by the late Lord Ridley—not someone who would be deemed to be on the wet side of the Conservative party—the assumption was that normal letting would take place through an assured tenancy. The shorthold tenancy was designed as a tenancy for separate purposes, such as when a landlord wanted to let only for a short period. I remember Lord Ridley saying that, for that reason, shorthold tenancies would attract a lower rent than assured tenancies.

Times have changed, and there has been a progressive erosion of tenants' rights. The shorthold tenancy has become far more popular than the assured tenancy and, because of the acute shortage of rented housing, it often commands a rent identical to that of the more secure assured tenancy. Consequently, landlords have no reason to offer an assured tenancy.

The Government are now compounding that problem by making the assured shorthold tenancy the default tenancy. We believe that there should be a proper fair balance between the interests of landlord and tenant, not the complete surrender that the Government are performing to the interests of the landlord at all costs, while the interests of tenants are abandoned.

We believe that, where a landlord fails to prescribe the fact that he wishes to let for a short period, it is right and proper that a full assured tenancy should be created, and that is the purpose of our amendment. We greatly regret the fact that the Government will not accept it, but we understand why. Their lurch to the right says it all. Undoubtedly, the matter will need to be revisited after the general election.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 24

SUCCESSION ON DEATH OF TENANT: HOUSING ACT 1985

'After subsection (4) of section 88 of the Housing Act 1985 there shall be inserted—

"(5) Nothing in this section shall be taken as preventing any person from qualifying to succeed a tenant in accordance with section 87 above where the tenant concerned has died and had himself succeeded from his spouse or from a joint tenancy with his spouse."'.—[Mr. Betts.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Betts: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 160, in clause 113, page 72, line 20, at end insert—

'(4) Nothing in this section shall be taken as preventing any person from qualifying to succeed a tenant in accordance with section 112 above where the tenant concerned has died and had himself succeeded from his spouse or from a joint tenancy with his spouse.'.

Mr. Betts: May I put on the record something that I forgot to say in my last contribution? I declare a potential interest in leasehold reform, in that I am a leaseholder. I declared that in Committee, and although my interest does not affect the new clause and amendment that we are discussing, I thought that it would be helpful to put the fact on the record.

New clause 24 and amendment No. 160 involve the issue of succession, which I raised in Committee. I did not get a satisfactory response from the Minister, but he promised the Committee that he would go away and consider how joint tenancies affected succession. The fact that he has not tabled an amendment on the subject implies that, although he could not find a reason for not tabling one, he failed to do so simply because the Government do not support the principle for which we are arguing.

That is a pity, because my new clause and amendment are an attempt to deal with the position of children who live for much of their lives with their parents, often so as to care for them, and with what happens to them when, when they are in their 40s or 50s and have lived in the family home all their lives, their parents die.

The perverse aspect is that if there are two parents and the father is the tenant but the mother dies first, the law as it stands allows the child to succeed to the tenancy, because there has not been a previous succession. But if the father dies, the mother succeeds to the tenancy and then the mother dies, the child cannot succeed automatically, because there has already been one succession. The child is potentially homeless, and can be evicted.

I do not say that that happens every time, but children in that position have no surety or guarantee that the succession will be theirs. That causes real concern both for the parents, who can often feel an element of guilt for having put the children in that position, and for the children, for whom there is a great element of uncertainty because when they lose their parents, they may also lose their home.

That difficulty has been compounded by the fact that joint tenancies are now much more usual in local authority properties. As the law stands, if there is a joint tenancy and one of the parents dies, the other parent succeeds as a sole tenant. Again, because of the way in which the law is written, the child cannot then have an automatic right to succeed to the tenancy. It cannot be right that, ultimately, accidents of history—such as which parent dies first, and whether there is a joint tenancy or a sole tenancy—decide whether the child has the right to succeed. That is not equitable.

No one argued in Committee that what I said was wrong, so this time I have tried to phrase the new clause and the amendment more narrowly, so that exclusions from the right of succession do not apply when, although there has been a previous succession, the tenancy has been passed only from one spouse to another, or to a spouse from a previous joint tenancy of both spouses. That seems to avoid the danger of drawing the provision too widely.

I hope that the Minister will rethink, and will accept the amendment, even at this late stage, not because I would get any personal credit thereby, but simply because there are so many people, especially elderly people, who are frightened and worried about what will happen to their children's home when they die, and so many children who do not have a guarantee that they can succeed to their parents' tenancy. In the interests of compassion and of fairness to those people, I hope that the Minister will reconsider.

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): The hon. Gentleman is talking about what should happen when there are exceptional circumstances; I presume that he does not envisage a sort of perpetual succession in normal circumstances. None the less, because of local authorities' need to make effective use of their stock, I do not believe that the one-succession rule should be abolished.

There has been considerable debate both inside and outside the Committee about whether succession rights should be extended to cover couples of the same sex who share a home, and we shall discuss that matter on a later amendment. I shall then suggest that the best approach to the difficult situation in which a person may lose his or her home because a tenant has died is for the local authority to grant a tenancy to the remaining person.

We propose to issue unequivocal guidance to local authorities recommending that course of action, which will be equally applicable to the position in which someone faces the loss of his or her home because the one-succession rule bites. I hope that, in the light of that assurance, which I shall be able to amplify on the later amendment, the hon. Gentleman will not feel the need to persist with his new clause and amendment.

Mr. Betts: I shall not push the new clause, but I am not totally satisfied with the Minister's answer. I realise that he will issue guidance, but I hope that, when he does, he will make it clear to authorities that they should include that right in their tenancy policies, up front. The right should not be given to people after their parents die; it should be available to them as a right, if local authorities put it in their policies, so that, before the unhappy event of their parents' death, people will have the certain knowledge that they will be secure in their tenancy. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

[Mr. Betts]

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 78

DETERMINATION OF REASONABLENESS OF SERVICE CHARGES

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 87, in page 52, line 10, at end insert—

'(6) No appeal shall lie to the Lands Tribunal from a decision of a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Act without the leave of the leasehold valuation tribunal concerned or the Lands Tribunal.

(7) On any such appeal—

(a) the Lands Tribunal may exercise any power available to the leasehold valuation tribunal in relation to the original matter, and

(b) an order of the Lands Tribunal may be enforced in the same way as an order of the leasehold valuation tribunal.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 88 to 91.

Mr. Clappison: The amendment would establish affordable justice through the leasehold valuation tribunals. It is balanced with preserved rights of appeal in limited but appropriate circumstances.

Mr. Raynsford: Given the Secretary of State's penchant for fantasy politics, perhaps it is appropriate to remind the House that the amendment was moved by the Opposition in Committee, and the Government opposed it. That was done partly on technical grounds raised by the judge in charge of the Lands Tribunal, Judge Bernard Marder, with whom I corresponded, concerning the tribunal's methods of working.

I am glad to see that the Government have had second thoughts and have responded to our pressure for affordable justice. We want to ensure that landlords cannot use their financial muscle to deter leaseholders from obtaining justice. Rights of appeal should be allowed in proper circumstances, but we believe that they should be subject to controls to prevent abuse of the system whereby rich freeholders can exercise undue influence on the outcome, and deter leaseholders on modest incomes from pursuing their claims.

We therefore welcome the amendment, but we do not like to let it pass without ensuring that hon. Members are aware of its origin and ancestry, and of the Opposition's contribution to the measure that will now reach the statute book.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 88, in page 52, line 29, leave out 'about fees' and insert 'under this section'.

No. 89, in page 52, line 43, after 'which' insert

', unless the order contains only such provision as is mentioned in subsection (1),'.

No. 90, in page 53, line 4, after 'or' insert

'the Lands Tribunal, or in connection with'.

No. 91, in page 53, line 18, at end insert—

'( ) in the case of proceedings before the Lands Tribunal, to the tribunal;'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 80

APPOINTMENT OF MANAGER BY THE COURT

Amendment made: No. 92, in page 54, line 21, at end insert—

'(ac) where the court is satisfied—

(i) that the landlord has failed to comply with any relevant provision of a code of practice approved by the Secretary of State under section 87 of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 (codes of management practice), and

(ii) that it is just and convenient to make the order in all the circumstances of the case;'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 81

RIGHT TO SELF-MANAGEMENT

Amendment made: No. 93, in page 54, line 42, leave out from beginning to end of line 21 on page 56.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Schedule 5

ASSESSMENT OF THE RELATIVE VALUE OF THE LANDLORD'S INTERESTS IN THE PREMISES AND OF THE QUALIFYING TENANT'S INTERESTS IN THE PREMISES: SCHEDULE INSERTED AFTER SCHEDULE 1 TO THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT 1987

Amendment made: No. 140, in page 145, line 17, leave out from beginning to end of line 31 on page 146.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Schedule 6

TERMS OF MANAGEMENT LEASE: SCHEDULE INSERTED AFTER SCHEDULE 1A TO THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT 1987

Amendment made: No. 141, in page 146, line 32, leave out from beginning to end of line 45.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 82

VALUATION: COLLECTIVE ENFRANCHISEMENT

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 94, in page 56, line 37, leave out '4' and insert '5'.

In Committee, we promised to reconsider the level of fine for failing to offer tenants the right of first refusal. On reflection, we agreed that it should be raised to level 5, which is the highest point on the standard scale.

8 pm

Mr. Raynsford: I will not detain the House, but again I would not wish this opportunity to pass without the Government acknowledging that it was the Opposition who raised the issue in Committee. We welcome the increase but remain sceptical about whether it is an adequate penalty for the offence. The circumstances that led to this involved the failure of some very large landowners to comply with their obligations to offer the right of first refusal to their leaseholders. For them, a fine of £2,500 or even £5,000 is a relatively trivial sum.

We proposed a more effective alternative sanction: the withdrawal of the right to demand service charges and ground rent while they were in breach of their obligations.

Nevertheless, we are pleased that the Government have recognised that the penalty should be increased, although we notice that they propose only that some of the largest and wealthiest landowners in the country should be liable to a fine of exactly the same amount as the humblest homeless person pays, who fails to give accurate information in making a claim for housing under parts VI and VII. There is an extraordinary incongruity about those levels of penalty. I leave hon. Members to draw their own conclusions about where the Government's priorities lie.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 86

RESTRICTION ON RECOVERY OF POSSESSION ON EXPIRY OR TERMINATION

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 58, in page 59, line 18, after first 'the' insert 'immediately preceding'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 59, 60A, 61A and 146.

Mr. Clappison: The amendments are concerned with the clarity of wording of the established minimum period of six months for an assured shorthold tenancy. We sought to enshrine that period through the Bill's previous wording, which had attracted some criticism in respect of its clarity. I hope that this wording is clearer and that it will win more plaudits.

Mr. Raynsford: I invite the House to judge what the Minister has just said. The clause as previously worded read:

"where the replacement tenancy came into being on the coming to an end of a tenancy which was not a replacement tenancy, to the tenancy on the coming to an end of which the replacement tenancy came into being, and".

That is being amended to read:

"where the replacement tenancy came into being on the coming to an end of a tenancy which was not a replacement tenancy to the immediately preceding tenancy on the coming to an end of which the replacement tenancy came into being, and".

I invite the Minister to explain whether that achieves any greater clarity and whether that gobbledegook will be understood by anyone other than the clerks and parliamentary draftsmen who concocted that extraordinary phrase.

Mr. Betts: Can the Minister confirm that, after the initial six-month period, even under the revised wording, there is no effective security for tenants and that they can be evicted from a property at a moment's notice by the landlord?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman may know that that is the established situation and has been since the regime came into being. Assured shorthold tenancies were earlier praised by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford).

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 59, in page 59, line 18, leave out from 'tenancy' to ', and' in line 19.

No. 60A, in page 59, line 21, leave out

'on the coming to an end of which'

and insert 'immediately preceding'.

No. 61A, in page 59, line 22, leave out 'came into being'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Clause 88

MANDATORY POSSESSION FOR NON-PAYMENT OF RENT: REDUCTION IN ARREARS REQUIRED

Mr. Raynsford: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 60, line 5, leave out 'eight' and insert 'more than thirteen.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 12, in page 60, line 7, leave out 'two' and insert 'more than three'.

Mr. Raynsford: Amendment No. 11 deals with the mandatory ground for possession for assured tenants. The Government propose to reduce the period covered by that ground from three months to two. That means that a tenant who is in arrears of only two months can be subject to a mandatory ground for possession against which there is no defence. I stress that there is an additional discretionary ground open to landlords to seek possession where there are any arrears. The opportunity to seek possession is available in any case. We are sceptical about the reduction of the period of the mandatory ground because it could lead to tenants suffering injustice through no fault of theirs.

In Committee, we highlighted the number of people who do not get their housing benefit entitlement in time. Sadly, some local authorities are less efficient than others and do not deliver it in the 14 days in which they are supposed to process claims. In some cases, they take several months to process claims. A tenant left waiting for several months for housing benefit who had no means of paying the rent would soon fall foul of this mandatory ground and be liable to lose his or her home. That would be an injustice.

We tabled amendments in Committee, but unfortunately the Government did not see fit to accept them. We therefore raise the issue again tonight. In view of the pressure on the timetable and to allow us make progress, and being aware that the issues will need to be revisited soon, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I beg to move amendment No. 37, in page 60, line 7, at end add

'and

(c) at the end of Ground 8 there shall be added—

"Provided that no order for possession shall be made under this Ground if the Court is satisfied that prior to the date of hearing the tenant has made a claim for housing benefit in respect of the period to which the arrears relate in whole or in part and which has not been finally determined by the local housing authority.".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 38, in page 60, line 7, at end add

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

'and

(c) at the end of Ground 8 there shall be added—

"Provided that no order for possession shall be made under this Ground if the Court is satisfied that the tenant has an arguable set–off against the unpaid rent of an amount of liquidated or unliquidated damages capable of reducing the rent outstanding to below the amounts claimed.".'.

Mr. Hughes: The amendments are the flesh on the bones of the argument that the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) was seeking to attribute to his amendments which were considered first. They are realistic and important. Even at this late stage, I ask the Minister to accede to them.

The amendments deal with possession in assured shorthold tenancies, and the problem that often arises of people who have not had their housing benefit paid. Many hon. Members will have met constituents who have faced possession proceedings when the whole of the arrears is attributable to a failure to pay housing benefit.

Amendment No. 37 gives the complete guarantee that was sought in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock). It states:

"no order for possession shall be made . . . if the Court is satisfied that prior to the date of hearing the tenant has made a claim for housing benefit in respect of the period to which the arrears relate . . . and which has not finally been determined".

If an application has been made, a person should not be at risk of losing his or her home while the bureaucracy is grinding, as it often does, exceeding slow.

Amendment No. 38 deals with a similar but arguably slightly less common occurrence, and says that, likewise, there should not be an order for possession if the court is satisfied that the tenant has a set-off against unpaid rent, perhaps for damages for disrepair. All sorts of situations can arise in which it is clear that there is a claim in the other direction that would reduce the rent arrears. It would be unjust that possession proceedings in such cases should be taken to a conclusion. That is especially important for constituencies in which assured shorthold tenancies are now common.

I hope that the Minister will be at least positive, and possibly generous, and make life easy by accepting both amendments. We could then both sit down and move on.

Mr. Clappison: I should like to be generous, but the issue was fully canvassed in Committee. The starting point needs to be that the order for possession will not be made immediately after two months. In practice, it will be a longer period, because, as the hon. Gentleman may know, an extra period of two weeks is required after proceedings commence before a hearing can take place. When one has to wait a little while for a court hearing, it will be longer than that.

I think that it was established in Committee that, in practice, the problem of housing benefit would be dealt with in that fairly lengthy period—somewhere in excess of three months. I respectfully remind the hon. Gentleman that, under social security legislation, housing benefit claims should be processed within the statutory 14 days of all the required information being received. If the deadline is not met, local authorities have a statutory duty to make—

Mrs. Maddock: That is the point—it is the getting together of the information so that the claims can be processed within the 14 days that is the problem. We discussed that in Committee, and I thought that the Minister understood our concerns.

Mr. Clappison: If the hon. Lady would allow me to continue, I will deal with her point.

Where the delay is not the fault of the tenant and the deadline is not met, local authorities have a statutory duty to make payments on account. We explored that issue fairly fully in Committee.

Mr. Simon Hughes: If the Minister is going to be bold enough to resist the amendments, can he at least ensure that his colleagues in other Departments instruct and inform all courts of the statutory duties, so that no court is in error about the fact that there is an obligation on someone to pay up? That would at least alleviate the problem.

Mr. Clappison: I will reflect on what the hon. Gentleman has said. I should have thought that, as a matter of basic knowledge, courts would be aware of their statutory duties.

On amendment No. 38, to amend ground 8 to require the court to offset liquidated and unliquidated damages against rent arrears would encourage tenants to counter-claim for damages due to disrepair in all ground 8 cases. That would lead to long and protracted disputes about the cause and extent of the damages claimed.

I have listened carefully to hon. Members' arguments, but the existing state of the law caters sufficiently well for the question of repairs and rent that is owed.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister has not persuaded me. On the first issue, a period of time might in theory be wonderful, but the reality of the world we live in is that the system does not deliver even if one extends it for one, two or three months. I am afraid that we are not satisfied, so I shall allow the House to resolve the matter in the usual way.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 91

ASSURED PERIODIC TENANCIES: SAME SEX PARTNERS

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 26, in page 60, leave out lines 29 to 33.

The outcome of our discussions in Committee on succession rights for same-sex partners left us with a Bill that faced two ways. According to the amendment that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) moved successfully, a couple of the same sex in an assured tenancy living together in a relationship corresponding to that of man and wife—I think that that indicates a homosexual relationship, which I assume was her intention—enjoy the right of succession when one partner dies. By contrast, a couple in the same position with a secure tenancy—that is, with a local authority—would not have that right, because a parallel amendment to that end failed. Clearly, that is not a sustainable position, and that is why the Government have tabled amendment No. 26, to delete clause 91 and put assured and secure tenants on the same footing.

We have taken that course rather than resolving the matter by introducing a clause similar to clause 91 to cover secure tenants, because we are concerned about the approach taken in clause 91 and feel that there are better ways to resolve the issues.

The law as it stood, before clause 91 was introduced, provided protection to adults of the same sex who planned to share their home on a long-term basis. Under the provisions of the Housing Acts 1985 and 1988, local authorities, housing associations and private landlords have the power to grant joint tenancies, which means that, when one tenant dies, the remaining tenant can keep his home.

That provides a distinct advantage over the rather narrow provisions of clause 91, which relate only to those same-sex couples who live as if they were man and wife. When the tenant dies in such a relationship, the remaining partner can find him or herself in a difficult position. The problem can be no less acute for those left on their own in other types of household.

A person may have acted for a tenant as an unpaid live-in carer, or a couple of elderly women, or men, may live together for companionship, or perhaps for economy. A joint tenancy would mean that a person left in that situation would not, at a time of great grief, have the added burden of worrying about losing his or her home. Clause 91, on the other hand, would deal only with the situation in which the tenant and the remaining resident had had a sexual relationship.

A joint tenancy is the better solution, but there may be situations where a person has been sharing a household with someone else who is a sole tenant but for some reason has not sought to have the tenancy converted to a joint one. When the tenant dies, the other person will not have the right to take up that tenancy. In such cases, if the person had been living with the tenant for the year before the tenant's death, had been looking after the tenant, or had, or accepted, responsibility for his or her dependants, we would normally expect the local authority to grant the tenancy to that person, or find them suitable alternative accommodation.

Another clear advantage in giving local authorities the flexibility to resolve those situations is that it does not lose sight of their primary obligation to meet housing need in their areas by making the most effective and equitable use of all the housing stock at their disposal.

8.15 pm

There has been concern about a lack of uniformity among local authorities in how they respond to such situations. I propose to deal with that by issuing guidance shortly, which will set out unambiguously the Government's view that, taking into account the need to make the best use of their stock, local authorities should normally provide—those will be the words that will appear in the guidance—for the type of cases that I have described by granting either joint tenancies or a further tenancy where a sole tenant has died. That will be unequivocal guidance, and it will not be confined to couples with a sexual relationship. We will pay close attention to the way in which local authorities implement it.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I am grateful to my hon. Friend as what he has said is helpful. May I press him a little further on the guidance? I assume that it will be published guidance to all local authorities. Can he say when we can expect it to be issued?

Mr. Curry: It will be published guidance to all local authorities, and it will be issued before the Whitsun recess.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): My hon. Friend will know that I am new to this matter. I do not see any reference to sexual relationships in the lines that he is proposing to leave out. Is that relationship understood, or is it in some other part of the legislation?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend will find that the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate referred to people living in a relationship corresponding to that of husband and wife. I drew the conclusion that that could bear only one interpretation. My concern was not to exclude those circumstances but to widen them, so that people living in the sort of relationships that I have described would also be covered by the scope of my proposals. I am proposing a more inclusive alternative, not an exclusive one.

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am grateful to the Minister, and also to the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) for forwarding me a copy of the guidance that the Government intend—I presume—to forward to local authorities. I must be honest with the Minister. We have been given that promise before. It was made to the Standing Committee on the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Bill in 1993. As we all know, nothing has happened.

Mr. Curry: I repeat here in the Chamber and in a full sitting of the House that the guidance will be issued before this Whitsun recess.

Ms Jackson: I am grateful for that assurance, which will appear in the public record. Even so, such guidance as has been drafted and will go to local authorities causes me concern in certain areas, not least the final paragraph of paragraph 6, which states:

"the local authority should normally grant a tenancy to the remaining person or persons, either in the same home or in suitable alternative accommodation".

This has caused me some concern.

We are discussing situations in which there have been relationships. When I introduced the amendment, I said that there must have been a stable relationship in the domestic residence for a year—that the rules that at present apply to heterosexual relationships must apply to single-sex relationships. We have been reassured that the guidelines will be sent to all local authorities. The words

"either in the same home or in suitable alternative accommodation" cause me some concern. No doubt relationships will have been established within the community. For example, in a same-sex relationship where both partners are female, there may be children involved, and they may attend the local school. There will be disturbance and disorientation for the children if they are moved to another location. Human relationships are created within a particular environment.

From personal experience, I know that some gay people suffer abuse because of their relationships. The partner who is left may be moved from an area where gay relationships are acknowledged and accepted, and where gay people are not abused, into an area where they are abused—I am talking not only about physical abuse, but about abuse in which their residence is attacked, with bricks thrown through windows and people hammering on doors in the middle of the night. This is something that causes me concern.

[Ms Jackson]

Is it possible for the Government to redraft the guideline or for them to be more precise about what they regard as "suitable alternative accommodation"? It has been my experience that, when people have physically to move from what has been regarded as their home—coming, as it invariably does, on the loss of a loved one—it creates extreme difficulties.

I am reassured by the Minister's assurance that the guidelines will be sent to local authorities before Whitsun this year. Is that a categorical assurance?

However, I remind the Minister that I am concerned about the paragraph to which I referred. Are the local authorities required to inform the Secretary of State that they have received the guidelines and that they are proceeding to implement them? Will local authorities be allowed a period before they regard the guidance as absolute in their treatment of these situations?

I understand that it has been the Government's intention for more than three years—even though the present Secretary of State has significantly failed to implement it—that local authorities should not be able to draw out these guidelines. Local authorities should guarantee that they will implement them.

Mr. Ashby: I congratulate the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) on tabling her amendment in Committee, and on bringing it to the attention of the House. It resulted in a flurry of activity, which has produced some guidelines. The guidelines are not just good, they are excellent, and I am grateful for them. It is my experience in local government that local authorities will adhere to them, so that does not worry me at all.

However, I am worried about a number of things. We have withdrawn the transference of a lease in an assured tenancy that is in the private sector. I hate labels, but it seems to me that we are all looking for labels—especially the gutter press, the tabloids, which are always happy to talk about gay rights, and gay this and that. However, we are not only talking about gay relationships. If the gutter press wants to look for labels, perhaps it ought to think more about care in the community, about carers, and about carers who have been carers for a long time.

People start as carers by leaving their home and leaving it empty for a number of months. The work continues, and a year may stretch into two years, so they give up their previous home and live with the person for whom they are caring. Because the person is being cared for, they may survive for 10 years or more. They develop a close relationship. When the person dies, the carer is left bereft and saddened by the loss of what is effectively a partner—they might be the same sex—and they are also left homeless.

I heard about such a case on a radio programme I took part in recently. The person's name was Mark—I shall not give his full name. Mark was in a relationship with a man for 30 years. He had the most tremendous accident 12 years ago that left him a quadriplegic. For 10 years, he was cared for as a total quadriplegic. He died in 1994. Mark has lost the person for whom he cared—his partner—and he is now losing his home. Anyone who heard him speak could not be unaffected. I know that the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) heard the radio programme. He could not be unaffected, as I was not unaffected, by the depth of feeling expressed by this person—the bereavement and the loss, and the prospect of losing the home that they had shared for 30 years. I was very moved by it.

I think that people in this situation have had a pretty raw deal from Governments—not from our Government—over many years. They are judged by moral standards rather than factual standards. We hold ourselves up as great moralists, and we think that we should be able to judge people in this way—I do not know why we should; I certainly do not. I suppose, after the judgement of the jury in my libel action, I cannot. Putting that aside, I will still speak out. I do not care a bit about the press; it can say and do what it likes in tomorrow's papers; I do not care a damn about it.

I ask the Minister to look at a Bill that deals with landlords and tenants to see whether this amendment—an amendment giving fairness, justice and equal opportunity—cannot be put into it. The Conservative party has always stood for fairness and for justice. The Secretary of State said that, if there is one unfairness, it is one too many for him. I agree—one injustice is one too many.

I think we are being unfair—and ours is the party that stands for fairness and justice. I hope that, when we deal with a landlord and tenant Bill—not a social housing Bill, such as this Bill—we can have some sensible measures to deal with the real world in which we live, not a make-believe world. Perhaps we could reinstate some of the measures that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate so properly put forward, so that the Bill covers assured tenancies as well as social housing.

I am content that we have achieved this much on social housing, and I rest on that. I hope that the Minister and his Department can see that, in future, we will have to go for fairness and for justice. This is not only a homosexual matter—it covers carers, maiden sisters, bachelor brothers and all sorts of relationships. It is a comprehensive issue—it does not relate only to the one issue that the tabloid press wants to raise.

Mr. Chris Davies: I welcome the Minister's approach to this matter—his attitude is sympathetic and sensitive—but his proposals about the issue of guidelines are hardly the same as clarifying the situation and giving the approach that will take the force of law.

Local authorities do prepare their own allocation policies; there is a great deal of variance in them, and different interpretations will be applied in different situations. It is suggested that the guidelines will provide that local authorities will wish to be assured of the likely continuance of such a partnership where no joint tenancy has been established, and assured that there are no adverse implications from the joint tenancy for good use of authorities' housing stock or for authorities' ability to continue to provide for housing need.

A homophobic authority could drive a coach and horses through such guidelines, and it would be very difficult for the partner of a tenant who had died to prove to sceptical housing officers, backed up by a local authority unsympathetic to such problems, that the partnership would have been likely to continue. Such guidelines are not strong enough to deal with the problems that, I acknowledge, the Minister understands, and which were well expressed by the hon. Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby).

8.30 pm

Is there not a conflict with part VI of the Bill? Perhaps the Minister will explain. I understand that part VI says that, unless one is a tenant, one will be housed only from the register. Surely the guidelines suggest that the provisions in part VI would be overtaken by the words of a Department of the Environment circular.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I stand in solidarity with my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby), who I believe spoke for many in the House tonight. I welcome what my hon. Friend the Minister has said about the guidance, and welcome the time scale he offered to the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson). My interest in this matter comes from those who may be in the category of elderly orphans—people who have looked after their parents without moving away from home or who may have moved back—and companions, as well as those who may have had a different type of relationship.

I think that the House is doing well tonight.

Mr. Raynsford: I shall briefly raise two points arising from the Minister's comments. First, he was slightly disingenuous when he said that it was necessary to vote down the amendment that was made in Committee, because it would be inconsistent without a similar provision applying to secure tenancies. The truth is that the Government themselves chose to vote down the parallel amendment that was moved to ensure consistency between secure tenancies on one side and assured tenancies in the private sector, so the problem is entirely of their own making.

Secondly, the reason that there has been considerable scepticism about the pledge of new guidance on this issue is partly to do with the timetable. I remind the Minister that it is now more than three years since Lord Strathclyde gave a written answer, confirming that the Government intended "shortly" to issue guidance on the subject. The Government have been a very long time indeed moving on this, so we welcome the assurance that there will be guidance before Whitsun.

I am also anxious about the contents of the guidance. Without having it before us, I do not wish to draw firm conclusions, but there is a fear that the guidance will not give the same legal rights and the same reassurance.

Mr. Michael Brown: My hon. Friend the Minister was kind enough to meet my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) and me last week. We have not been easily satisfied with the guidance. I can assure the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) that the guideline that it is proposed to publish is pretty tough, and I am reasonably satisfied that it meets his points.

Mr. Raynsford: I am pleased to hear that from the hon. Gentleman, who I know has been especially worried about that issue and has spoken forcefully about it in the House. Our scepticism is partly based on the fact that we have not seen the guidance; I am delighted to know that he and some of his hon. Friends have, but we have not. Our scepticism is also partly to do with the difference between guidance and statutory rights. In the absence of a statutory backing, there will be a differential position for same-sex partners as against others; there is an issue of principle there.

Nevertheless, some progress is being made. The Minister has guaranteed that guidance will be issued, so this long fight for justice is at least moving in the right direction. We shall remain very sceptical indeed until we have seen positive and concrete results from what the Minister proposes.

Mr. Curry: Short of carving it on the Dispatch Box, I cannot do more than repeat that we shall issue guidance before Whitsuntide. It will be implemented by the local authorities immediately. I am not holding it back until we issue a general guidance flowing from the Housing Bill.

There is nothing sinister about the idea of suitable alternative accommodation. I had in mind the position when someone wished to move to smaller accommodation—easier to heat, with lower costs—which sometimes happens when someone's partner is deceased. Local authorities will be sensible about that. It seeks to embrace different circumstances.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby) for pointing out that this has a wide application in many circumstances. My hon. Friends the Members for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) and for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) have pressed me on this, as they will acknowledge. I hope that they feel that we have moved sensibly to deal with people in those circumstances, irrespective of what their sexuality happens to be or the specific circumstances in which they find themselves.

I am not interested in categorising certain people; I am interested in trying to deal with the position that exists, and doing so satisfactorily and fairly, in a way that is seen to be humane by the local authorities. We shall ensure that the guidance is implemented in that way.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 9

CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Amendments made: No. 146, in page 149, line 32 after 'of' insert 'Part I of'.

No. 21, in page 151, line 38, leave out from beginning to 'subsection' in line 39 and insert 'In'.

No. 22, in line 39, leave out from '(3)(d)(i),' to end of line 40.

No. 23, in line 41, after 'inserted' insert 'at the end'.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

Clause 94

COLLECTIVE ENFRANCHISEMENT: EXCLUDED PREMISES

Mr. Gummer: I beg to move amendment No. 60B, in page 61, leave out lines 21 to 23.

[Mr. Gummer]

The amendment would delete clause 94. That clause was successfully moved by the Opposition; it would raise the limit for possible enfranchisement of blocks of flats from 10 per cent. commercial use to 25 per cent. I know that there are significant anxieties about that. I think we have mitigated them considerably by the changes that we have already made, in the form of the management improvements that the House has been pleased to support.

There should be a balance between the rights and the opportunities of the leaseholders and the question of commercial premises. Commercial premises—which are, in a mansion block, the bottom of the block—often provide great difficulty. If they are very successful, the price of the leasehold enfranchisement is so great that it is especially difficult for people to enfranchise. Most of them are not like that. They are often the sort of shops in which it is quite difficult to create a really decent retail environment. I am very keen on encouraging people to do more for these shops and improve them. I am therefore especially concerned about this matter.

I shall give two possible examples of what would happen if the 10 per cent. limit were raised. In the first example, the shops are very prosperous and expanding their trade. The residential leaseholders would have to pay a very high price to buy the freehold interest; in most cases, they would be unable to afford it, so raising the limit would have no effect. In the second example, the retail businesses are not doing so well and are struggling to keep afloat. The price would be more reasonable for the residential leaseholders, but enfranchisement might affect the viability of the marginal businesses and, on some occasions, drive it over the edge.

I am trying very hard to reinvigorate our city centres and groups of shops. I believe that it would be a mistake to increase the limit, and that it would strike against the idea of reinvigoration. I hope that the House will agree that we got it right in 1993 in setting the proportion at 10 per cent. and that we should not be contemplating raising it now. I believe that the damage that would be done to shops that were not very profitable would not be outweighed by those who would enfranchise successfully. When the shops were profitable, people would find it difficult to pay the leasehold price and they would be left in the position that they are in now. I hope that the House will agree that it is not a sensible way forward.

Mr. Raynsford: We have heard from the Secretary of State the same catalogue that he gave earlier this evening denying leaseholders the opportunity to enfranchise by simply proposing to reverse the gains that were made in Committee earlier this month.

I remind the Secretary of State that the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 puts the threshold for non-residential accommodation at 50 per cent. In 1992-93, the hon. Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) forecast incorrectly that it would be accepted at 20 per cent. He was conned by Ministers who persuaded him, after he had given a forceful speech in favour of increasing the percentage, that they would look sympathetically at his proposals. They conned the hon. Gentleman then in the same way as the Government have conned leaseholders today.

We deplore the way in which the Government are once again betraying leaseholders' interests through the amendment and trying to destroy the good work that was done in Committee. Ministers might like to reflect on comments of the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration at the end of the Committee, when he described it as a very constructive Committee which reflected well on the British parliamentary system. It can hardly reflect well on the British parliamentary system if the Government seek to reverse on the Floor of the House amendment after amendment that was passed in Committee.

This is a discreditable move by the Government for which they will pay. Many leaseholders who live in blocks of flats that contain a small element of non-residential accommodation will be denied the opportunity to buy their freeholds. They will know that the Government have taken that right from them, and they will blame the Government at the next general election for that denial of their rights.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 95

ENFRANCHISEMENT AND COLLECTIVE ENFRANCHISEMENT: QUALIFYING TENANTS

Amendment made: No. 152, in page 61, leave out lines 24 to 34.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

New schedule 2

LOW RENT TEST: EXTENSION OF RIGHTS

Right to enfranchisement

1. In the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, after section 1A there shall be inserted—

"Additional right to enfranchisement only in case of houses whose rent exceeds applicable limit under section 4

1AA.—(1) Where—

(a) section 1(1) above would apply in the case of the tenant of a house but for the fact that the tenancy is not a tenancy at a low rent, and

(b) the tenancy falls within subsection (2) below and is not an excluded tenancy,

this Part of this Act shall have effect to confer on the tenant the same right to acquire the freehold of the house and premises as would be conferred by section 1(1) above if it were a tenancy at a low rent.

(2) A tenancy falls within this subsection if—

(a) it is granted for a term of years certain exceeding fifty years, whether or not it is (or may become) terminable before the end of that term by notice given by or to the tenant or by re-entry, forfeiture or otherwise,

(b) it is for a term fixed by law under a grant with a covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal, unless it is a tenancy by sub-demise from one which is not a tenancy which falls within this subsection,

(c) it is a tenancy taking effect under section 149(6) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (leases terminable after a death or marriage), or

(d) it is a tenancy which—

(i) is or has been granted for a term of years certain not exceeding fifty years, but with a covenant or obligation for renewal without payment of a premium (but not for perpetual renewal), and

(ii) is or has been once or more renewed so as to bring to more than fifty years the total of the terms granted (including any interval between the end of a tenancy and the grant of a renewal).

(3) A tenancy is an excluded tenancy for the purposes of subsection (1) above if—

(a) the house which the tenant occupies under the tenancy is in an area designated for the purposes of this provision as a rural area by order made by the Secretary of State,

(b) the freehold of that house is owned together with adjoining land which is not occupied for residential purposes, and

(c) the tenancy was granted on or before the day on which section [Low rent test: extension of rights] of the Housing Act 1996 comes into force.

(4) Where this Part of this Act applies as if there were a single tenancy of property comprised in two or more separate tenancies, then, if each of the separate tenancies falls within subsection (2) above, this section shall apply as if the single tenancy did so.

(5) The power to make an order under subsection (3) above shall be exercisable by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament."

2.—(1) In consequence of paragraph 1 above, the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 shall be amended as follows.

(2) In section 1(3A)(b) (extension of rights not to apply to existing lettings by charitable housing trusts), after "1A" there shall be inserted ", 1AA".

(3) In section 3(3) (provision for aggregation of successive tenancies), after "this Part of this Act" there shall be inserted ", except section 1AA,".

(4) In section 9(1C) (price payable by tenant on enfranchisement by virtue of section 1A or 1B), after "1A" there shall be inserted ", 1AA".

(5) In section 9A(1) (compensation payable where right to enfranchisement arises by virtue of section 1A or 1B), after "1A" there shall be inserted ", 1AA".

(6) In section 32A(1)(b) (extensions to right to enfranchisement not to apply in relation to existing tenancies of property transferred for public benefit), at the end there shall be inserted "or if section 1AA above were not in force".

(7) In section 37(4) (treatment for the purposes of Part I of tenancy granted to continue as a periodical tenancy after the expiration of a term of years certain), after "this Part of this Act" there shall be inserted ", except section 1AA,".

(8) In Part II of Schedule 3 (procedural provisions), in paragraph 6 (which makes provision about the contents of a tenant's notice under Part I), after sub-paragraph (1) there shall be inserted—

"(1A) Where the tenant gives the notice by virtue of section 1AA of this Act, sub-paragraph (1) above shall have effect with the substitution for paragraph (b) of—

"(b) such particulars of the tenancy as serve to identify the instrument creating the tenancy and show that the tenancy is one in relation to which section 1AA(1) of this Act has effect to confer a right to acquire the freehold of the house and premises;"."

(9) In that Part of that Schedule, in paragraph 7(4) (admission in landlord's notice of tenant's right to have freehold to be binding on landlord, so far as relating to matters mentioned in section 1(1)(a) and (b)), for "mentioned in section 1(1)(a) and (b) of this Act" there shall be substituted "relevant to the existence of that right".

Right to collective enfranchisement

3.—(1) Chapter I of Part I of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 (collective enfranchisement in case of tenants of flats) shall be amended as follows.

(2) Section 5 (qualifying tenants) shall be amended as follows—

(a) in subsection (1) (which defines a qualifying tenant as a tenant of a flat under a long lease at a low rent), for "at a low rent" there shall be substituted "which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term", and

(b) in subsection (2)(c) (which excludes from the definition a tenant under a lease granted in breach of the terms of a superior lease which is not a long lease at a low rent), after "rent" there shall be inserted "or for a particularly long term".

(3) After section 8 there shall be inserted—

"Meaning of "particularly long term"

8A.—(1) For the purposes of this Chapter a long lease is for a particularly long term if—

(a) it is granted for a term of years certain exceeding 50 years, whether or not it is (or may become) terminable before the end of that term by notice given by or to the tenant or by re-entry, forfeiture or otherwise,

(b) it is for a term fixed by law under a grant with a covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal (other than a lease by sub-demise from one which is not for a particularly long term),

(c) it takes effect under section 149(6) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (leases terminable after a death or marriage), or

(d) it is a lease which—

(i) is or has been granted for a term of years certain not exceeding 50 years, but with a covenant or obligation for renewal without payment of a premium (but not for perpetual renewal), and

(ii) is or has been renewed on one or more occasions so as to bring to more than 50 years the total of the terms granted (including any interval between the end of a lease and the grant of a renewal).

(2) A long lease which does not fall within subsection (1) above shall nonetheless be treated for the purposes of this Chapter as being for a particularly long term if it is a long lease by virtue of paragraph (c) or (d) of section 7(1).

(3) Where this Chapter applies as if there were a single lease of property comprised in two or more separate leases, then, if each of the separate leases is for a particularly long term, this Chapter shall apply as if the single lease were for such a term."

(4) In section 13(3)(e) (particulars to be included in initial notice which relevant to whether person a qualifying tenant), in sub-paragraph (ii), for "a lease at a low rent" there shall be substituted "at a low rent or for a particularly long term".

Right to new lease

4.—(1) Chapter II of that Part (individual right of tenant of flat to acquire new lease) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In section 39(3) (provisions of Chapter I which apply for the purposes of Chapter II), at the end of paragraph (c) there shall be inserted ", and

(d) section 8A,".

(3) In section 42(3) (particulars to be included in notice by qualifying tenant of claim to exercise right), in paragraph (b)(iii), there shall be inserted at the end "or, in accordance with section 8A (as that section so applies), a lease for a particularly long term".

5.—(1) In Chapter VII of that Part (general), section 94 (Crown land) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (3) (disapplication of restriction imposed by section 3(2) of the Crown Estate Act 1961 on term for which lease may be granted by Crown Estate Commissioners), in paragraph (a), for "at a low rent" there shall be substituted "which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term".

(3) In subsection (4) (power to shadow statutory rights), for "at a low rent" there shall be substituted "which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term".

(4) For subsection (12) there shall be substituted—

"(12) For the purposes of this section "long lease which is at a low rent or for a particularly long term" shall be construed in accordance with sections 7, 8 and 8A."." —[Mr. Gummer.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New schedule 1

TEXT OF PART II OF THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT 1987, AS AMENDED

PART II

APPOINTMENT OF MANAGERS BY LEASEHOLD VALUATION TRIBUNAL

Tenant's right to apply to tribunal for appointment of manager

21.—(1) The tenant of a flat contained in any premises to which this Part applies may, subject to the following provisions of this Part, apply to a leasehold valuation tribunal for an order under section 24 appointing a manager to act in relation to those premises.

(2) Subject to subsection (3), this Part applies to premises consisting of the whole or part of a building if the building or part contains two or more flats.

(3) This Part does not apply to any such premises at a time when—

(a) the interest of the landlord in the premises is held by an exempt landlord or a resident landlord, or

(b) the premises are included within the functional land of any charity.

(4) An application for an order under section 24 may be made—

(a) jointly by tenants of two or more flats if they are each entitled to make such an application by virtue of this section, and

(b) in respect of two or more premises to which this Part applies;

and, in relation to any such joint application as is mentioned in paragraph (a), references in this Part to a single tenant shall be construed accordingly.

(5) Where the tenancy of a flat contained in any such premises is held by joint tenants, an application for an order under section 24 in respect of those premises may be made by any one or more of those tenants.

(6) An application to the court for it to exercise in relation to any premises any jurisdiction to appoint a receiver or manager shall not be made by a tenant (in his capacity as such) in any circumstances in which an application could be made by him for an order under section 24 appointing a manager to act in relation to those premises.

(7) References in this Part to a tenant do not include references to a tenant under a tenancy to which Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 applies.

Preliminary notice by tenant

22.—(1) Before an application for an order under section 24 is made in respect of any premises to which this Part applies by a tenant of a flat contained in those premises, a notice under this section must (subject to subsection (3)) be served on the landlord by the tenant.

(2) A notice under this section must—

(a) specify the tenant's name, the address of his flat and an address in England and Wales (which may be the address of his flat) at which the landlord may serve notices, including notices in proceedings, on him in connection with this Part;

(b) state that the tenant intends to make an application for an order under section 24 to be made by a leasehold valuation tribunal in respect of such premises to which this Part applies as are specified in the notice, but (if paragraph (d) is applicable) that he will not do so if the landlord complies with the requirement specified in pursuance of that paragraph;

(c) specify the grounds on which the tribunal would be asked to make such an order and the matters that would be relied on by the tenant for the purpose of establishing those grounds;

(d) where those matters are capable of being remedied by the landlord, require the landlord, within such reasonable period as is specified in the notice, to take such steps for the purpose of remedying them as are so specified; and

(e) contain such information (if any) as the Secretary of State may by regulations prescribe.

(3) A leasehold valuation tribunal may (whether on the hearing of an application for an order under section 24 or not) by order dispense with the requirement to serve a notice under this section in a case where it is satisfied that it would not be reasonably practicable to serve such a notice on the landlord, but the tribunal may, when doing so, direct that such other notices are served, or such other steps are taken, as it thinks fit.

(4) In a case where—

(a) a notice under this section has been served on the landlord, and

(b) his interest in the premises specified in pursuance of subsection (2)(b) is subject to a mortgage, the landlord shall, as soon as is reasonably practicable after receiving the notice, serve on the mortgagee a copy of the notice.

Application to tribunal for appointment of manager

23.—(1) No application for an order under section 24 shall be made to a leasehold valuation tribunal unless—

(a) in a case where a notice has been served under section 22, either—

(i) the period specified in pursuance of paragraph (d) of subsection (2) of that section has expired without the landlord having taken the steps that he was required to take in pursuance of that provision, or

(ii) that paragraph was not applicable in the circumstances of the case; or

(b) in a case where the requirement to serve such a notice has been dispensed with by an order under subsection (3) of that section, either—

(i) any notices required to be served, and any other steps required to be taken, by virtue of the order have been served or (as the case may be) taken, or

(ii) no direction was given by the tribunal when making the order.

(2) Procedure regulations shall make provision—

(a) for requiring notice of an application for an order under section 24 in respect of any premises to be served on such descriptions of persons as may be specified in the rules; and

(b) for enabling persons served with any such notice to be joined as parties to the proceedings.

Appointment of manager by the tribunal

24.—(1) A leasehold valuation tribunal may, on an application for an order under this section, by order (whether interlocutory or final) appoint a manager to carry out in relation to any premises to which this Part applies—

(a) such functions in connection with the management of the premises, or

(b) such functions of a receiver, or both, as the tribunal thinks fit.

(2) A leasehold valuation tribunal may only make an order under this section in the following circumstances, namely—

(a) where the tribunal is satisfied—

(i) that the landlord either is in breach of any obligation owed by him to the tenant under his tenancy and relating to the management of the premises in question or any part of them or (in the case of an obligation dependent on notice) would be in breach of any such obligation but for the fact that it has not been reasonably practicable for the tenant to give him the appropriate notice, and

(ii) that the circumstances by virtue of which he is (or would be) in breach of any such obligation are likely to continue, and

(iii) that it is just and convenient to make the order in all the circumstances of the case;

(ab) where the court is satisfied—

(i) that unreasonable service charges have been made, or are proposed or likely to be made, and

(ii) that it is just and convenient to make the order in all the circumstances of the case;

(ac) where the court is satisfied—

(i) that the landlord has failed to comply with any relevant provisions of a code of practice approved by the Secretary of State under section 87 of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 (codes of management practice), and

(ii) that it is just and convenient to make the order in all the circumstances of the case; or

(b) where the court is satisfied that other circumstances exist which make it just and convenient for the order to be made.

(2A) For the purposes of subsection (2)(ab) a service charge shall be taken to be unreasonable—

(a) if the amount is unreasonable having regard to the items for which it is payable,

(b) if the items for which it is payable are of an unnecessarily high standard, or

(c) if the items for which it is payable are of an insufficient standard with the result that additional service charges are or may be incurred.

In that provision and this subsection "service charge" means a service charge within the meaning of section 18(1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, other than one excluded from that section by section 27 of that Act (rent of dwelling registered and not entered as variable).

(3) The premises in respect of which an order is made under this section may, if the tribunal thinks fit, be either more or less extensive than the premises specified in the application on which the order is made.

(4) An order under this section may make provision with respect to—

(a) such matters relating to the exercise by the manager of his functions under the order, and

(b) such incidental or ancillary matters, as the tribunal thinks fit; and, on any subsequent application made for the purpose by the manager, the tribunal may give him directions with respect to any such matters.

(5) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (4), an order under this section may provide—

(a) for rights and liabilities arising under contracts to which the manager is not a party to become rights and liabilities of the manager;

(b) for the manager to be entitled to prosecute claims in respect of causes of action (whether contractual or tortious) accruing before or after the date of his appointment;

(c) for remuneration to be paid to the manager by the landlord, or by the tenants of the premises in respect of which the order is made or by all or any of those persons;

(d) for the manager's functions to be exercisable by him (subject to subsection (9)) either during a specified period or without limit of time.

(6) Any such order may be granted subject to such conditions as the court thinks fit, and in particular its operation may be suspended on terms fixed by the tribunal.

(7) In a case where an application for an order under this section was preceded by the service of a notice under section 22, the tribunal may, if it thinks fit, make such an order notwithstanding—

(a) that any period specified in the notice in pursuance of subsection (2)(d) of that section was not a reasonable period, or

(b) that the notice failed in any other respect to comply with any requirement contained in subsection (2) of that section or in any regulations applying to the notice under section 54(3).

(8) The Land Charges Act 1972 and the Land Registration Act 1925 shall apply in relation to an order made under this section as they apply in relation to an order appointing a receiver or sequestrator of land.

(9) A leasehold valuation tribunal may, on the application of any person interested, vary or discharge (whether conditionally or unconditionally) an order made under this section; and if the order has been protected by an entry registered under the Land Charges Act 1972 or the Land Registration Act 1925, the tribunal may by order direct that the entry shall be cancelled.

(10) An order made under this section shall not be discharged by a leasehold valuation tribunal by reason only that, by virtue of section 21(3), the premises in respect of which the order was made have ceased to be premises to which this Part applies.

(11) References in this section to the management of any premises include references to the repair, maintenance or insurance of those premises.

Jurisdiction of leasehold valuation tribunal

24A.—(1) The jurisdiction conferred by this Part on a leasehold valuation tribunal is exercisable by a rent assessment committee constituted in accordance with Schedule 10 to the Rent Act 1977 which when so constituted for the purposes of exercising any such jurisdiction shall be known as a leasehold valuation tribunal.

(2) The power to make regulations under section 74(1)(b) of the Rent Act 1977 (procedure of rent assessment committees) extends to prescribing the procedure to be followed in connection with any proceedings before a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part.

Such regulations are referred to in this Part as "procedure regulations".

(3) Any order made by a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part may, with the leave of the court, be enforced in the same way as an order of the county court.

(4) No costs incurred by a party in connection with proceedings under this Part before a leasehold valuation tribunal shall be recoverable by order of any court.

(5) Paragraphs 2, 3 and 7 of Schedule 22 to the Housing Act 1980 (supplementary provisions relating to leasehold valuation tribunals: appeals and provision of information) apply to a leasehold valuation tribunal constituted for the purposes of this section.

(6) On an appeal to the Lands Tribunal from a decision of a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part—

(a) the Lands Tribunal may exercise any power available to the leasehold valuation tribunal in relation to the original matter, and

(b) an order of the Lands Tribunal may be enforced in the same way as an order of the leasehold valuation tribunal.

Leasehold valuation tribunal: applications and fees

24B.—(1) The Secretary of State may make provision by order as to the form of, or the particulars to be contained in, an application made to a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part.

(2) The Secretary of State may make provision by order—

(a) requiring the payment of fees in respect of any such application, or in respect of any proceedings before, a leasehold valuation tribunal under this Part; and

(b) empowering a leasehold valuation tribunal to require a party to proceedings before it to reimburse any other party the amount of any fees paid by him.

(3) The fees payable shall be such as may be specified in or determined in accordance with the order; and the order shall be framed with a view to securing that taking one year with another the amount of the fees charged is sufficient to meet the reasonable cost of providing the service to which they relate.

(4) An order under this section may make different provision for different cases or classes of case or for different areas.

(5) An order may, in particular, provide for the reduction or waiver of fees by reference to the financial resources of the party by whom they are to be paid or met.

Any such order may apply, subject to such modifications as may be specified in the order, any other statutory means-testing regime as it has effect from time to time.

(6) An order under this section shall be made by statutory instrument which, unless the order contains only such provision as is mentioned in subsection (1), shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.".'. —[Mr. Gummer.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Schedule 10

ADMINISTRATION OF HOUSING BENEFIT, &C

Mr. Betts: I beg to move amendment No. 143, in page 159, line 24, at end insert—

'(4A) For subsection (8) substitute—

"(8) An authority shall disregard, in determining a person's income (whether he is the occupier of a dwelling or any other person whose income falls to be aggregated with that of the occupier of a dwelling), the whole of any war disablement pension or war widows pension payable to that person.

(8A) An authority may modify the housing benefit scheme administered by the authority to such an extent as may be prescribed and any such modification may be adopted by resolution of the authority.".'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 144, in page 160, line 2, at end insert—

'(1A) For subsection (6) substitute—

"(6) An authority shall disregard, in determining a person's income (whether he is the occupier of a dwelling or any other person whose income falls to be aggregated with that of the occupier of a dwelling), the whole of any war disablement pension or war widows pension payable to that person.

(6A) An authority may modify the council tax benefit scheme administered by the authority to such an extent as may be prescribed and any such modification may be adopted by resolution of the authority.".'.

No. 145, in page 160, line 2, at end insert—

'(1B) In subsection (7), for the words "(6)(a)", there shall be substituted the words "(6) and (6A)".'.

Mr. Betts: The amendments address a problem in the current legislation concerning the disregard of war pensions. An injustice is being perpetrated on many war pensioners and their widows up and down the country.

At present, the first £10 of any war disablement pension or war widow's pension is disregarded mandatorily in the benefit calculations of local authorities for both housing and council tax purposes. Local authorities then have the discretion to extend the disregard to the maximum total pension. In doing so, they must pay for any additional disregard out of their resources.

I do not think that it is fair to complain that some local councils choose not to extend the disregard. After all, it is the Government who lay down the national benefit guidelines. It is they who determine what is included mandatorily in the benefit policies applied by local authorities and it is the Government who have chosen not to extend the disregard to all pensions. The Government decided that the mandatory allowance should be only £10.

Because of the local structure, local authorities must weigh the cost of any additional disregard against total expenditure on other services—given that they are almost universally capped by central Government—and against the cost of extending the benefit system to any other case of hardship. I believe that it is an anomaly that the only extension of disregard in the benefit system that is incorporated in legislation applies to war disablement pensions and war widows' pensions. That is the only issue mentioned in addition to the statutory scheme, where local authorities have the right to extend the statutory scheme and to pay for the extension out of their resources.

The issue is very simple. We examined the matter in Committee, but it is important to raise it again in the House. We shall continue to raise it until either we persuade the Government to change the legislation or there is a new Government.

8.45 pm

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): My hon. Friend will recognise that the councils that have chosen to include war pensions in the disregard face extreme financial difficulties. We should recognise our debt to the people who served this country in the world wars and accept the principle espoused in the amendments.

Mr. Betts: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: it is a national issue. War pensions are paid to ex-service men and their widows in recognition of the service that they gave to the whole country. People did not fight in wars for Sheffield, Burnley or for any other city: they fought for our country. As such, they receive a national pension which should be disregarded as part of the national benefit scheme. The cost should be met by the nation out of national taxation. That is the principle.

It is wrong that people who have fought in a war for their country and who receive a disability pension should be treated differently from others who fought alongside them but who come from a different part of the country. That is an unjustifiable anomaly. I move the amendment in an attempt to ensure that there is coverage under a national scheme, that costs are borne nationally and that all pensioners, wherever they live, are treated in the same way.

The Government said in Committee that they could not meet the £75 million cost. However, when I inquired again recently, the cost had reduced to £60 million. We owe a debt to those who fought for our country. Surely we can manage to find £60 million in order to rectify an anomaly and to remove a gross injustice perpetrated on many people who do not receive the full benefit of the pension that they earned in fighting for their country.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I support the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). He will know that there has been a succession of campaigns on the issue. I have introduced two ten-minute Bills that were supported on both sides of the House and I have also led an all-party delegation to the Department. Amendments were tabled in the past and there is an early-day motion on the subject which has been signed by about 140 Members of Parliament.

I do not want to duplicate the hon. Gentleman's comments, but, according to my figures, 60 per cent. of local authorities currently operate the full disregard. Some 79 per cent. of local authorities in England and Wales operate a total disregard on war disability and war widows' pensions. The reality is not as the Government have stated. The Government's figures are misleading: they overestimate the numbers, as they have not caught up with all the responses from local authorities. I am informed that only 4 per cent. of authorities—18 in total—refuse to give any further concessions.

I make two more points. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct: simply by accident of residence—a factor over which people may have no control—pensioners may be treated entirely differently. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux) has been a strong advocate in this place of the war pensions issue. People receive war pensions as a reward or recompense for national service. It is not a local authority matter; it is a Government matter and a state matter. Therefore, it should be treated in a similar way throughout the United Kingdom. The Royal British Legion has advised some war pensioners not to claim their entitlement to war pension, as it would be financially disadvantageous to them.

We are not satisfied that the Government understand that equity is worth far more than relatively small sums of public money. I hope that the Minister will respond positively to the amendment. If he does not, a diminishing number of those affected will consider the Government to be unnecessarily inflexible. Having celebrated VE day, VJ day and all the other commemorations, we should now be generous. The Government waste money on many things; this should not be one of them. I hope that they respond positively to the amendment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Roger Evans): The Government recognise that war disabled and war widows are a special case. I should stress that all war pensions and the wide ranges of associated allowances that are paid on top of the basic war pension are now completely tax free. Those pensions and allowances are paid at a much higher rate compared with their social security counterparts.

We are debating not whether those pensions and allowances should be tax free but whether, regardless of their means, those who enjoy tax-free pensions and allowances should also be eligible for income-related benefits. The Government believe that there should be a £10 mandatory disregard in respect of housing benefit and council tax benefit, but the provision goes further than the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) suggests: 80 per cent. of war widows also receive the pre-1973 allowance of £51.71 a week. That is also a mandatory disregard for the purposes of housing benefit and council tax.

Although considerable generosity is being shown, the hon. Member for Attercliffe is suggesting that, in respect of income-related benefits that are designed to help those most in need, a total disregard of all such income should be introduced nationally. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) laughs. I take that to be in dissent, but let me give him an example that is rather surprising in terms of social security. It is a example of the anomalies that would arise if the hon. Member for Attercliffe succeeded in his campaign.

A 75-year-old war widow may have a total weekly income made up of two parts, the first of which is her tax-free war widow's pension of a little over £148 a week. She may also have a second income comprising her state retirement pension or private means of up to £70 a week. Therefore, she would have a total income of £220 a week, get her rent paid by housing benefit and her council tax paid in full. In social security terms, that would be extraordinarily generous and we suggest that it would be going too far.

At present, local authorities have discretion as to whether to meet those costs. Some exercise it and some do not. The hon. Member for Attercliffe said bluntly that he wanted it paid centrally. His amendments are defective, however. They do not achieve that. If they were passed, their only effect would be to require Sheffield city council to meet those costs when it has chosen not to do so. On that basis, I cannot believe that the hon. Gentleman will wish to press the amendments.

Sir James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): I do not dispute the generosity of present and past Governments in this matter, but as we recently discussed issuing fairly stringent guidelines to local authorities, would it not be possible to issue similar guidelines to the defaulting councils, many of which, unfortunately, are dominated by the same party?

Mr. Evans: The right hon. Gentleman is correct. It is for local authorities to determine such matters and for their electors to form a judgment. A national scheme would involve extra public expenditure. According to our lowest estimate, it would cost an extra £30 million a year in housing benefit and an extra £10 million in council tax benefit. Local authority returns suggest that it could cost as much as £60 million a year. That is a considerable sum, given that it would be in addition to the £20 million already incurred through mandatory disregards.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister not understand that those of us who are arguing the case and the nation believe that we owe such people the greatest possible debt for our freedom and our society and that is why we support the amendment?

Mr. Evans: Of course we owe them everything, but it is for local authorities to decide how much weight to attach to that debt.

I cannot accept the amendment. I suggest that it is technically defective and that, given the totality of existing provision, it is reasonable in all the circumstances.

Mr. Betts: I was interested to hear the Minister's explanations. We shall send a copy of his speech to the Royal British Legion, whose members will be interested in the Government's attitude in these matters.

The Minister claimed that the amendment was technically defective. I was surprised that his colleagues did not make that assessment in Committee. I also refer him to the comments of the Secretary of State in another Committee that was considering the same issues. He said that Committees and the Government should not hide behind technicalities on matters of principle, but should face up to them.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it might be necessary to embarrass those councils by listing them? That might encourage them to provide the same benefits as 60 per cent. of councils are affording in due respect to the war service of their residents.

Mr. Betts: The Royal British Legion has already listed councils according to their response on this issue. The purpose of the amendment is that individual councils should not be creating a patchwork quilt of policy across the country. It is a national issue that should be tackled by the Government and incorporated into a national benefits system.

The Minister referred to technical deficiencies. In my view, his entire speech was deficient and some of his comments were disgraceful. He said that the Government had dealt with taxation issues by making war disability pensions and war widows' pensions tax exempt. That would benefit those on high incomes who receive a war disability pension or a war widow's pension, while those on lower incomes would have some of their benefit clawed back. So Government policies hit poorer war pensioners and widows.

The Minister quoted the case of a war widow who received a war widow's pension of £148. He asked why she should have that pension disregarded. However, he then said that local authorities already had that discretion. If the Government do not believe that such a person should have her pension disregarded, why do they allow that discretion to operate as part of the current scheme? I do not accept the Government's arguments or their logic, but, because of time pressure, I shall ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The Government are wrong in principle. Their treatment of war pensioners is little short of disgraceful. It should be a national issue dealt with by central Government and paid for out of national taxation. We shall continue to support the campaign of the Royal British Legion until this Government—or a future Government—recognise it and put it into legislation. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 109

NOTICE OF PROCEEDINGS FOR POSSESSION

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Gwilym Jones): I beg to move amendment No. 95, in page 70, line 34, at end insert—

'( ) The notice shall also inform the tenant that if he needs help or advice about the notice, and what to do about it, he should take it immediately to a Citizens' Advice Bureau, a housing aid centre, a law centre or a solicitor.'.

In Committee, Opposition Members proposed that the notice stating that the landlord is seeking possession should tell the tenant that he has a right to seek advice. Amendment No. 95 would require the notice to inform the tenant that if he wants advice he should ask a citizens advice bureau, a housing aid centre, a law centre or a solicitor. I believe the amendment to be more helpful than requiring the notice simply to inform the tenant that he has the right to seek advice, as it would instead tell him where he can go to obtain such advice.

Amendment agreed to.

9 pm

Clause 110

RIGHT TO REQUEST REVIEW OF DECISION TO SEEK POSSESSION

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 154, in page 70, line 36, leave out 'a' and insert 'an independent'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 155, in page 70, leave out lines 40 to 44.

Mr. Hughes: Amendments Nos. 154 and 155 would apply to the part of the Bill dealing with the conduct of tenants and introductory tenancies. The Bill, as currently drafted, provides that if possession proceedings are started under section 109, the tenant shall be told that he or she has a right "to request a review of the landlord's decision to seek an order for possession by serving a notice".

Amendment No. 154 would change "a" review into "an independent" review and amendment No. 155 would delete clause 110(2), which as currently drafted provides that the review is carried out by the landlord

"in such manner as it considers appropriate".

The tenant must also be notified.

The defect of the present system is that we would leave it to the landlord to carry out the review, but it is the landlord who is taking the possession proceedings. The landlord may also carry out the review in a way that it considers appropriate. That gives all the power and all the cards to the landlord and no power and none of the cards to the introductory tenant. All I ask is that we allow the review to be independent, for the protection of the tenant. I cannot believe that a reasonable landlord would object and, in equity, I hope that my amendments will be easily and readily accepted.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Amendments Nos. 154 and 155 seek to ensure that the review is independent of the local authority, although they do not specify who will carry out such a review. Authorities will seek to evict a tenant only when anti-social behaviour justifies such action. Clause 109(3) provides that the notice seeking possession spells out the reasons why the tenant is being asked to leave. He will then have 14 days to seek a review.

We shall issue comprehensive guidance on introductory tenancies, to ensure that authorities have in place a fair and equitable system. The review procedure should clearly be carried out by an independent person or body within the council—not by anyone who was involved in the original decision to begin the eviction proceedings. I do not believe that an independent body could improve on that. Local authorities will have to have fair and rigorous procedures in place to ensure that tenants are not treated unfairly. As with all such matters, there is always the risk of judicial review of the local authorities' actions if they have not been exercised properly or reasonably. I do not believe that local authorities will take that risk.

The issue is whether a tenant should be allowed to continue living in council accommodation and the best judge of that must be the authority itself.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister has made his case and the guidelines will doubtless be helpful, but he must accept that—from the point of view of the tenant—justice has not only to be done but to be seen to be done. If the landlord evicts a tenant, the fact that somebody else employed by the landlord will carry out a review is not persuasive.

I must tell the Minister that people do not believe in the independence of a review behind closed doors. He has not said whether the review will be in public, whether there will be a time for people to put evidence to the review and whether the tenant may bring somebody with him to argue the case. Constituents regularly come to tell me that a review is to take place in four days, and that it will be carried out by another officer from the same department—a colleague of the person who made the original decision. That officer is therefore not entirely independent.

The Minister's argument is not persuasive. Even with the guidelines that the Minister promised, the provision is supportive of landlords and not helpful to tenants. I do not feel able to seek leave to withdraw the amendment, and it would not be in the interests of tenants for me to do so. I hope that the Government will think again and ensure that the review is properly independent.

The Minister said that I have not specified who should carry out the review. As the Minister will know, I have not specified anyone in the amendments in order to allow a greater opportunity for somebody to be designated. There are plenty of people available, and the Government regularly set up independent agencies. It is entirely possible for the review to be done by an independent agency. We must move away from the position in housing law in which the judge and the jury are the same body.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 113

CASES WHERE THE TENANT IS A SUCCESSOR

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 41, in page 72, line 11, after 'proceedings)', insert

'or under section 15 of and Schedule 1(2)(e) to the Children Act 1989 (transfer of property in the interests of a child).'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 42, in clause 114, page 72, line 36, after 'proceedings)', insert

'or under section 15 of and Schedule 1(2)(e) to the Children Act 1989 (transfer of property in the interests of a child).'.

No. 43, in clause 115, page 72, line 43, after 'proceedings)', insert

'or under section 15 of and Schedule 1(2)(e) to the Children Act 1989 (transfer of property in the interests of a child).'.

Mrs. Maddock: The amendments are meant to be helpful, as they would ensure that the new provisions for introductory tenancies deal with both statutory provisions under which a family court might order transfer of the tenancy. The amendments make good an important drafting deficiency. Family courts have the power to order the transfer of tenancies under the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 and the Children Act 1989. The amendments will ensure that the Bill ties up with that legislation. In Committee, the Minister indicated that the omission might be the result of the powers in the 1989 Act being overlooked. The amendments give the Minister the opportunity to correct that error, and I press him to accept them in that spirit.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: We are aware that provisions in the Children Act 1989 cut across the Bill's provisions relating to succession and transferred tenancies. We are in touch with other Departments to ascertain the consequential amendments required to tidy up the statute. We are willing to consider the three amendments in principle and will, where appropriate, introduce amendments in another place. With that assurance, I hope that the hon. Lady will be minded to withdraw amendment No. 41.

Mrs. Maddock: I will convey the Minister's comments to my colleagues in another place, who will be pressing to ensure that my points are taken on board. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 118

CONSULTATION ON MATTERS OF HOUSING MANAGEMENT

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 156, in page 73, line 31, leave out

'it considers appropriate to enable'

and insert 'will guarantee.'

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 157, in page 73, line 40, after 'arrangements', insert

'and replies with a reasonable response to each and every representation made.'.

No. 158, in page 74, line 25, at end insert—

'(c) be given to all tenants affected.'.

Mr. Hughes: Clause 118(2) states:

"The authority or trust"—

the landlord—

"shall maintain such arrangements as it considers appropriate to enable those of its introductory tenants who are likely to be substantially affected by a relevant matter of housing management—

(a) to be informed of the proposals of the authority or trust . . .

(b) to make their views known".

I want a guarantee that tenants

"who are likely to be substantially affected" are informed. People often are not. The council may say that it has sent a notice or posted a letter, but often such communications never arrive. I am not so trusting of local authorities. My experience in Southwark has taught me to be untrusting often of Southwark council's housing department. I would be far more trusting if the law gave tenants a guarantee that they will be consulted—and if it can be proved that the council did not consult, it can be taken to task.

Amendment No. 157 would give some teeth to subsection (2), which embodies a wonderful tradition of legislating by stating that local government

"shall, before making a decision on the matter, consider any representations made to it in accordance with those arrangements."

That can mean placing one piece of paper in front of a council officer, who considers it for one second before dismissing it. If one is really lucky, the matter might appear on an agenda and be nodded through in a meeting without formal consideration. The amendment would make certain that any representation is answered, and answered reasonably. Any tenant who says, "This is my view: you ought to run the show this way; you ought to do something different," will know that his comments will be taken into account.

Probably more pieces of paper from tenants have gone missing in Southwark council than in any other authority in the world. People are told, "Sorry, we cannot find the files. We cannot find the paperwork. We don't think that we received the document." Tenants go to the council day after day, sometimes week after week, to complain but nothing happens. We must give tenants the right to an answer. Democracy in housing management needs answers, and if there is to be equity as between tenants and landlords, tenants must have a right to them.

Amendment No. 158 would ensure that the authority or trust publishes details of the arrangements that it makes under this section, that it publishes a copy of the documents and that a copy is given to all tenants affected. Yes, it can be perfectly proper to place the information in the council's principal office. Yes, it may be made available, on payment of a reasonable fee, to any member of the public. It is, however, important to ensure that it reaches the people affected. Although in that respect Labour-run Southwark council is better than it was, people are regularly not given information. Some people must have it put through their door and drawn to their attention. It is no good saying, "It is in the council office," or, "You can come and see it," or, "Get your friend to go along and pay 20p to get a copy." We must ensure that tenants are given the information.

Democratic housing management, which, above all, is about the rights of tenants, requires that tenants are given information. That should be the duty of the landlord. My amendments simply seek to ensure that we give teeth and a bit of toughness to the proposal, to deal with authorities, which, like Southwark over many years, have often been poor at ensuring that tenants are given information to which they are entitled, and which we have legislated that tenants should have.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Amendment No. 156 would require local authorities to guarantee that their tenants are consulted on housing management matters. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said, clause 118 already requires local authorities to maintain such arrangements as they feel appropriate to ensure that introductory tenants are consulted. The provision is based on the Housing Act 1985, which requires local authorities to consult their secure tenants on the same basis. I have no reason to suppose that the current system has not worked for both tenants and local authorities.

Authorities are already required to consider any representation made during consultation, but amendment No. 157 would require them to reply to each and every representation. I am sure that local authorities will make every reasonable effort to reply.

Mr. Simon Hughes: But they do not, so what is the sanction? How can tenants know that any representation that they make is considered properly and what the considered view is? I can assure the Minister that representations regularly disappear into a black hole or into thin air and tenants never hear anything from the council again.

Mr. Jones: I am struck by the hon. Gentleman's regard for local democracy and accountability. He must have even more experience than I have of Labour and Liberal councillors.

Amendment No. 158 would be a costly and wasteful exercise. Authorities are already required to make details of consultation arrangements available and can make a small charge should anybody want a copy. I cannot see that the hon. Gentleman's amendments would improve the situation, and I urge him not to pursue them.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am entirely unsatisfied. If the Minister thinks that all councils are the wonderful paragons of virtue that we legislate to make them, he has another think coming. Not all councils are as bad in their housing management as Southwark traditionally is, but I am afraid that it is not a happy story in many cases. I could bring in an army of tenants, who could fill the Gallery and Central Lobby. They would tell the Minister just how bad it is. Even now, under the so-called new management of Southwark, things have barely improved in that respect.

I shall not withdraw the amendments. The Government can vote them down if they want to, but I sincerely hope that the Minister will not try to make party political points. We need good management by all councils, of whichever party. The rights of tenants must be looked after. I should have thought that it was in the Government's interest to do that.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 123

EXTENSION OF GROUND OF NUISANCE OR ANNOYANCE TO NEIGHBOURS, &C

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 96, in page 75, line 29, after 'of' insert '—(i)'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 97, 102, 103, 106 and 107.

Mr. Curry: In Committee, Opposition Members tabled a number of amendments to try to strengthen local authorities' powers to deal with drug dealers. I undertook to examine which of those would make a further impact on the problem.

As a result of that undertaking, I have introduced amendments Nos. 96 and 97, which will extend the scope of local authorities' powers by allowing eviction to take place where the tenant has been convicted of an arrestable offence in the locality of the dwelling. At the moment, the tenant must have used his or her home for the offence. I believe that this will be a particularly useful measure to deal with drug dealing cases where the traffic may well take place in the common parts of the estate rather than in a person's home.

Amendments Nos. 106 and 107 replicate that provision for assured tenancies.

Amendments Nos. 102 and 103 are consequential.

Mr. Raynsford: The Minister has confirmed that the amendments were tabled in response to amendments tabled by the Opposition in Committee, which were specifically aimed to deal with the problem of people using their tenancies as a basis for drug dealing. We recommended that a conviction for a drugs-related offence committed in, or in the immediate vicinity of, a person's home should provide a mandatory ground for possession. Tenants throughout the country are extremely anxious about the damage caused to their communities by the behaviour of drug dealers and they want tough responses.

9.15 pm

I accept that the Government have brought back an amendment which goes some way towards doing what we want, but it could have unintended consequences. It refers only to tenants who are convicted of a criminal offence related to the area where they live. That could involve offences that are inherently anti-social, such as drug dealing, but it could equally involve an offence with no anti-social implications for the neighbourhood or to other tenants in the area. While no one would condone an offence committed from a council property, or indeed from any other property, I question whether the purpose for which we tabled the original amendment was to take double action against someone who has been convicted—quite properly—of an offence when that offence has caused no nuisance to that person's neighbours.

Although we are pleased that the Government have responded, we are not satisfied that the amendment goes all the way, and we fear that there might be unforeseen consequences that we certainly did not intend. As we are glad that some progress has been made, however, we will support the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 97, in page 75, line 30, at end insert

', or

(ii) an arrestable offence committed in, or in the locality of, the dwelling-house.'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 124

NEW GROUND OF DOMESTIC VIOLENCE: SECURE TENANCIES

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I beg to move amendment No. 98, in page 75, line 37, leave out 'the violence of' and insert 'violence or threats of violence by'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 99 to 101 and 108 to 112.

Mr. Jones: The amendments take on board three suggestions made in Committee. Amendment No. 98 will make the domestic violence ground for possession available where a partner has left the home permanently where violence has been threatened, not just when violence has taken place. I believe that provision to be entirely justified, as the constant threat of violence over a sustained period will often lead to a partner fleeing the family home.

Amendment No. 99 replaces the reference to violence or the threat of violence to a "child" with a reference to a "member of the family". That is a sensible widening of the scope of the provision to cover cases such as the example given in Committee of violence directed at an elderly mother-in-law, in circumstances in which it was reasonable for the wife to leave the dwelling with her mother because of violence on the part of her husband.

Amendments Nos. 100 and 101 remove the requirement in paragraph (d) that the remaining partner should be under-occupying the family home. It was put to us in Committee that domestic violence alone should be a sufficient ground for eviction. We think that that is right, and that the clause as drafted is too restrictive because it requires the remaining partner to be over-accommodated.

I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Raynsford: The Opposition welcome the amendments, which, as the Minister said, emanated from issues raised by Opposition amendments in Committee. As he has said, they will make it easier to obtain possession in cases in which there has been a threat of violence rather than actual violence. Moreover, there will be no restriction on possession to cases in which there is under-occupation of the property. That is right and proper, and we welcome the amendments.

Mrs. Maddock: As the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) has said, we discussed the issues in detail in Committee. I am very pleased that the Minister has tabled these important amendments, which will affect many people who are likely to suffer violence and be unable to escape from it. They have my support, and that of my hon. Friends.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 99, in page 76, line 1, leave out 'child' and insert 'member of the family'.

No. 100, in page 76, line 2, at end insert ', and'.

No. 101, in page 76, line 4, leave out from 'return' to end of line 7.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 125

PROCEEDINGS FOR POSSESSION OR TERMINATION

Amendments made: No. 102, in page 76, line 28, leave out 'annoyance to neighbours, etc.' and insert 'other anti–social behaviour'.

No. 103, in page 77, line 46, leave out 'annoyance to neighbours, etc.' and insert 'other anti–social behaviour'.

No. 104, in page 78, line 9, leave out 'after subsection (3) insert' and insert

'(grounds and orders for possession), for subsection (3) substitute—

"(3) Where a notice under section 83 has been served on the tenant, the court shall not make such an order on any of those grounds above unless the ground is specified in the notice; but the grounds so specified may be altered or added to with the leave of the court.'.

No. 105, in page 78, line 13, at end insert—

'( ) In Schedule 2 to that Act, in Ground 16, after "notice of the proceedings for possession was served under section 83" insert "(or, where no such notice was served, the proceedings for possession were begun)".'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 126

EXTENSION OF GROUND OF NUISANCE OR ANNOYANCE TO ADJOINING OCCUPIERS &C

Amendments made: No. 106, in page 78, line 22, after 'of' insert '—(i)'.

No. 107, in page 78, line 23, at end insert

', or

(ii) an arrestable offence committed in, or in the locality of, the dwelling–house.'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 127

NEW GROUND OF DOMESTIC VIOLENCE: ASSURED TENANCIES

Amendments made: No. 108, in page 78, line 32, leave out 'the violence of' and insert

'violence or threats of violence by'.

No. 109, in page 78, line 33, leave out from 'a' to 'immediately' in line 34 and insert

'member of the family of that partner who was residing with that partner'.

No. 110, in page 78, line 35, at end insert ', and'.

No. 111, in page 78, line 37, leave out from 'return' to end of line 40.

No. 112, in page 78, line 41, leave out 'has' and insert 'and "member of the family" have'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 130

POWER OF ARREST FOR BREACH OF INJUNCTIONS AGAINST ANTI-SOCIAL BEHAVIOUR

Amendment made: No. 113, in page 81, line 10, at end insert—

'( ) Nothing in this section prevents the grant of an injunction relating to other matters, in addition to those mentioned above, in relation to which no power of arrest is attached.'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 131

POWER OF ARREST FOR BREACH OF OTHER LOCAL AUTHORITY INJUNCTIONS

Mr. Raynsford: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 81, leave out lines 24 to 28 and insert—

'(4) For the purposes of this section, any premises occupied as residential accommodation are qualifying premises.'.

The amendment would clarify the grounds on which an injunction with power of arrest could be obtained to cover persons other than local authority tenants. We are concerned that the local authority should be able to act effectively against anyone who is causing a nuisance and making their neighbours' lives a misery. We do not accept the premise, which has been to some extent set out by the Government in the title of part V, that such offences are only the responsibility of tenants. I remind the Minister that the title of part V is "Conduct of Tenants". We are very well aware that such anti-social conduct can be perpetrated by other people as well, and we think that it is insulting to tenants to suggest that only tenants can be guilty of such behaviour.

We therefore want to make it quite clear that the local authority or the landlord taking action in such cases can take action against people occupying any premises as residential accommodation, whether under a council tenancy or not. On many estates, where properties have been sold either as freehold houses or as leasehold flats, owners of properties live cheek by jowl with tenants and may themselves be guilty of anti-social behaviour. We want effective action against behaviour, whoever it is perpetrated by. The amendment would clarify those powers to ensure an even-handed approach in the fight against anti-social behaviour.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I have much sympathy with the amendment. The Government have never tried to suggest that anti-social behaviour is suffered only by those who live in public sector rented property. In part V, we are trying to help local authorities to improve the quality of life on their estates by introducing a strong power to deal with troublemakers—whether tenants or non-tenants—who cause problems. Attaching a power of arrest to an injunction in this context is a new development. Our new power is a bold step and has been made available only once before, in cases of domestic violence.

It would be prudent to see where we are once things have bedded in and how effective the power has been before considering extending it more widely. Anti-social behaviour and what can be done about it are high on the agenda and, I assure the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford), will remain so. In future, if the Bill's powers work effectively, it may be appropriate to consider whether local authorities need similar, stronger powers to deal with the private sector or owner-occupiers.

Mr. Betts: Is it not an anomaly that there are powers in the Bill to deal with anti-social behaviour by tenants against tenants, by tenants against owner-occupiers, by owner-occupiers against tenants, but not by owner-occupiers against owner-occupiers? Removing the idea of qualifying premises would allow the latter category of anti-social behaviour to be covered by legislation.

Mr. Jones: I am trying to express sympathy with the point being made by the hon. Gentleman and his hon.

Friend the Member for Greenwich. I rule nothing out in what we need to consider further. I am suggesting that we should take this first step, see how it goes and then consider what more we might need to do.

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) rightly made the good point that the current legislation is in this respect partly defective. We would therefore have been happier if the Minister had agreed to accept the amendment, but on the understanding that the matter will be kept under review and that there will be scope for further changes at a future date, and in view of the need to press on because other very important matters, especially the issues of homelessness, need to be considered, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 114, in page 81, line 34, at end insert—

'( ) Nothing in this section prevents the grant of an injunction relating to other matters, in addition to those mentioned above; in relation to which no power of arrest is attached.'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 133

ARREST AND REMAND

Amendments made: No. 115, in page 82, line 12, at end insert—

'A constable shall after making any such arrest forthwith inform the person on whose application the injunction was granted.'.

No. 116, in page 82, line 20, leave out from first 'in' to end of line 21 and insert

'circumstances such that a power of arrest could have been attached under section 130 or 131'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

New clause 1

ABSOLUTE PRIORITY IN HOUSING ALLOCATION FOR CERTAIN CATEGORIES OF PERSONS

'1.— A local housing authority shall ensure as far as is reasonably practicable that absolute priority in the allocation of housing accommodation is given to the following persons—

(a) a young person leaving care who is referred to the authority by a voluntary organisation;

(b) a person who is referred to the authority by a social services authority;

(c) a person who is referred to the authority by a health authority;

(d) a person who is referred to the authority by a registered social landlord or voluntary organisation providing temporary accommodation for single homeless people, and which has nomination rights with that authority;

(e) a person who is referred to the authority by a voluntary organisation which has nomination rights with that authority.'.—[Mrs. Maddock.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 2—Priority in housing allocation to be accorded to persons owed a duty under sections 167 and 174—

'1.— The local housing authority shall ensure as far as is reasonably practicable that absolute priority in the allocation of housing accommodation is given to a person to whom the authority has a duty under sections 167 and 174.'.

New clause 27—Right to be allocated similar property—

'. Any social housing tenant shall have the right to request and be offered specifically identified identically sized property owned by the same social housing landlords, unless the landlord can show that that identified property is specifically needed for a particular tenant on the grounds of medical or disability needs.'.

Amendment No. 3, in clause 137, page 84, line 14, after '(1)', insert—

'Except where otherwise directed by this Part or by Part Seven of this Act,'.

Amendment No. 4, in clause 138, page 85, line 2, at end insert—

'(1A) They do not apply to a person to whom the authority are subject to a duty under sections 167 and 174 (a person found to be homeless).'.

Government amendment No. 121, in clause 143, page 87, line 11, leave out '(2)' and insert—

'(2A) As regards priorities, the scheme shall be framed so as to secure that reasonable preference is given to—

(a) people occupying insanitary or overcrowded housing or otherwise living in unsatisfactory housing conditions,

(b) people occupying housing accommodation which is temporary or occupied on insecure terms,

(c) families with dependent children,

(d) households consisting of or including someone who is expecting a child,

(e) households consisting of or including someone with a particular need for settled accommodation on medical or welfare grounds, and

(f) households whose social or economic circumstances are such that they have difficulty in securing settled accommodation.

The scheme shall also be framed so as to secure that additional preference is given to households within paragraph (e) consisting of someone with a particular need for settled accommodation on medical or welfare grounds who cannot reasonably be expected to find settled accommodation for themselves in the foreseeable future.

(2B) The Secretary of State may by regulations—

(a) specify further descriptions of people to whom preference is to be given as mentioned in subsection (2A), or

(b) amend or repeal any part of subsection (2A).

(2C) The Secretary of State may by regulations specify factors which a local housing authority shall not take into account in allocating housing accommodation.

(2D) As regards the procedure to be followed,'.

Amendment (a) to the proposed amendment, at end of paragraph (f), insert—

'(g) persons to whom the authority are, or have been, subject to a duty under sections 164, 167, 171 and 174 of this Act.'.

Government amendments Nos. 122, 124 and 125.

Mrs. Maddock: We now come to what, for me, is without doubt the most important part of the Bill, because there can be no greater measure of housing need than being homeless. That principle seems to be common sense, but as I shall explain, the Government seem determined to disregard it in the Bill. Until very recently, that principle was accepted by all parties in Parliament. It was first set down in law in the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977.

[Mrs. Maddock]

That historic Act was the first ever to give homeless people a right to a home, and was introduced by the then Liberal Member of Parliament Stephen Ross, who is sadly no longer with us. The Act received support from hon. Members of all political parties, including many Labour Members—who, of course, were then in government—and many Conservative Members. Three Conservative Members were sponsors of the Bill.

Many hon. Members who supported that Act and spoke in favour of it in 1977, including then Ministers, thought of it as only the first step towards ending the dreadful horror of homelessness. It did not give a blanket right to be housed to all homeless people; it simply stated that certain groups were in priority need. The criteria that had to be met were quite harsh, such as being homeless through no direct fault of their own. People included in the priority need category were those in any household including or expecting a child, any household including an elderly person or a disabled person and any household made homeless as a result of an emergency, such as flood or fire.

Provision for homeless people before the 1977 provisions was patchy at best, and short-termism was the order of the day. The problem was seen not as a real need for long-term housing but as a temporary requirement caused by some inadequacy on the part of the family concerned.

The 1977 Act changed all that. Its raison d'être was to help individual families achieve a long-term solution to their individual crises of homelessness. Temporary accommodation cannot achieve such solutions, because it hinders children at school, makes it harder for people to get jobs and affects people's health—mentally and physically.

In short, homelessness is hell, and most people who become homeless do so as a direct or indirect result of losing their job. Homelessness means that people become excluded. It divides society. It shuts people out from opportunities for education, from meaningful work, often from health care, from financial support and, fundamentally, from decent housing.

Many homeless people become trapped in a downward spiral. Their escape routes are shut off by measures that have been enacted in recent years. Homelessness deprives people of their stake in society, and we know that it can drive them into crime.

The effects of homelessness often continue well after people have a roof over their head. By depriving people of the security of knowing that they have long-term accommodation, we make their lives much harder, which is the very last thing that families want when they have been made homeless.

I believe, as do many people outside the House, that we are turning the clock back to the days of "Cathy Come Home". A few years after that documentary was shown, a local authority housing officer was quoted—in a 1971 study of homeless families—as saying of homeless people:

"I have to pay attention to the ordinary standards of decent people. We don't want these dead legs. They muck up the books and make life a misery for ordinary folk."

The days when local authorities could get away with such an attitude are now, thankfully, over.

The Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 has not been perfect, but it has helped the more than 1.5 million people who have been accepted for rehousing by local authorities because of it.

The amendments and new clauses in this group are about who should be given reasonable preference in the allocation of social housing and, in particular, whether vulnerable homeless people should be included in lists of people who receive such preference. That is what my amendment (a) to Government amendment No. 121 is about. It is not an ideal solution. The only amendments that would keep intact the right of homeless people to long-term accommodation are in a group led by my amendment No. 35, due for discussion later. However, amendment (a) would deal with the ridiculous situation in which almost anything is accepted as a measure of housing need but homelessness.

9.30 pm

I have no argument with the criteria that the Government have included. I shall not attempt to vote against their amendment. But I cannot see what justification the Minister can have for saying that, while insanitary and insecure accommodation will give someone reasonable preference, homelessness will not. That is unless he is saying that being homeless is extremely insanitary and extremely insecure.

Many people outside the House are extremely worried about what is not in Government amendment No. 121. It is welcome as far as it goes, but it fails explicitly to include homeless people as a group to be given priority. Homelessness is a distinct form of need in itself, and it should be recognised in any allocations criteria. The Government amendment gives wide powers to the Secretary of State to prescribe the details of allocation procedures. I believe that adding homeless people to the new allocations criteria will result in a fairer system that will allow the needs of that group to be considered alongside the needs of others.

Amendment (a) is the most crucial amendment in the group. It is supported by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford). I have also tabled several other amendments, and I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will be sympathetic to them.

New clause 1 deals with several groups of people whom I and others outside the House believe should have priority above persons who have reasonable preference. I shall deal with each of those groups briefly. I start with young persons leaving care. We had much discussion about that group in Committee, and later I shall move an amendment to ensure that children who are dealt with under the Children Act 1989 are prioritised. If the Minister can tell me in response to the points that I make that he recognises that that group of children needs to be written down and recognised in the Bill, it may not be necessary for me to press a later amendment to a vote.

Other people who should be given priority are those referred by a social services authority to a housing authority, people referred by a health authority and people referred by a landlord providing temporary accommodation for single homeless people. All those groups were discussed in Committee, and I shall not do so further at this point, other than to say that I hope that the Minister will listen carefully not only to me, but to all the groups outside that are pushing for those people to be given priority.

New clause 2 goes further than amendment (a) in ensuring that homeless households have priority over and above people who have reasonable preference in the allocation of housing. The arguments for that are the same as I have already outlined. I shall highlight only the Department of the Environment's recognition in the housing White Paper that homelessness is a searing experience as a reminder of how widespread the recognition of the problem of homelessness is.

New clause 27, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), has my firm support and I shall allow him to propound its merits.

Amendment No. 3 is to some extent a technical amendment that could stand in its own right, but it is designed to make it clear that any duty given to local authorities, particularly with regard to homeless persons, by part VI or part VII of the Bill will override the general allocation provisions.

Amendment No. 4 would exempt households to whom the local authority has a duty under the homeless persons provisions from the allocations criteria, with the clear indication that the duty to house them is separate from and additional to general allocation schemes operated by the local authority. I have no quarrel with the final three Government amendments and I welcome the Secretary of State's recognition that any changes to regulations on the matter should be passed by an affirmative resolution of each House of Parliament. I pressed Ministers on that in Committee.

As Liberal Democrats, we recognise that there is a serious problem with the length of local authority waiting lists throughout the country and, especially, that problems in some regions lead to people blaming homeless people for the length of time that others wait on the list. The Government claim that the solution of putting homeless people into temporary accommodation and then on to a waiting list is the answer, but it will not make waiting lists any shorter or make any significant difference to the speed with which most people on them will be housed.

The Government's proposals will not reduce housing need or demand and they will certainly not increase housing supply. Some of their proposals have immediately led to a reduction in the supply of social housing. In that way, they are failing everyone in housing need.

The challenge for us all is to strike a balance between the long-term housing needs of everyone who is adequately housed in Britain today and the immediate requirements of homeless families. Liberal Democrats believe that that can be done by a single route of entry, but only if certain conditions prevail: that all homeless households are registered on the waiting list as soon as they present themselves to the local authority; that the local authority has a duty to find them temporary accommodation of as stable a nature as possible for as long as it takes; that they are found permanent accommodation or find their own accommodation in the private sector; and that councils should be able properly to recognise the problems of homelessness and the inadequacies of temporary accommodation in the point systems that they use for allocating tenancies.

The last of those is what amendment (a) is about. It is about not queue jumping, but putting some fairness and common sense back into the Bill. It is about allowing local authorities to consider the full picture of a person's position and ensuring that people who become homeless can be helped back on to their feet and given some stability at the earliest possible moment.

In their 1989 homelessness review, the Government concluded:

"there is little doubt that"

homeless

"people would and should expect to have priority in any system of housing allocation based on need".

My colleagues and I are trying to ensure that that principle is in the Bill. I intend to press amendment (a) to a vote and I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to support it.

I am sorry only that certain hon. Members here tonight believe that this is not an interesting topic. There are people sleeping on the streets and, if we are not careful, we shall undo all the progress that we have made in recent years with the support of all parties, the Churches and all groups that have to deal with homelessness. If we are not careful, we shall undo all the work of those groups over a number of years. I strongly urge all hon. Members who care about homelessness to support amendment (a).

Mr. Raynsford: Homelessness is one of the crucial housing and social issues of our time, and it is right that the House should have an opportunity for an albeit brief debate on those crucial elements in the Bill. Sadly, homelessness is and has been for the past few years all too evident a feature of life in Britain. It is a scar on our society, and blights the lives of hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens. It is an affront to any civilised society to see the extent of homelessness in Britain today.

The fact that homelessness exists on such a scale is testimony to the failure of the Government's housing policy to ensure the provision of adequate homes for people in need. It is no coincidence that the past five years have seen the lowest output of new homes for renting of any period since the end of the second world war—an average of 28,000 new homes a year, compared with more than 120,000 new rented homes a year during the five years of the Labour Government.

The failure to provide adequately for housing needs has inevitably led to the appalling problems of homelessness that we face today. But rather than addressing those problems directly, with measures to increase the output of rented housing, and responding to people's needs, the Government are behaving in a shabby and disreputable way, by seeking to reduce local authorities' statutory responsibilities towards the homeless.

In summary, the Government are making the victims of the homelessness crisis pay for the Government's own failure to provide adequately for people's housing needs. They are making an entirely unjustified attack on the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, which has provided the statutory framework for the relief of homelessness throughout the past 18 years.

As the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) said, that Act was passed with support from hon. Members from all parties. Although essentially it was passed by the Labour Government with the active involvement of Stephen Ross, the Liberal Member who promoted it as a private Member, it also attracted support from some Conservative Members.

[Mr. Raynsford]

That legislation has been reviewed twice during the lifetime of the Government—in the early stages of the Government, in the early 1980s, when the current Deputy Prime Minister was Secretary of State for the Environment, and again in the late 1980s, when the late Lord Ridley and Mr. Chris Patten, who is now Governor of Hong Kong, were Secretary of State for the Environment.

Both those reviews concluded that the legislation was working well, and that there was no need for change. It is a comment on today's Tory party that it now sees the need to interfere, and to damage legislation that the Government's predecessors regarded as working well. There is no justification for what the Government are doing; there has been no objective change in circumstances to merit it.

The Bill is a mean, shabby piece of legislation that will withdraw assistance from many people in need by reducing local authorities' existing obligations, thus facilitating matters for local authorities that do not wish to accept their responsibilities towards the homeless. It will also break the link established by the 1977 Act, between the provision of housing for the homeless and that for all other categories of need.

Bringing the homeless into the mainstream, rather than condemning them to a period in temporary accommodation, was one of the most important gains made under the 1977 Act. That Act put an end to some of the most disgraceful features of the treatment of the homeless, so well portrayed in the television programme that shocked the nation in the 1960s, "Cathy Come Home"—practices such as the splitting of families and the degradation of families, and the use of squalid and disgusting former workhouses and other forms of temporary accommodation for the homeless.

The fact that the 1977 Act got away from that and concentrated on the permanent housing of homeless people was one of the great gains that it made. Yet the Government are now acting directly to reverse that, and seeking to put homeless people into temporary accommodation again.

Believe it or not, if the Bill gets through Parliament, it will make it impossible for local authorities to provide direct rehousing for homeless people, other than in the exceptional circumstance of their already being registered on the housing waiting list and having sufficient points to qualify—or rather, to use the slightly curious term that the Minister used in Committee, of their having "almost enough" points to qualify. The Minister has never clarified how that definition would work; we know that it is a mess, and will prove unworkable.

The Government's action is a dereliction of their responsibility to one of the most vulnerable sections of our community. It shows that today's Tory party has turned its back on the poor, the homeless and the vulnerable and demonstrates the Government's failure to ensure that the needs of all members of our society are properly met. I pledge that the Labour party, on its return to government, will ensure that there is a proper and effective statutory framework to guarantee the rights of homeless people and make sure that they get proper treatment and help in the form of permanent accommodation.

9.45 pm

We shall restore the framework created in 1977 if the Government succeed in their intention of dismantling it. Whatever happens tonight, I hope that this legislation will not pass unscathed in another place. It runs against all our country's instincts for fairness that underpinned the 1977 Act, which gained enormous support throughout the country—as has its retention. When the Government consulted on the proposal to change the law, more than 10,000 people responded. Almost all said that the legislation should stay, that the Government should abandon their proposals and that the 1977 Act was working well. It is only the Government who want to pursue their proposals. They are flying in the face of all informed opinion, the voluntary organisations that work with the homeless, the local authorities and the people who know and care most. Their proposals are wrong-headed and will not work or last. We will vote firmly tonight against those measures because they are wrong and we want in their place a proper framework to ensure the maintenance of responsibilities towards the homeless.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) prefaced her remarks with the words "as Liberal Democrats". I might say, "as Conservatives" or "as Labour"—new or old—because this issue engages and concerns the whole House. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) made some accusations about whether we cared. I do not claim such exclusivity for my concerns. They are general. There is a legitimate political argument about how we translate them into practical politics. It is not legitimate to bandy about qualitative concerns to try to show that we have more concern than other people.

I spent part of this morning dealing with people who operate the rough sleepers initiative. That deals with the street homeless—the worst-off people in the most difficult circumstances, who are often difficult to help. I am concerned about that and I want to drive that policy forward, but I do not claim that, if I were to be replaced, it would come to a halt. The determination to tackle the problems is real and goes across the House. I stake my claim on an ecumenical basis for what I believe is an essential policy.

I would like Opposition Members to point out where the difference lies, because in many respects it is more apparent than real. There were concerns, and I hope that I have tried to meet them. I agreed to put the allocations criteria in the Bill and to attach a power to change them by affirmative resolution so that, if it became necessary to make subsequent changes, it could be done. I have never claimed biblical certainty. We are trying to deliver something. There may be occasions when it has to be amended. That is part of normal political life if one is sensible about what one tries to put forward.

I also changed the period of duty to two years because I thought that it was more reasonable. We are left with what I believe is the one central issue that divides the House. There is no point in denying that it does. I believe that it is reasonable to seek to distinguish between people who become homeless as a manifestation of a deep-seated, long-term need and who will require long-term help, and people who become homeless because they are overwhelmed by a particular circumstance, but who, if they are given emergency help, may be able to climb out of the difficulty. I recognise that a great many people will fall into the former category, but some 18 per cent. of those who are accepted as statutorily homeless never take up social housing, so there are people who fall into the latter category. Everyone needs emergency help; no one is proposing to tear that away. Indeed, the Awua judgment, which I have never prayed in aid—we intended to reform the legislation before it, so I am not prepared to make a claim that is not honest—has virtually removed the safety net in its entirety. So the practical effect of the proposals is to replace that safety net.

All those who find themselves in that situation need that emergency help, but we need to find out whether they need the long-term accommodation and help that carries with it the right to buy and, perhaps, succession rights, or whether they can subsequently manage by themselves, which means that the social housing can be made available for those who need it on a long-term basis. That is a reasonable and honourable proposition.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): My hon. Friend has certainly moved since Second Reading, when widespread concerns were expressed. He will have seen the note that I let him have from Shelter housing aid in Taunton, which pointed out that the placing of families in short-term private rented accommodation would result in greater insecurity. It emphasised that 38 per cent. of those accepted as homeless applicants in Taunton Deane in my constituency had lost private rented tenancies compared with an average for the whole country of 11 per cent., according to DOE figures. That concerns me very much. What assurances can my hon. Friend give me?

Mr. Curry: I recognise my hon. Friend's concerns. He will know that I have had extensive discussions with Shelter and many of the voluntary organisations. My response is twofold. First, if there is not suitable private sector accommodation, people in those circumstances can be accommodated in local authority or housing association stock. Secondly, to try to make more private sector accommodation available, we are discussing allowing local authorities to lease such accommodation for 10 years, so that they can exercise more effective management under the capital financing rules—those have been widely welcomed. I should be perfectly willing to discuss a particular circumstance in my hon. Friend's constituency with him, because circumstances differ across the country.

The Government are proposing a sensible measure. I recognise that it has raised a dispute. We are seeking to help the people in the greatest need. I am not concerned about morality, or about any of the emotional overtones that people sometimes falsely bring to a debate. There is a real emotion about this debate, which is about people in need. My focus is to help people in need. That is my sole criterion, and I therefore commend our amendments to the House. I ask the House to support us in putting those allocations criteria, as they stand, on the face of the Bill. I am confident that they will embrace the circumstances and pick up the needs that we must identify.

We had a serious debate in Committee and I have no doubt that that debate will continue. Of course, I shall continue to discuss with colleagues across the Floor of the House how the legislation is working. I shall be ready to make changes if it appears, in practice, that it is not working as we intended. That is a sensible precaution in politics. Despite being a low Methodist and not having biblical truth in this matter—a primitive—I shall not enter into an argument with the hon. Member for Greenwich. I also have a quotation. Perhaps it is a curious measure, but there we are. We have had a debate across the Floor of the House. I think that the hon. Member for Greenwich was brought up in Raynsford hall and I was brought up in a council property—it is a funny old world.

I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Betts: I shall not go into the Labour party's general opposition to the dismantling of the 1977 legislation. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) has already done so very well, both here and in Committee.

I shall raise three issues about the relationship between the allocations criteria that the Minister intends to put on the face of the Bill and the rights of homeless families. The first is an issue that came up in Committee, when the Minister said that a homeless family who got nearly enough points to be at the top of the list could nevertheless be offered a permanent home immediately by the local authority.

The Minister said that he would respond and he has done so in writing to a number of questions that we raised in Committee. I thank him for doing so. Generally, he has clarified issues, but he has done nothing to clarify this issue. Indeed, he has obscured it further. He said that, if a homeless family has nearly enough points to be at the top of the list but is not right at the top, the authority does not "have to allocate housing mechanistically to the person at the very top of the list."

If local authorities started allocating houses to people who are not at the top of the list, there would quickly be a lot of complaints to the ombudsman about their allocations policy.

The Minister went on to say:

"I understand that, in the sorts of situations that Mr Betts had in mind, some authorities would treat the household as a special case on an exceptional basis, and would give it additional priority; there would be nothing to prevent them from doing that in the future."

It is not acceptable for there to be a complete dismantling of the homeless persons legislation, to be replaced by the Minister saying that there is nothing to stop local authorities giving additional priority to homeless families on an exceptional basis. That is not the current fundamental right of homeless families. That is not acceptable, and it will not be workable in practice.

I draw the Minister's attention to two other issues where the relationship between the allocations policy and the rights of homeless families appears to be flawed. The Minister said about allocations policy that authorities should give reasonable preference to people who are living in unsatisfactory housing conditions. The irony of the situation is that a homeless family who are living in housing that it is unreasonable for them to continue to occupy can be categorised as homeless and can receive automatic accommodation—according to the Minister's rehousing allocation policy.

However, a homeless family who have no home at all cannot be rehoused under the allocations policy because there is no reference in the policy to the rights of homeless families to be awarded points under the allocation system. It is nonsensical that an allocations policy can give preference to someone who is homeless but who has a home that is unsatisfactory, but cannot give preference to someone who has no home at all. That stupidity is contained in the Minister's policy, which he is proposing tonight.

[Mr. Betts]

Finally, paragraph (b) of the allocations policy says that people who are occupying housing accommodation that is temporary or occupied on unsecured terms can have preference. That means that a homeless family who would now be eligible for rehousing with permanent accommodation straight away can get preference only once they have been given temporary accommodation by the local authority. In other words, a homeless family have to be moved into temporary accommodation before they can get priority for permanent accommodation. Moving homeless families around from one area to another adds to family insecurity, adds different schools for their children and adds other insecurities in relation to relationships. The Government are supposed to espouse family life, but this proposal would destroy families.

I hope that the amendments are accepted tonight, particularly amendment (a), because it would mean that, despite the rise in homeless families under the Government's allocation policy, they would be protected in a way that they are not currently.

Mr. Simon Hughes: My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) did not deal with one point; however, she made perfectly proper points about the difference between the Minister's approach and our approach. My hon. Friend sustained the tradition of Stephen Ross; that is a perfectly valid view. Many people believe—this is not a party point—that the one thing that would provide the opportunity for those who are homeless to be more adequately housed would be if the Government restored the substantial cuts in housing investment that have cut housing more than any other public investment sector since the Government have been in office.

I put a separate issue to the Minister in relation to new clause 27. Five years ago, or thereabouts, an elderly tenant on a council estate in Bermondsey, the Arnold estate, asked to move to a vacant property—the same type of property that she was already in; a one-bedroom property—next door to her elderly sister. They wanted to live next door to each other so that if they were sick in the night, they could bang on the wall. The council said that it could not allocate the property to her and that she would have to go into the pool and that she would come up if she was lucky. The property was allocated to someone else. Eventually, we persuaded the council that that was an inhumane way to proceed. When the property next became vacant, the council said that it would move the lady in, but it was too late because her sister had died.

We believe that when someone lives on an estate and an identical property comes up—no bigger, no grander, no more expensive—that is more suitable because of their immobility, disability or illness, they should be able to move into it, thereby releasing their property into the housing pool for allocation to someone else. That should happen without prejudice to those who need to be allocated a particular property on a council estate.

One of the great iniquities of the allocation of council housing is that it is done in an inhumane way and that existing tenants cannot move where their family needs and their requirements require them to be. I hope that the Minister will be sympathetic to what is a new clause rooted in practical experience in south London.

Question, That the clause be read a Second time, put and negatived.

New clause 25

CONDITION OF OFFERED PROPERTY

'. Social housing shall not be allocated and prospective tenants shall not be required to accept an offer or be penalised for refusing to accept an offer unless the offered property is, at the time of the offer, in a state which would at that time be reasonable for a tenant immediately to occupy.'.—[Mr. Simon Hughes.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also new clause 26—Independent appeals system for allocating social housing—

'. Prospective tenants shall have the right of an independent appeal against any offer that the tenant believes to be unreasonable.'.

10 pm

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Housing Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Question agreed to.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Hughes: I am not sure whether the noes had it in the previous decision, but I shall let that pass. I think that the ayes did have it this time, because otherwise we would be in some difficulty.

First, I shall speak about a significant day-to-day problem of prospective tenants of council houses. At the moment, people can—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There are too many private conversations going on. If Members want to have private conversations, they can go outside.

Mr. Hughes: Thank you very much, Madam Deputy Speaker. We are all trying to go as quickly as possible. I am conscious that other colleagues have entered the Chamber for a vote, but obviously there are a fair number of amendments and new clauses.

I make a very simple proposal—that, if someone is made an offer of a property by a social landlord—either a council or housing association—they should not be expected to accept the offer, and they certainly should not be penalised for refusing the offer, if, at the time that the property was offered, it was not in a fit state to occupy.

One of the problems at the moment is that, understandably, councils are desperately trying to reach high targets of re-letting and have few void or empty properties. In the interests of trying to meet its targets, my local authority of Southwark, a Labour-run authority with the largest local housing stock in London, regularly offers property that is obviously not in a fit state for anyone to move into. It says to people, "Here is your offer; you must take it; we shall then clear it up and sort it out."

People do not believe that, and it is very unrealistic to expect someone to say, "This is my dream home," or even, "This is my less than dream home," if it is in a filthy state, needs a great deal of work, needs to be cleared out and so on. I seek to establish that people who are offered public sector or social housing stock should not be required to accept the offer until the housing is in a fit state to be occupied.

The second issue is that, when someone is made an offer, at the moment they may appeal. They may say, "I do not want to take it because it is not in a fit state, not habitable, unsafe, the electrics have not been done, the building has not been done." They have an internal appeal, if they are lucky. If they are allowed to, they can say, "I want to appeal," and someone, hidden away somewhere in the council, decides whether the offer was reasonable.

There is no independence; the appeal is not conducted by people who are not part of the same landlord authority. Often, the appeal is carried out without the tenant being present; the tenant does not see the process or know about the process. All the tenant knows is that the appeal has been turned down.

Real issues, in inner London boroughs like mine, require people to be made decent offers of property that they can accept. I understand that the Minister may not want to accept these two new clauses, but I should be grateful if he would say what we can do to ensure that accommodation is offered in a fit state to be received and that there is an independent system for working out whether an offer is reasonable.

Mr. Curry: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concerns. Yesterday and in debate earlier today, he referred to the problems in his constituency. As he suspected, I cannot accept the new clauses as they stand, but I am willing to discuss his concerns and how the law would operate in practice—particularly in the circumstances of his constituency to which he referred. In light of that assurance, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be willing to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Minister agree that properties are often declined when offered because they are in a filthy state? Does he agree that it is not unreasonable to expect the housing authority to inspect the property and, if necessary, to arrange for it to be cleaned properly before it is offered? The new tenant could then move into a reasonably clean property.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely valid point. I shall reflect on ways in which we might achieve that purpose.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am grateful to the Minister for that response, which is entirely reasonable. Like the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs), I will be happy to discuss the matter further with the Minister, as I believe that it is within our power to remedy the problem. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 137

ALLOCATION OF HOUSING ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Curry: I beg to move amendment No. 117, in page 84, line 39, at end insert—

'( ) The provisions of this Part do not apply to the allocation of housing accommodation by a local housing authority to two or more persons jointly if—

(a) one or more of them is a person within subsection (5)(a), (b) or (c), and

(b) none of the others is excluded from being a qualifying person by regulations under section 139(2).'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 118.

Mr. Curry: The amendments deal with exemptions from the requirement for housing to be allocated through the register and the allocation process. They allow existing tenants to become joint tenants without having to go through the housing register and the allocation process. They are commonsense measures which ensure that allocations work effectively, and I commend them to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 138

CASES WHERE PROVISIONS ABOUT ALLOCATION DO NOT APPLY

Amendment made: No. 118, in page 85, line 31, after 'excluded' insert

'—

(a) in relation to specified descriptions of persons, or

(b)''. —[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 140

THE HOUSING REGISTER

Amendment made: No. 119, in page 86, line 8, at end insert 'housing'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 142

INFORMATION ABOUT HOUSING REGISTER

Amendment made: No. 120, in page 86, line 39, leave out from beginning to end of line 42 and insert—

'( ) to be given such general information as will enable him to assess how long it is likely to be before housing accommodation appropriate to his needs becomes available for allocation to him.'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Clause 143

ALLOCATION IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE ALLOCATION SCHEME

Amendment proposed: No. 121, in page 87, line 11, leave out '(2)' and insert—

'(2A) As regards priorities, the scheme shall be framed so as to secure that reasonable preference is given to—

(a) people occupying insanitary or overcrowded housing or otherwise living in unsatisfactory housing conditions,

(b) people occupying housing accommodation which is temporary or occupied on insecure terms,

(c) families with dependent children,

(d) households consisting of or including someone who is expecting a child,

(e) households consisting of or including someone with a particular need for settled accommodation on medical or welfare grounds, and

(f) households whose social or economic circumstances are such that they have difficulty in securing settled accommodation.

The scheme shall also be framed so as to secure that additional preference is given to households within paragraph (e) consisting of someone with a particular need for settled accommodation on medical or welfare grounds who cannot reasonably be expected to find settled accommodation for themselves in the foreseeable future.

(2B) The Secretary of State may by regulations—

(a) specify further descriptions of people to whom preference is to be given as mentioned in subsection (2A), or

(b) amend or repeal any part of subsection (2A).

(2C) The Secretary of State may by regulations specify factors which a local housing authority shall not take into account in allocating housing accommodation.

(2D) As regards the procedure to be followed,'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Amendment proposed to the proposed amendment: (a), at end of paragraph (f), insert—

'(g) persons to whom the authority are, or have been, subject to a duty under sections 164, 167, 171 and 174 of this Act.'.—[Mrs. Maddock.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 271, Noes 304.

Division No. 116] [10.07 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Mrs Irene
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Ms Janet (Ros'dale)
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Austin-Walker, John
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Margaret
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Boyes, Roland
Bradley, Keith
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burden, Richard
Byers, Stephen
Cabom, Richard
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cann, Jamie
Carlile, Alexander (Montgomery)
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Cleiland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John
Cunningham, Roseanna
Dafis, Cynog
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Chris (L'Boro & S'worth)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge Hl)
Denham, John
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Etherington, Bill
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Ewing, Mrs Margaret
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fisher, Mark
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foulkes, George
Fraser, John
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Garrett, John
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godsiff, Roger
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike
Hanson, David
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harvey, Nick
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Henderson, Doug
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Hoon, Geoffrey
Howarth, Alan (Strat'rd-on-A)
Howarth, George (Knowsley North)
Howells, Dr Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Hutton, John
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, Adam
Jackson, Glenda (H'stead)
Jackson, Helen (Sheffld, H)
Jamieson, David
Janner, Greville
Jenkins, Brian (SE Staff)
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Jowell, Tessa
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Kennedy, Jane (L'pool Br'dg'n)
Khabra, Piara S
Killoyle, Peter
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Liddell, Mrs Helen
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loyden, Eddie
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAllion, John
McAvoy, Thomas
McCartney, Ian
McCartney, Robert
McFall, John
McGrady, Eddie
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Robert
McMaster, Gordon
MacShane, Denis
Maddock, Diana
Mahon, Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Martin, Michael J (Springburn)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll & Bute)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Mike (N W'kshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Pope, Greg
Powell, Ray (Ogmore)
Prentice, Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken

Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Raynsford, Nick
Reid, Dr John
Rendel, David
Robertson, George (Hamilton)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Roche, Mrs Barbara
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Salmond, Alex
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Chris (Isl'ton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Rachel (Dunfermline W)
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Steinberg, Gerry
Strang, Dr. Gavin
Straw, Jack
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Wallace, James
Walley, Joan
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert N
Watson, Mike
Welsh, Andrew
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Sw'n W)
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Wilson, Brian
Wise, Audrey
Worthington, Tony
Wray, Jimmy
Wright, Dr Tony
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Archy Kirkwood and
Mr. Simon Hughes.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Aitken, Rt Hon Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkins, Rt Hon Robert
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Rt Hon Kenneth (Mole V)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Beggs, Roy
Bendall, Vivian
Beresford, Sir Paul
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Sir Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Sir Rhodes
Brandreth, Gyles
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Sir Graham
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Brown, M (Brigg & Cl'thorpes)
Browning, Mrs Angela
Budgen, Nicholas
Burns, Simon
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Peter
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Sir Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sir Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Ru'cliff)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Coe, Sebastian
Congdon, David
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'shire)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dicks, Terry
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Sir Anthony
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Rt Hon Michael (Stirling)
Forsythe, Clifford (S Antrim)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Fox, Rt Hon Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Freeman, Rt Hon Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Sir Peter
Gale, Roger
Gallie, Phil
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, Sir John
Grant, Sir A (SW Cambs)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Grylls, Sir Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archibald
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Rt Hon Jeremy
Hannam, Sir John
Hargreaves, Andrew
Haselhurst, Sir Alan
Hawkins, Nick
Hawksley, Warren
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hendry, Charles
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Horam, John
Hordern, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Howell, Sir Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (W Hertfdshr)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, Sir David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Legg, Barry
Leigh, Edward
Lennox-Boyd, Sir Mark
Lester, Sir James (Broxtowe)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
McNair-Wilson, Sir Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mans, Keith
Marland, Paul
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Dr Brian
Mayhew, Rt Hon Sir Patrick
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Moate, Sir Roger
Molyneaux, Rt Hon Sir James
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moss, Malcolm
Needham, Rt Hon Richard
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Patnick, Sir Irvine
Patten, Rt Hon John
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Pickles, Eric
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Rt Hon Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Rathbone, Tim
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Riddick, Graham
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Ross, William (E Londonderry)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Ryder, Rt Hon Richard
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Sir Timothy
Scott, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)

Shersby, Sir Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Nicholas
Speed, Sir Keith
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Sir Michael (S Worcs)
Spink, Dr Robert
Spring, Richard
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stephen, Michael
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan
Sweeney, Walter
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, A Cecil (Belfast N)
Walker, Bill (N Tayside)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'fld)
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Michael Bates and
Mr. Gary Streeter.

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 122, in page 87, line 13, leave out 'any such regulations' and insert

'the above provisions, and to any regulations made under them,'.

No. 123, in page 87, line 14, at end insert—

'( ) Before adopting an allocation scheme, or making an alteration to their scheme reflecting a major change of policy, a local housing authority shall—

(a) send a copy of the draft scheme, or proposed alteration, to every registered social landlord with which they have nomination arrangements (see section 137(4)), and

(b) afford those persons a reasonable opportunity to comment on the proposals.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 148

REGULATIONS

Amendments made: No. 124, in page 88, line 7, leave out 'which' and insert—

'( ) No regulations shall be made under section 143(2B) (regulations amending provisions about priorities in allocating housing accommodation) unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

( ) Any other regulations under this Part'.

No. 125, in page 88, line 9, after 'Part' insert

'may contain such incidental, supplementary and transitional provisions as appear to the Secretary of State appropriate, and'.—[Mr. Curry.]

New clause 8

POWER EXERCISABLE AFTER MINIMUM PERIOD OF DUTY UNDER SECTION 167

'.—(1) Where a local housing authority have been subject to the duty under section 167 in relation to a person until the end of the minimum period, they may continue to secure that accommodation is available for his occupation.

(2) They shall not do so unless they are satisfied on a review under this section that—

(a) he has a priority need,

(b) there is no other suitable accommodation available for occupation by him in their district, and

(c) he wishes the authority to continue securing that accommodation is available for his occupation; and they shall not continue to do so for more than two years at a time unless they are satisfied on a further review under this section as to those matters.

The review shall be carried out towards the end of the minimum period, or subsequent two year period, with a view to enabling the authority to make an assessment of the likely situation at the end of that period.

(3) They shall cease to do so if events occur such that, by virtue of section 167(6) or (7), they would cease to be subject to any duty under that section.

(4) Where an authority carry out a review under this section they shall make such inquiries as they consider appropriate to determine—

(a) whether they are satisfied as to the matters mentioned in subsection (2)(a) to (c), and

(b) whether any of the events referred to in subsection (3) has occurred; and on completing the review they shall notify the applicant of their determination and of whether they propose to exercise, or continue to exercise, their power under this section.

(5) The authority may at any time, whether in consequence of a review or otherwise, give notice to the person concerned that they propose to cease exercising their power under this section in his case.

(6) The notice must specify—

(a) the day on which they will cease exercising their power under this section, and

(b) any action that they intend to take as a result, and must be given not less than the prescribed period before the day so specified.'.—[Mr. Curry.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 168

PERIODIC REVIEW OF CIRCUMSTANCES WHEN DUTY OWED

Amendment made: No. 9, in page 96, line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 23.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 153

WHETHER IT IS REASONABLE TO CONTINUE TO OCCUPY ACCOMMODATION

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 89, line 15, at end insert—

'(1A) It is not reasonable for a person to continue to occupy accommodation if the local housing authority for the area in which the accommodation is situated are satisfied that it is unfit for human habitation within the meaning of section 604 of the Housing Act 1985'.

The amendment would ensure that occupiers of housing unfit for human habitation would automatically be dealt with as homeless. It would avoid the uncertainty that can arise if a council's housing officers first decide that a property is not reasonable for continued habitation and designate it as unfit—but, when the occupier applies as homeless, the homelessness officers of the same council must ask themselves again whether the property is reasonable to occupy.

Previously, there has been a failure to dovetail the unfitness and homelessness tests, which has caused litigation. The amendment introduces a simple, workable and uniform test. I hope that the Minister will see it that way and accept the amendment.

Mr. Curry: I acknowledge the hon. Lady's concerns, but I cannot go as far as accepting her amendment. The provisions that establish whether a person is homeless are broadly stated in part III. They provide that, in considering the appellant's circumstances, housing authorities must have regard to general housing conditions in the area.

That sensible provision is rooted in the circumstances—which will particularly concern the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) in his constituency—and acknowledges that some housing authorities will be under great pressure from a lot of people seeking housing assistance. It would be unreasonable to expect an authority to assess the condition of a person's housing against an ideal absolute standard if the general condition of housing for large numbers of people presented some difficulties. An absolute standard would not be a practical proposition. I appreciate the sentiments that animate the hon. Lady's amendment, but it would not make a sensible addition to the Bill.

Mrs. Maddock: In the interests of progressing business, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 160

ELIGIBILITY FOR ASSISTANCE

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 148, in page 91, leave out from line 34 to line 2 on page 92.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 14, in page 91, line 39, leave out from 'regulations' to end of line 41 and insert

'shall not apply to a person who is not unlawfully in the UK'.

Mrs. Maddock: Amendment No. 148 would remove the Secretary of State's power to make regulations excluding persons from abroad from receiving housing assistance under part VII—a proposal that has the support of many people who have to deal with persons who come to our country and are in housing need.

Clause 160 empowers the Secretary of State to exclude certain groups of people from emergency housing, and, although they are not defined, the Department proposes that they should be groups who are ineligible for housing benefit. We want to ensure that they still receive housing advice. I hope that the Minister will look favourably on that proposal, which has widespread support.

Mr. Curry: The issue raised by these amendments is whether people who have sought leave to enter the country on the understanding that they should have no recourse to public funds should be entitled to set aside that undertaking. The immigration rules state explicitly that the homelessness legislation falls within the definition of public funds.

People who have applied for asylum after entering the country will have obtained their leave to enter by satisfying the entry clearance officer that they have the resources to maintain themselves. Only 5 per cent. of asylum applications are eventually accepted; even allowing for exceptional leave granted on compassionate grounds, the refusal rate is still 79 per cent.

The purpose of the homelessness legislation is to ensure that families of vulnerable individuals who lose their home through no fault of their own are provided with a proper safety net. It is one component of a wider set of welfare provisions that we have in place to help people through a crisis and continue their normal lives, but it focuses, naturally and rightly, on people who are settled in this country.

I appreciate the hon. Lady's concerns, but she will know that I must ensure that there is consistency between the proposed legislation and legislation passed by the House. She will understand, therefore, that I must reject her amendments.

Mrs. Maddock: I understand what the Minister has said, but I wish to press the amendment. If the Government want to shout it down, they can do so.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 163

PRIORITY NEED FOR ACCOMMODATION

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 93, line 27, at end insert—

'(e) any young person aged 16 or 17'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 7, in page 93, line 27, at end insert—

'(e) a person who qualifies for advice and assistance under section 24(2) of the Children Act 1989 or who is taken to be in need under section 17(10) of that Act.'.

Mrs. Maddock: These amendments are about giving priority need to young people and to children.

Amendment No. 6 says that 16 and 17-year-olds should be classed as priority need when they seek advice from local government.

Amendment No. 7 is supported by many children's societies, including Barnardo's. In the past two days, I have received a letter from Centre Point, which is very anxious about this amendment, the purpose of which is to ensure that young people leaving care, or those assessed as being in priority need under the Children Act 1989, are regarded as having priority for homeless assistance. The amendment is supported by Barnardo's, the Children's Society, NCH Action for Children, Family Service Units, the St. Christopher Fellowship, the Catholic Children's Society, and Save the Children.

Centre Point has pointed out that, during 1994-95, despite the Children Act, 38 per cent. of homeless young people seen by Centre Point were 17 years old or younger, and that 86 per cent. of them had been forced to leave home.

[Mrs. Maddock]

[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish!"] I am hearing sedentary interventions that say that this is rubbish. That is precisely the attitude that causes young people to be scapegoated.

In my area, before Christmas, when a charity made an appeal to help young homeless people and give them places in a hostel where they would get help to continue their education and do their job, it received hate mail. We have heard from some hon. Members tonight who think that, if young people are homeless, it is their own fault, or that they wished to leave their family. I suggest that those hon. Members go to a hostel, as I did, and speak to them. Are hon. Members saying that Centre Point—a charity that I thought we all recognised does good work—is wrong? I can supply them with the excellent documentation that it has provided.

We are asking that the Minister amends the Bill to ensure that legislation works together, and that the Children Act means something. There is evidence throughout the country that the Housing Act and the Children Act do not work together properly. This is our opportunity. The amendment has the support of many hon. Members in the House, and of all the groups I mentioned.

I hope that the Minister will take the amendment on board. It is sensible and simple; all he has to do is accept it on behalf of all young people who need help to mount the ladder of life rather than being pushed off the bottom rung.

10.30 pm

Mr. Curry: I would be sorry if the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) pressed the amendment to a vote, thereby encapsulating a difference of view that I do not think exists in practice.

The choice is between a statutory entitlement and finding a more integrated approach to tackling a problem that I fully recognise. My own dealings with the rough sleepers initiative have shown me how difficult life can be for some young people. I know that, even in my rural constituency, youngsters, particularly those going from a background of care into foyer projects, need considerable support to give them the confidence—if nothing else—to cope with life.

The question does not really relate to the concerns involved; it relates to whether one route is better than the other. We need a comprehensive approach. For example, young people under 18 cannot hold a legal estate in land, so there are practical problems in giving them tenancies. There is some doubt about whether they can live by themselves, unsupported, at that age. Entitlement under the homelessness legislation does exist for that group: under clause 163, anyone who is vulnerable has priority need. We do, however, need to consider carefully what can be done to give young people better access to permanent social housing.

The proposals on referrals would allow local housing authorities to make accommodation available to young people referred to them by an appropriate welfare agency, where there is enough support, without having to compete with others on the housing register. In the light of the consultations on regulations, I am seriously considering the possibility of requiring a local authority to give an entitlement to register to anyone over the age of 18 who has been living in the area for a specified period. Anyone in that group to whom a reasonable preference should be afforded under the allocation criteria could expect to receive serious consideration for social housing under the register.

The homelessness code of guidance was written before the Children Act came into effect. It needs updating in the light of experience gained from its operation, and to link with the new provisions in the Bill. I shall use the opportunity to make clear the real need for the different services to work together to meet young people's needs, and to suggest how that may be done. We need the co-operation of the Department of Health, which has the main responsibility for the Children Act.

I believe that that integrated approach is right. If, while we are preparing the package, it becomes apparent that the current legislation is inadequate, or is being intepreted too restrictively by some housing authorities, I shall be prepared to use the order-making power to ensure that the legislation takes proper account of the needs of vulnerable young people. I think that that is the right way forward.

I do not want to have to advise the House to reject the amendment, because that would suggest the existence of a divide between us, which, in practical terms, does not exist.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister do one more thing? He must try to persuade some of his Back Benchers that young people leaving home are not leaving some luxury accommodation where all is happiness and light and everyone gets on swimmingly in order to move, at public expense, to equally luxurious accommodation where they can be on their own.

The Minister knows from his experience, as I know from mine, that most young people who leave home end up in a much more precarious position. The accommodation with which they may be provided, under statutory instrument or other legislation, is normally hostel accommodation. It is by nature temporary, and involves living with other people. It is not ideal; it is not long-term. We must get away from the idea that this is a jolly good thing which young people use to exploit the system.

The Minister's experience, like mine, will tell him that we risk seeing more and more young people, for whatever reason, leaving home and becoming the sort of people with whom the rough sleepers initiative must deal. All the centres I visited in the winter told me that more young people were turning up than in previous years. The state is not suddenly giving young people independence and a life of luxury. If we can make that message understood, we can start to respond in a way that ensures that, whatever the law says, we treat youngsters as a priority. If we can make them secure when they are young, they are far more likely to become secure adults who bring up secure families in secure homes.

Mr. Curry: That is one reason why the winter shelter programme will be extended next year to provide up to 450 beds—with, of course, specialist provision for those in particular need.

Mrs. Maddock: I know that the Minister takes the matter very seriously, and I hear what he says. If hon. Members who have been dismissive look at the figures, they will see that the majority of young people who have presented themselves as homeless left their families because they had been abused—often physically, and often sexually. The issue is incredibly important. The Minister has made a very good case for amendment No. 7, and I shall press it to a vote.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed: No. 7, in page 93, line 27, at end insert:

'(e) a person who qualifies for advice and assistance under section 24(2) of the Children Act 1989 or who is taken to be in need under section 17(10) of that Act.'.—[Mrs. Maddock.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 252, Noes 291.

Division No. 117] [10.37 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Mrs Irene
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Austin-Walker, John
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Margaret
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Bradley, Keith
Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burden, Richard
Byers, Stephen
Cabom, Richard
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cann, Jamie
Carlile, Alexander (Montgomery)
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John
Cunningham, Roseanna
Dafis, Cynog
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Chris (L'Boro & S'worth)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge H')
Denham, John
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Etherington, Bill
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Ewing, Mrs Margaret
Fatchett, Derek
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godsiff, Roger
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike
Hanson, David
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harvey, Nick
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Henderson, Doug
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Hoon, Geoffrey
Howarth, Alan (Strat'rd-on-A)
Howarth, George (Knowsley North)
Howells, Dr Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Hutton, John
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, Adam
Jackson, Glenda (H'stead)
Jackson, Helen (Sheffld, H)
Jamieson, David
Jenkins, Brian (SE Staff)
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Jowell, Tessa
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Kennedy, Jane (L'pool Br'dg'n)
Khabra, Piara S
Kilfoyle, Peter
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Liddell, Mrs Helen
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loyden, Eddie
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAllion, John
McAvoy, Thomas
McCartney, Ian
McCartney, Robert
McFall, John
McGrady, Eddie
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Robert
McMaster, Gordon
MacShane, Denis
Maddock, Diana
Mahon, Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Martin, Michael J (Springburn)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll & Bute)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Mike (N W'kshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
Oliner, Bill
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Pope, Greg
Prentice, Bridget (Lew'm E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Raynsford, Nick
Reid, Dr John
Rendel, David
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Roche, Mrs Barbara
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, Jeff
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Salmond, Alex
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Chris (Isl'ton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Rachel (Dunfermline W)
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Steinberg, Gerry
Straw, Jack
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Wallace, James
Walley, Joan
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert N
Watson, Mike
Welsh, Andrew
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Sw'n W)
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Worthington, Tony
Wray, Jimmy
Wright, Dr Tony
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Archy Kirkwood and
Mr. Simon Hughes.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Aitken, Rt Hon Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James

Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkins, Rt Hon Robert
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Rt Hon Kenneth (Mole V)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Beggs, Roy
Bendall, Vivian
Beresford, Sir Paul
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Sir Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Sir Rhodes
Brandreth, Gyles
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Sir Graham
Brown, M (Brigg & Cl'thorpes)
Browning, Mrs Angela
Burns, Simon
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Peter
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Sir Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sir Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Ru'cliff)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Coe, Sebastian
Congdon, David
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'ire)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dicks, Terry
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Sir Anthony
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Rt Hon Michael (Stirling)
Forsythe, Clifford (S Antrim)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Fox, Rt Hon Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Freeman, Rt Hon Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Sir Peter
Gale, Roger
Gallie, Phil
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, Sir John
Grant, Sir A (SW Cambs)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Grylls, Sir Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archibald
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Rt Hon Jeremy
Hannam, Sir John
Hargreaves, Andrew
Haselhurst, Sir Alan
Hawkins, Nick
Hawksley, Warren
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hendry, Charles
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Horam, John
Hordern, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Howell, Sir Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (W Hertfdshr)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, Sir David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Legg, Barry
Leigh, Edward
Lennox-Boyd, Sir Mark
Lester, Sir James (Broxtowe)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
McNair-Wilson, Sir Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mans, Keith
Marland, Paul
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Dr Brian
Mayhew, Rt Hon Sir Patrick
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Moate, Sir Roger
Molyneaux, Rt Hon Sir James
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moss, Malcolm
Needham, Rt Hon Richard
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Patnick, Sir Irvine
Patten, Rt Hon John
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Pickles, Eric
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Rt Hon Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Rathbone, Tim
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Riddick, Graham
Riffkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Ross, William (E Londonderry)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Ryder, Rt Hon Richard
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Sir Timothy
Scott, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Sir Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Nicholas
Speed, Sir Keith
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Sir Michael (S Worcs)
Spink, Dr Robert
Spring, Richard
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Stephen, Michael
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan
Sweeney, Walter
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, A Cecil (Belfast N)
Walker, Bill (N Tayside)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'fld)
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Michael Bates and
Mr. Gary Streeter.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 167

DUTY TO PERSONS WITH PRIORITY NEED WHO ARE NOT HOMELESS INTENTIONALLY

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 94, leave out lines 44 to 45.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 8, in page 95, leave out lines 1 to 17 and insert—

'(2) Unless the authority refer the application to anther local housing authority they shall secure that permanent accommodation is available for occupation by the applicant.'.

No. 15, in page 95, line 4, leave out from 'authority' to end of line 20 and insert

'shall take reasonable steps thereafter to secure that accommodation does not cease to be available for his occupation.'

No. 34, in clause 171, page 97, leave out lines 29 to 40.

No. 18, in page 97, leave out from end of line 37 to line 40 and insert

'and which it may reasonably be expected will remain available for his occupation until the authority would be entitled to carry out a review under section [Power exercisable after minimum period of duty under section 167].

(2) In that case, their only duty is to furnish him with such advice and assistance as will secure that suitable accommodation is available.'.

Mrs. Maddock: I do not intend to detain the House long. Hon. Members have been most patient, and I am most grateful for the presence of so many of them. We have rehearsed the arguments time and again. The group of amendments is about the provision of permanent accommodation for homeless people. We have already lost the vote on that issue, but if the amendments were accepted they would give priority to such provision.

If we had persuaded the Government of our case, the amendments would have provided extra ways of ensuring that the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 would not be undone. I realise that we are not securing Ministers' support on the issue, but what they are doing represents a retrograde step, because we are talking about homeless families.

It is amazing that, although the Government claim to represent the party of the family, what Conservative Members have voted for will mean that homeless families with children are pushed into temporary accommodation because they cannot be given permanent housing. The Minister has moved a little, and said that people can have temporary accommodation for two years; at one time the limit was one year. Nevertheless, I repeat to him and to the House what I told him in Committee: when one is two years old, two years is a long time. Moreover, survey after survey has shown the effect on young children when families have to keep moving about.

If the Government accepted our amendments, and with them the proposition that a homeless family with young children needs permanent accommodation, the position would be transformed. The housing benefit bill will soar as a result of the legislation, as more and more people are put into temporary accommodation, so the amendments, like the others that we have tabled, would be in the interests not only of homeless families but of the public purse.

I shall listen with interest to the Minister, although I know that he will repeat the arguments that we have heard before. I do not doubt his sincerity. Earlier he accused me of taking too political an attitude to the issue, but the fact is that Conservative Members have been whipped through to vote against our amendments, which we consider important, especially for homeless families. I hope that when those hon. Members go home tonight they will reflect on the fact that what they have done will work against the interests of the families with young children who are some of the most vulnerable people in our society.

Mr. Curry: I cannot accept the amendments. As the hon. Lady has acknowledged, her amendment would go against the essential purposes of the Bill. Our purpose is to create circumstances in which we can assess people's underlying needs and provide emergency help in all cases, but then provide access to secure long-term accommodation only to those who really need it, because of the benefit that that confers.

I appreciate the hon. Lady's point about families. We are concerned that their needs should be taken into account, and she will find that, in the manner in which we implement the legislation, we shall seek to bring that about. However, she will recognise the fact that she is really asking me to undo the measures at the heart of this part of the Bill. Equally, she will appreciate that I am not prepared to do that. I am sorry that we are divided on that but it is best to be honest about it.

Mrs. Maddock: I am not at all surprised at the Minister's answer. As I said, we have rehearsed the arguments before. In the interests of moving on and because of what has been voted down, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 168

PERIODIC REVIEW OF CIRCUMSTANCES WHERE DUTY OWED

Amendment made: No. 9, in page 96, line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 23.—[Mr. Curry.]

Clause 177

DISCHARGE OF FUNCTIONS BY LOCAL HOUSING AUTHORITIES

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 149, in page 101, line 17, at end insert—

This does not apply where the person concerned is entitled to reasonable preference in the allocation of housing accommodation under Part VI of this Act.'.

Again I shall be brief. The amendment would remove the two-year restriction on the use of a local authority's stock to provide temporary accommodation. Under the Bill, if a local authority houses a homeless family in its own stock in the two-year period, that family will have to be taken out of that property. It is madness. We tried to persuade the Minister in Committee, where he was pressed heavily by all members about how it would work. Is he saying that a family that has been in a local authority tenancy for two years because it was the best place to put them when they were homeless will have to be moved out? That is not sensible. The Minister has argued that it is sensible and I am sure that he will again.

Mr. Curry: I am afraid that the hon. Lady is right. The provision is necessary to buttress the two-year rule.

[Mr. Curry]

Housing associations are a different matter. I intend to try to extend the leasing arrangements in private sector accommodation so as to give local authorities a better and higher-quality alternative in the private rented sector. However the rule is central to buttressing the two-year duty. She will acknowledge that we have extended it to two years. I am afraid that I am unable to accept the amendment.

Mrs. Maddock: I acknowledge that the Minister extended the period to two years and welcome the fact that he will consider helping housing associations and others to use private sector accommodation that they manage to house homeless families for rather longer than the lets that such people might have got in the private sector. In view of the amendments that have been voted down, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 7

MORTGAGE REPOSSESSIONS

'.—(1) For the purposes of section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 and section 8 of the Administration of Justice Act 1973 (under which a court has power to delay giving a mortgagee possession of the mortgaged property so as to allow the mortgagor a reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage) there shall be a presumption that the full remaining period of the mortgage term is the reasonable period.

(2) The court may exercise any of its powers under this section notwithstanding that the court may have exercised its powers under this section on a previous occasion.'.—[Mr. Raynsford.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Raynsford: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 7 deals with mortgage repossessions, which are a serious cause for concern throughout the country. Approximately 1,000 people a week lose their homes through repossessions. More than 300,000 households have suffered that fate over the past six years. That is a human disaster for all those families. They have suffered the grief and anguish of repossession, but it has also had a damaging impact on the housing market. The market has received a constant flood of repossessed properties at a time when there is little confidence in the private market.

It is right to consider the need to do more to tackle the problem of repossessions, both to help people at risk of repossession and to ensure that there are measures to help to restore confidence in the market. New clause 7 is designed to build on the recent court judgment that established the principle that a mortgagor should be given a proper opportunity—a reasonable period—to repay debts due under the mortgage. It would give statutory effect to that court judgment to assist in the development of good practice by lenders so that they explore all reasonable alternatives to repossession. Several initiatives have already been taken, including options for shared ownership schemes. The measure would be a further weapon in the armoury to try to reduce the unacceptable toll of human casualties caused by repossession. I hope that the Minister will respond sympathetically to this initiative to help those victims.

Mr. Clappison: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. If he carefully studies the Court of Appeal case to which he referred, he will find that it makes his amendment unnecessary. The amendment would create a presumption, but that recent case provides strong authority for the proposition that judges should take, as the starting point for determining what constitutes a reasonable period for repayment of arrears outstanding on a mortgage, the remaining term of the mortgage.

11 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I support the new clause, as does my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock), and I hear what the Minister says. The important thing is that we get into the heads of the building societies, the lenders and those with a financial interest the fact that they must, as a duty, consider alternative ways of re-financing. There are some good schemes—Rowntree has one in York which I have visited and there are others—that allow people to staircase up and down and move from up to 90 per cent. ownership down to 10 per cent., if financial circumstances require. If people are given half a chance, as the Minister and the Department know well, there are often ways in which they can reorganise their finances. The Bill must deal with unemployment and temporary financial difficulties. If what the Minister says is right, all courts should follow that authority unless it is overturned. There is a risk that it would be overturned.

Mr. Clappison indicated dissent.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that it is only a slight risk—if the matter went to the House of Lords. The Minister has an obligation not just to rely on the Court of Appeal current judgment but to ensure that the Department always makes it clear to building societies that the principle most recently enunciated in that judgment is the one that they should follow. He should ensure that the courts understand that and, above all, that purchasers understand it. There should be a trigger whereby, if people run into financial difficulty, they will go into a process of renegotiating their mortgage and will not suddenly be at risk of being turfed out of their home, which might be the most secure place for them and for the investment, for both parties in the proceedings.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Am I not right in thinking that the Council of Mortgage Lenders and the Building Societies Association have issued a consultative document on a code of practice? Surely that very much meets the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford). Am I not also right in believing—I say this with some pride and satisfaction, as I have campaigned consistently about the housing market for the past two years—that, for the past three or four months, the number of people in negative equity has dropped dramatically and is now well below 1 million, having been up to perhaps 1.4 million?

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend is right on both points. Guidance has been issued and negative equity is, fortunately, declining.

Mr. Raynsford: In response to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), our argument is not with the Council of Mortgage Lenders, which has issued guidance, but with the Government, who have presided over the worst catastrophe of repossessions that the country has known—a Government who have watched 1,000 people lose their homes through repossession every week and who have done nothing in the Housing Bill to tackle the problem of repossessions. That is why we raised that issue tonight and why we will continue to campaign—not just on that but on many other issues—for measures to assist home owners in difficulty, to give them help and a prospect of getting out of their difficulty.

I do not intend to press the new clause further tonight, but I give notice that the Labour party will return to the issue between now and the general election. The Government will pay a heavy price for all those people who have suffered repossession in the past six years. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 31

INDEPENDENT HOUSING ADVICE

'. The Housing Corporation shall have a duty to ensure that within the area of each local housing authority there exists a registered independent housing advice agency competent to deal with inquiries from all tenants or would–be tenants, owner–occupiers, or would–be owner–occupiers, and those who have shared ownership properties or wish to become part–owners/part–tenants.'.—[Mr. Simon Hughes.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Hon. Members will be happy to know that we are getting towards the end of the amendments.

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman's pager is going off.

Mr. Hughes: I know, the red light is flashing. It is a warning for the Government, not for us. I shall not read out the message, because it may be inappropriate. The advice that people are currently given is inadequate to protect would-be tenants, would-be shared owners and would-be purchasers. The new clause would establish an independent, recognised housing advice agency in every local authority area. We would need to promote the work of such agencies.

I am sure that the Minister is aware that some people enter into tenancy agreements—particularly in the private sector—but do not know what they are letting themselves in for. Clearly, they have not taken good or competent advice. Many people have bought their own properties—particularly from local authorities as leaseholders—without having been given proper advice by their lawyers. Those people should have the opportunity to take action against their then legal advisers, but that would be the long way around.

The most recent example—I shared it with hon. Members in another context yesterday—relates to people who have gone into shared ownership arrangements but who have not understood all the implications—in other words, they have been caught. We have to ensure that when people become owner-occupiers, share owners or tenants, they understand the score. They should not be subjected to propaganda that persuades them that owner-occupation is what they want—it may be the last thing they need. I hope that the Minister can give a helpful response.

Mr. Clappison: It is important that people receive advice in these situations. However, the Housing Corporation is not the right body to provide that advice. The hon. Gentleman will see that clause 154 places a duty on local authorities to provide such advice. The Department of the Environment also provides substantial funding for various voluntary bodies to provide such advice. They are the right people to provide the advice.

Mr. Hughes: I ask the Minister to reflect on whether the local authority is always the appropriate body—it has a vested interest as it is the landlord of a lot of the stock and it is the one that sells under the right to buy. Is the Minister satisfied that there is a recognised advice agency that is independent of the local authority in each local authority area, at least in England?

Mr. Clappison: I assure the hon. Gentleman that organisations such as Shelter and the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux are provided with funding from the Department of the Environment to provide the sort of advice that he described.

Mr. Hughes: It would be helpful for all hon. Members to have that information for our constituents, and I encourage that. So long as people are given advice, they will not get into a muddle. I hope that the advice will be clear in the future. On the basis that the Government will seek to ensure that that advice is given to everyone, and that people are not subject to propaganda in the future in the way they have been in the past, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 192

THE ISLES OF SCILLY

Amendment made: No. 126, in page 108, line 32, leave out 'amendment' and insert 'annulment'.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Schedule 16

REPEALS

Amendments made: No. 142, in page 174, line 32, leave out from beginning to end of line 23 on page 176 and insert—

Chapter	Short title	Extent of repeal
1985 c. 69.	Housing Associations Act 1985.	Sections 3 to 8. Section 9(1) and (4). Section 11. Sections 13 to 32. Section 36A. Section 60. Section 67. Section 69(1)(e) and (g). Schedules 2 and 3.
1988 c. 9.	Local Government Act 1988.	Section 24(5)(a) and (c).
1988 c. 50.	Housing Act 1988.	Sections 48 and 49. Section 55(1)(a). Section 58.

		In Schedule 6, paragraphs 3 to 6 and 9 to 23.
1989 c. 42.	Local Government and Housing Act 1989.	Section 182.
1993 c. 10.	Charities Act 1993.	In Schedule 6, paragraph 21(3).
1993 c. 28.	Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993.'	Section 134.

No. 24, in page 178, line 17, column 3, leave out 'subsection' and insert 'subsections'.

No. 25, in page 178, line 17, column 3, at end insert ', (6) and (7).'.

No. 153, in page 178, column 3, leave out line 18 and insert—

'In section 39, in subsection (3), the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b), and subsection (6).'.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Clause 198

EXTENT

Amendment made: No. 126A, in page 109, line 40, leave out from beginning to end of line 6 on page 110 and insert—

'(4) Any amendment or repeal by this Act of an enactment has the same extent as the enactment amended or repealed, except that amendments or repeals of—

(a) provisions of the Housing Associations Act 1985, or

(b) provisions of the Housing Act 1988 relating to registered housing associations, do not extend to Scotland.

(5) Any power conferred by this Act to make consequential amendments or repeals of enactments may be exercised in relation to enactments as they extend to any part of the United Kingdom.'.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent and Prince of Wales's Consent signified.]

11.8 pm

Mr. Curry: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is an excellent Bill, and I commend it to the House.

11.9 pm

Mr. Raynsford: Although I would be delighted to be as brief as the Minister, I shall detain the House, but for no more than three minutes. I have three minutes to cover a Bill that affects the lives of millions of people, and that, sadly, will make an already bad housing situation much worse for many of those people. Three minutes to cover the problems of the homeless, the problems that are inadequately dealt with by the Bill, and that will become very much worse for those who will be condemned to revolving-door homelessness, and insecurity and misery as a result of the Bill.

I have two minutes to cover the problems of all those people seeking decent housing who will not get it because the Bill does nothing to expand the programme of rented housing when we need an expanded programme of investment in rented housing. There is nothing in the Bill to tackle the problem of all those home owners in difficulty, who fear that their homes will be repossessed, not to mention the million or so still trapped in negative equity.

Two minutes to cover those people who are inadequately catered for by the Bill, which tinkers with the problems rather than providing effective responses. I think especially of leaseholders, whose prospects were betrayed by the Government today. Leaseholders had a prospect of effective remedies against crooked landlords and effective prospects of enfranchising their homes, but their hopes were dashed by a Government who are in hock to the big landlords and more interested in the party's financial interests than in the safety and the prospects of leaseholders.

This is a bad, inadequate Bill, which has not coped with the country's housing needs and will, in many ways, make the problem worse. We sought to make substantial amendments to the Bill in Committee; we made many amendments. Sadly, not all those amendments have survived today, but I have the following message for the Government: "Your party will reap a very serious penalty for your actions today in turning against leaseholders and denying them the prospect of enfranchisement and sanctions against rogue landlords. Very many Tory candidates in marginal constituencies will bitterly rue the day your party betrayed leaseholders in the House."

The Labour party commits itself to a housing policy that addresses the needs of the whole nation—that copes with the needs of home owners, tenants, leaseholders and homeless people. We recognise our responsibility to introduce a proper housing policy as soon as the general election has swept the present discredited Government away. They will be remembered for the disastrous failure of their housing policy. Their time is running out.

11.12 pm

Mrs. Maddock: I acknowledge that the Minister responded very positively to many of the suggestions that we made in Committee and in the House today. Not least, I welcome the fact that homeless families will have a right to be looked after for two years. It is a shame that it will not be permanent accommodation.

I welcome the fact that, in response to many of our worries, the Minister made changes to the Bill regarding regulations. He expressed concern earlier that I spoke about the Bill being political, but it is a fact that Conservative Members were whipped through the Division Lobby tonight to vote against the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act, which has worked well since 1977. Conservative Members voted against a long-term solution for the most vulnerable people, who have had most difficulties in life.

It was the Government who, in their last Budget, broke their promise on their commitments to spending on social housing, and in that Budget halved the amount that they had promised the year before. The Bill will mean that more people will be in temporary accommodation and increase the already burgeoning housing benefit budget. Much of that money will be spent on some of the worst accommodation in the country.

The Bill's tragedy is that it has done nothing to increase the supply of housing. That is the problem; that is why there has been an argument. How do we fit the vast number of people seeking housing into the ever-dwindling supply? This year, we shall build 50,000 new units—the fewest in any year since the war. That is the real problem, and that is the tragedy of what we have done here tonight.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

The House divided: Ayes 286, Noes 256.

Division No. 118] [11.14 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Aitken, Rt Hon Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael (Selby)
Allason, Rupert (Torbay)
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkins, Rt Hon Robert
Atkinson, David (Bour'mouth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Rt Hon Kenneth (Mole V)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Bates, Michael
Batiste, Spencer
Bendall, Vivian
Beresford, Sir Paul
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Booth, Hartley
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Eltham)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Bowden, Sir Andrew
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Sir Rhodes
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Sir Graham
Brown, M (Brigg & Cl'thorpes)
Browning, Mrs Angela
Burns, Simon
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Peter
Carlisle, John (Luton North)
Carlisle, Sir Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sir Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Ru'clif)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Coe, Sebastian
Congdon, David
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Currie, Mrs Edwina (S D'by'shire)
Curry, David (Skipton & Ripon)
Davies, Quentin (Stamford)
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Devlin, Tim
Dicks, Terry
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Sir Anthony
Elletson, Harold
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatfield)
Evans, Jonathan (Brecon)
Evans, Nigel (Ribble Valley)
Evans, Roger (Monmouth)
Evennett, David
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fenner, Dame Peggy
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Rt Hon Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam (Woodspring)
Fox, Rt Hon Sir Marcus (Shipley)
Freeman, Rt Hon Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Sir Peter
Gale, Roger
Gallie, Phil
Gardiner, Sir George
Garel-Jones, Rt Hon Tristan
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, Sir John
Grant, Sir A (SW Cambs)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Grylls, Sir Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archibald
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Rt Hon Jeremy
Hannam, Sir John
Hargreaves, Andrew
Haselhurst, Sir Alan
Hawkins, Nick
Hawksley, Warren
Heald, Oliver
Hendry, Charles
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Higgins, Rt Hon Sir Terence
Hill, James (Southampton Test)
Horam, John
Hordern, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Howell, Sir Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunt, Rt Hon David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Jack, Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (W Hertfdshr)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Bir'm E'st'n)
Knox, Sir David
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Rt Hon Ian
Lawrence, Sir Ivan
Legg, Barry
Leigh, Edward
Lennox-Boyd, Sir Mark
Lester, Sir James (Broxtowe)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
McNair-Wilson, Sir Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Maitland, Lady Olga
Major, Rt Hon John
Malone, Gerald
Mans, Keith
Marland, Paul
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Dr Brian
Mayhew, Rt Hon Sir Patrick
Mellor, Rt Hon David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Moate, Sir Roger
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moss, Malcolm
Needham, Rt Hon Richard
Neubert, Sir Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Sir Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Patnick, Sir Irvine
Patten, Rt Hon John
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Pickles, Eric
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Rt Hon Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Rathbone, Tim
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Richards, Rod
Riddick, Graham
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Robathan, Andrew
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Rumbold, Rt Hon Dame Angela
Ryder, Rt Hon Richard
Sackville, Tom
Sainsbury, Rt Hon Sir Timothy
Scott, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shephard, Rt Hon Gillian
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Sir Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Nicholas
Speed, Sir Keith
Spencer, Sir Derek
Spicer, Sir James (W Dorset)
Spicer, Sir Michael (S Worcs)
Spink, Dr Robert
Spring, Richard
Sproat, Iain
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stephen, Michael
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan
Streeter, Gary
Sweeney, Walter
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy (Southend, E)
Thomason, Roy
Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Sir Malcolm
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Rt Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (N Tayside)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Sir Jerry

Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Nicholas (Macc'fld)
Wolfson, Mark
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Gyles Brandreth and Mr. Timothy Wood.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Mrs Irene
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Austin-Walker, John
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Margaret
Beggs, Roy
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Bradley, Keith
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burden, Richard
Byers, Stephen
Cabom, Richard
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cann, Jamie
Carlile, Alexander (Montgomery)
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr David (South Shields)
Clarke, Eric (Midlothian)
Clarke, Tom (Monklands W)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Covy SE)
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John
Cunningham, Roseanna
Dafis, Cynog
Darling, Alistair
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Bryan (Oldham C'tral)
Davies, Chris (L'Boro & S'worth)
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'dge H'l)
Denham, John
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Ms Angela
Eastham, Ken
Etherington, Bill
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Fatchett, Derek
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Bruce
Gerrard, Neil
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godsiff, Roger
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike
Hanson, David
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harvey, Nick
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Henderson, Doug
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, Norman (Cumbernauld)
Hoon, Geoffrey
Howarth, Alan (Strat'rd-on-A)
Howarth, George (Knowsley North)
Howells, Dr Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen North)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hutton, John
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, Adam
Jackson, Glenda (H'stead)
Jackson, Helen (Shef'ld, H)
Jamieson, David
Jenkins, Brian (SE Staff)
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn and D'side)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Lynne (B'ham S O)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd, SW)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Jowell, Tessa
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keen, Alan
Kennedy, Charles (Ross,C&S)
Kennedy, Jane (L'pool Br'dg'n)
Khabra, Piara S
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kirkwood, Archy
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Liddell, Mrs Helen
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loyden, Eddie
Lynne, Ms Liz
McAllion, John
McAvoy, Thomas
McCartney, Ian
McCartney, Robert
McFall, John
McGrady, Eddie
McKelvey, William
Mackinlay, Andrew
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Robert
McMaster, Gordon
MacShane, Denis
Maddock, Diana
Mahon, Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester, S)
Martin, Michael J (Springburn)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Argyll & Bute)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, Mike (N W'kshire)
O'Brien, William (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Pope, Greg
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Primarolo, Dawn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Raynsford, Nick
Reid, Dr John
Rendel, David
Robertson, George (Hamilton)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Roche, Mrs Barbara
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, Jeff
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Ross, William (E Londonderry)
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Salmond, Alex
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Chris (Is'ton S & F'sbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Rachel (Dunfermline W)
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Steinberg, Gerry
Straw, Jack
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Walker, A Cecil (Belfast N)
Wallace, James
Walley, Joan
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert N
Watson, Mike
Welsh, Andrew
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Sw'n W)
Williams, Alan W (Carmarthen)
Worthington, Tony
Wray, Jimmy
Wright, Dr Tony
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mrs. Bridget Prentice and Mr. Clive Betts.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

DEER (AMENDMENT) (SCOTLAND) BILL [LORDS]

Ordered,

That the Deer (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with as if it had been certified by the Speaker as relating exclusively to Scotland.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 94E(2),

That the Bill be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Question agreed to.

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That—

(1) the Order of the House [11th December] be further amended, in paragraph 8, by leaving out the words 'in Scotland on Monday 20th May' and inserting the words 'in the Glen Pavilion, Dunfermline, on Monday 20th May to take Questions for oral answer and'; and, notwithstanding the Order of the House [29th January], the Chairman shall interrupt the proceedings on Monday 20th May at half-past One o'clock; and

(2) notwithstanding the Order of the House [29th January], at the meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee on Monday 13th May, proceedings on the substantive Motion for the Adjournment of the Committee shall lapse at One o'clock and if thereafter a Motion be made by a Minister of the Crown, pursuant to Standing Order No. 94E(3) (Scottish Grand Committee (bills in relation to their principle)) to extend the proceedings of the Committee, the Chairman shall interrupt those proceedings at Three o'clock, if not previously concluded.—[Mr. Knapman.]

WILDLIFE BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Wildlife Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other enactment.—[Mr. Knapman.]

PETITION

Television Broadcasts (Cyprus)

11.28 pm

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): I have pleasure in presenting the petition of Mr. Andreas Karaolis of 30 Hamilton way, London N3, Mr. Anthony Mitsides of 30 Cissbury ring south, London N12, Mr. Chrisanthou Savvakis of 32 Totteridge common, London N20 and Mr. Jimmy Apostolou of 30 North crescent, London N3 and 10,000 others.

I wish to pay tribute to the Cyprus Mail and to its chief reporter for all the work that they have done in collecting and collating the petition. The petition declares:

that they are against the decision of the Ministry of Defence to fund in full the estimated £500,000 minimal costs associated with the scrambling of television pictures broadcast in Cyprus via Sight and Sound Vision Corporation for service men and women posted to the island. And the Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons do not introduce such costly restrictions which wouldn't be in the UK's interest in Cyprus nor is wanted amongst the large British expatriate community, other British passport holders and the majority of Cypriots who speak the English language.

And the Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Revenue Support Grant (Essex)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Knapman.]

11.28 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): The debate tonight is about local government finance, but in particular it is about the Labour and Liberal coalition on Basildon district council disgracefully wasting local council tax payers' money and, even more seriously, about the irresponsibility of Labour and Liberal-controlled Essex county council.

I am sure that the House can understand how angry I am at the visit of the Labour leader to my constituency yesterday. There is a time-honoured convention that when an hon. Member visits another constituency, its Member of Parliament is extended the courtesy of being sent a note to advise him of the visit. I received no such note from the Labour leader. I understand that another Labour Member was also there, but he did not send me a note either. Last week, a Labour Front-Bench education spokesman was in my constituency. Again, I received no note. I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to draw that discourtesy to the attention of Madam Speaker. It is disgraceful that the Leader of the Opposition failed to observe a time-honoured tradition.

I am delighted that so many of my hon. Friends are present, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) and my hon. Friends the Members for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), for Castle Point (Dr. Spink), for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) and for Romford (Sir M. Neubert). Their attendance shows the importance that Essex Members of Parliament attach to the issue.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Has my hon. Friend noted the absence from the Labour Benches of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay)?

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point as I am advised that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) was the Labour Member who visited my constituency yesterday together with rent-a-mob; yet he could not take the trouble to turn up for this debate.

The Labour leader was in my constituency supposedly as a boost to the local government elections. He was quoted in a newspaper today commenting on myself:

"Basildon is an interesting place in which to have our local election campaign since it is the seat of a Conservative MP who has now decided to go elsewhere. I think that what that indicates is that the degree to which Essex man and Essex woman is coming over to today's Labour Party."

When my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister visited my constituency two years ago, I did not telephone people asking them to greet him. My right hon. Friend came to visit the hospital without my gathering any crowds for him. I have received reports of the scenes in my constituency yesterday. Labour Members gathered together groups of Labour activists to surround the Labour leader. Even worse, known socialist activists were going up to the right hon. Gentleman on camera and in front of local newspaper reporters, pretending that they had been lifelong Conservatives but would vote Labour in the next election. The House deplores that sort of manipulation of the media. The Labour leader was supposed to be addressing—

[Mr. Amess]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Gentleman has had a real old go. Perhaps he will return to the subject of the debate.

Mr. Amess: The Labour leader was supposed to be addressing the revenue support grant settlement in my constituency, but he did not do so because Labour activists do not want to fight the election on local issues. If they did, they would stand condemned. One has only to consider the disgraceful irresponsibility of Labour and Liberal-controlled Basildon district council. It is only a year since those two parties jumped into bed together. After just 12 months, Basildon district council's finances are in a complete mess. The council has increased expenditure by rebuilding its empire of area management and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay knows, has taken on 100 extra staff. It has refused to reduce its budget by £500,000 to cut out some of the unnecessary expenditure. It has spent almost all—I know that my hon. Friend the Minister will be interested in this—the council's reserves once again, which three years of Conservative management had built up. In 1996-97, it is using up £3.6 million from the general reserves, to leave an estimated £300,000 by 31 March 1997. On top of that, it is also using £505,000 from the direct service organisation reserve fund.

Mrs. Gorman: Is it not the case that when the Conservative party took over Basildon council a couple of years ago the council had massive debts of about £20 million and that the Conservative administration, in a period of two years, not only got to grips with that but was able to reduce the council tax for the first time in living memory by £45 in the first year?

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend is entirely right. What has happened is a disgrace. For three years our wonderful Conservative district councillors worked hard to restore pride in Basildon district, which consists of my constituency and that of my hon. Friend. When the Conservatives took over from Labour in 1992, as my hon. Friend pointed out, we were faced with the problem of Labour having been capped in seven out of eight years. Labour set an illegal budget of £27 million. Council balances were virtually zero. We were faced with the problems of having to reduce expenditure to produce a legal budget.

In terms of the revenue support grant settlement, the Government have been very generous to Basildon district council. It is a disgrace, when one reads the rubbish that is being put through people's doors at the moment, that Labour and Liberal activists are trying to claim credit for things that have been given to them by the very generous RSG settlement set by the Government. All the good things that are happening in Basildon district council—I am delighted to see another Essex colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Sproat)—are entirely the responsibility of the previous Conservative-controlled council and have nothing to do with the present council.

I put this point to my hon. Friend the Minister when we considered the RSG settlement. Local residents need to know why the present chief executive of Basildon district council replaced the previous one. What money from the RSG settlement was spent on that exercise? More serious, what happened to the previous chief executive? Why was there a change? Why have officers who were sacked been reinstated?

What about the money that has been given to refurbish housing estates? It is all thanks to the Government. It has nothing whatever to do with the local district council.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): Before my hon. Friend leaves Basildon district council's record, is he aware that this year, once again, Maldon district council—the only Conservative-controlled council in Essex—will be setting the lowest council tax in Essex, while Basildon is setting the second highest, second only to Harlow? Does that not send a message to every voter in Thursday's local elections?

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend is right to point out the effect that his council has had in using its RSG settlement compared with that of Basildon district council and Essex county council. Essex county council is run by the Labour and Liberal associations. Both those parties tell us that they are caring parties. I have to tell the House that what they have done to residents throughout Essex is absolutely wicked.

Let us take the fire service. Never before have we experienced cuts such as those that have been made in the past year. More than £1 million has been cut from the service, despite the generous revenue support grant settlement. We cannot even recruit any extra firemen this year. That has affected all the constituencies in Essex. It is a disgrace that Labour and Liberal activists are going around with petitions—not condemning their own county councillors, but attempting to blame Essex. While all that is going on, Essex county council is sitting on more than £125 million. That is disgraceful.

This year's library budget has been cut by £1 million, and as a result no new books can be purchased in Essex this year. That is a cruel thing to do to our schoolchildren, and a cruel thing to do to our senior citizens, who depend very much on the library service. And it is all a result of the failure of the Labour and Liberal parties on Essex county council to react favourably to the generous revenue support grant settlement.

Furthermore, the education budget has been cut by £3.5 million. All Essex Members know what has gone on in the past year. First, Labour and Liberal councillors did not take advantage of the voucher system for nurseries. We could have had a pilot scheme in Essex and all our constituents could have taken advantage of it, but for doctrinaire reasons and reasons of political correctness those councillors opted out.

Then there are the magnificent grammar schools and the magnificent selective system that we have throughout Essex. What have Labour and Liberal county councillors voted to do? They have voted to withdraw the transport facilities of which many of our less well-off constituents have taken advantage. I call that cruel. They have also conducted a wicked, pernicious campaign against grant-maintained schools. In Southend, West, for instance, we have the largest primary school in Essex—

Westborough school, which has nearly 700 pupils. That school has been penalised in terms of its budget settlement, just because it is grant-maintained.

Essex county council stands condemned in many other respects. The highways and transport budget has been cut by £1.3 million, there are no more grants for rubbish skips in rural areas, and there have been cuts in money delegated to district councils and in public transport grants. Furthermore, social services have been cut by £4.5 million. That includes an underspend of £2 million in the current year. But the council claims that it is underfunded, and still wants to spend £35,000 a year on a public relations person.

I am sick to death of the way the Government have been blamed unfairly for everything and anything. Someone who stands for a district council seat, is elected and ends up controlling affairs should accept responsibility for his actions. Labour and Liberal-controlled Basildon district council is responsible for the financial mess in which my constituents, and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay, now find themselves.

People who stand in a council election, are elected and then discover that they are in control of Essex county council—which is now run by the Labour and Liberal parties—must accept full responsibility for their actions. Those parties have cruelly cut budgets that there was no reason to cut, and all our constituents are suffering as a result of their failure to draw on their huge reserves. There is a world of difference between a local authority drawing on huge reserves and what we find in Basildon, Southend and other local authorities, where there are very small reserves.

Mr. Whittingdale: Is my hon. Friend aware that while Essex county council has been imposing the savage cuts that he has described, a Labour county councillor has run up travel expenses of £33,000? Is that not outrageous? Does it not give a sense of the priorities that Labour party members attach to expenditure—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) has tried very hard to stick to the subject of the revenue support grant settlement for Basildon district council and Essex county council, so I hope that he will contain his remarks.

Mr. Amess: I will certainly not be drawn. I merely say that I know that my hon. Friend represents a large constituency, but I did not realise that it was so large that one could run up £33,000 in travel expenses. That is quite remarkable.

I have been castigated by the Opposition for all manner of reasons following our success in the 1992 general election. My smile has been referred to. The only reason why I smiled on 9 April 1992 was that the media had been told by the Labour party to gather to watch me lose my seat. At least I knew what I was smiling about. Labour politicians go round blandly smiling at cameras all the time yet do not tell us what their policies are. I have been able to give the House an example of what the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats do when they are given power.

My Labour opponent and my Liberal opponent, who is a county councillor, have never stopped blubbing since I defeated them in the general election. They need to defend the revenue support grant settlement. I notice that the leader of the Labour party on Basildon district council has said:

> "The interests of Basildon have never been completely served by Essex County Council because county councillors come mainly from the north of the county and do not understand our district."

Goodness—and the county is run by the Labour and Liberal parties. The Labour candidate in the new part-Basildon, part-Thurrock constituency is a Labour county councillor. What is going on is ridiculous.

A historic moment occurred on Saturday. My hon. Friend the Member for Romford will draw some solace from what happened. The borough of Havering castigated the decision of my family and me concerning the education of my children, which is important to the RSG settlement. The Liberal deputy mayor of Havering council has since announced that he has left the Liberals and joined the Conservative party, and is advising all sensible Liberals to vote Conservative in the election on 2 May. I hope that not only all sensible Liberals but all sensible Labour party activists will vote Conservative on 2 May.

11.49 pm

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. My tolerance knows no bounds, but if the hon. Gentleman is hoping to catch my eye, I hope that he is going to tell us something about the revenue support grant concerning Basildon district council and Essex county council.

Dr. Spink: I am grateful for your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am pleased to be able to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), who covered the major issues on Essex county council's application of the revenue support grant in Basildon with great passion and great force of argument.

I want to cover the impact of Essex county council's application of the RSG on my constituents in Castle Point. I believe that Labour and Liberal councillors are failing to serve the people of Essex as well as Conservative councillors would in the use of RSG. For instance, they have made cuts of £4,000 in the flood warning system, which might not seem a lot of money, but to people who live on Canvey island it is a significant factor. Labour and Liberal councillors have made cuts of more than £1 million in the fire service, as we have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon. Those cuts were not forced on them by the Government. The councillors made the cuts by their own decision. It is disgraceful that they should make such cuts, particularly in view of the massive reserves that they are sitting on. They do not seek to defend the people of Essex properly.

The Labour council fails to serve the elderly people of Essex through the social services committee. The funding for that committee through the RSG has been increased since 1992 from £84 million to £194 million—more than double. Yet the level of care for people in the community, particularly the elderly, appears to my constituents to be declining. They do not know quite why that should be, but I can tell them why it is: it is because the Labour and Liberal councillors misapply the funds that they are given by the Government. They do not use the funds in a proper manner. They follow politically correct schemes.

[Dr. Spink]

They waste money. They send children away on foreign holidays when those children are caught thieving or breaking the law in other ways.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon explained how Labour and Liberal councillors were attacking our schools and schoolchildren. Let me explain how they are attacking children in my constituency. In Hadleigh they are trying to remove the school playing field from the children simply because that school became grant-maintained, presumably so that they can sell off the field and get more money to help reduce their RSG.

I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to raise a few small points. They are points that bear heavily on my constituents, who will make the decision to throw out the county council in the elections in 1997 and to return a Conservative administration.

11.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess). I always enjoy the opportunity to hear him rightfully hammering the Labour and Liberal parties in Essex, and particularly in Basildon. This evening is quite an event, because we have here my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) and my hon. Friends the Members for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale), for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), for Castle Point (Dr. Spink), for Harwich (Mr. Sproat) and for Romford (Sir M. Neubert).

One Essex Member who is always so conspicuous is conspicuous by his absence this evening—the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay). His absence is unusual, and probably significant. He could not stand the fire that would be poured upon him. It is his colleagues who are making such a mess, having recently taken over in Basildon, and stringing along with the Liberals in Essex.

My hon. Friends are right. It is a classic example of what happens when the Liberal and Labour parties take over local authorities. The wish list comes out. They indulge in spendthrift activities. They seem to judge quality by the amount of other people's money they can spend.

We accept—the point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon—that Basildon has needs. Out of the 274 district councils, it ranks 50th. Its standard spending assessment is £16.5 million. Its budgeted spending is 45.8 per cent. above SSA. That is staggering. I believe it is irresponsible. Basildon under Conservative control managed to produce much better services at much reduced cost. Local councillors need to face some very awkward questions. They obviously have not done so.

One example that my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon touched on was staffing. According to the figures that I picked up, the staffing in Basildon is 21 per cent. above the family average. That is amazing. To try to fund some of that expenditure, it has virtually no reserves. In fact, on my figures, it has no reserves. It will be interesting to see what the auditor has to say if that is the position.

I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. Friend an answer on the musical chairs among the chief executives. It makes an interesting story, and one wonders whether there are cupboards full of them which the council pulls out and puts back in again at the appropriate moment.

The point was made in the debate that Maldon, a Conservative authority close by, faces the same difficulties and receives less SSA and RSG, yet manages to provide services to a high quality and at a lower cost to the local people.

I turn now to Essex county council. Again, there is staggering incompetence. It ranks ninth out of the 35 equivalent authorities. It has huge reserves. Despite that, and the fact that its RSG has gone up by 4.7 per cent., giving it another £32.141 million of central taxpayers' money, it has still managed to put a staggering load on local people by increasing their council tax bills.

The point has been made time and again that the Government recognise the importance of education. Essex county council's standard spending assessment for education went up by 4.9 per cent., but the Labour council has different wish lists. I understand that it has shifted some of that money elsewhere and not spent it on education. That was explained to us. Bearing it in mind that some hon. Members here are school governors in the region or parents with pupils, that is recognised in the House as an appalling move. At the very moment when all hon. Members are saying that we need an improvement in education, Essex county council shifts the money elsewhere.

Like every other Labour authority, Essex county council has had its wish list. If it cannot fulfil it, it calls it cuts. That is straight fraud. We want local authorities to recognise the importance of having a tight economy. We need to have public expenditure down and the quality of services up. Twenty-five per cent. of public expenditure is by local authorities. They must do their part, and it is obvious that the Labour party in Basildon and the Labour and Liberal parties in Essex are failing to do that.

There is a simple supermarket-type motto: we need more services, we need better services, but at less cost. I hope that, on Thursday, voters in Essex and in Basildon will recognise that at last, and throw these clowns out.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Twelve midnight.

House of Commons

Wednesday 1 May 1996

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

British Invention and Innovation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Conway.]

9.34 am

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): The United Kingdom has an amazing history—indeed, it has an illustrious history—of inventiveness. Over the years, many people have moved not only this country but the world forward. We have had world-beating inventions for many years. I shall draw hon. Members' attention to some of the inventions that Britain has made in the past 100 years. This country has produced products that have significantly changed the world.

Today, I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the issue of British invention and innovation. From time to time, hon. Members should acknowledge the skills and the abilities of many individuals who have helped this country and who have developed our industries and businesses as a result of small ideas which often had in their back rooms and in their garden sheds.

I shall refer to a small selection of British inventions over the past 100 years. In 1847, Charles Babbage effectively laid the foundations of the modern computer. It is difficult to believe that the computer is slightly more than 100 years old—one tends to think of it as a modern and up-to-date invention. In 1884, Edward Butler invented the motor cycle—obviously, the forerunner of today's motor cars. In 1895, Lord Rutherford managed to get radio signals to go one mile at Cambridge—that was the foundation of modern radio. Today, we listen to radio programmes that either excite or depress us.

In 1901, Hubert Booth invented the vacuum cleaner. I do not wish to be sexist, but that invention has changed the lives of women—and possibly a few men as well. In 1902, Dr. Lanchester invented the disc brake, primarily for the aircraft that were beginning to come into being. That invention has had great significance for the motor car and without it, many lives would not be saved today. While on the subject of lives being saved, I cannot fail to recognise that Sir Alexander Fleming invented penicillin in 1928. In 1926, John Logie Baird—a Scotsman; I am pleased to be able to mention Scotland—invented the television, something that has had a major effect on everyone's lives. People cannot grow up today without television having some effect or impact on their lives.

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): It is in the House of Commons.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman points out to me that television has had an impact in the House of Commons, some 60 years after its invention.

The cat's eye, invented by Percy Shaw in 1934, is of great significance in relation to safety. It is difficult to think of those little light reflectors in the road as an enormous invention or innovation, but they have transformed motor transport around the world in terms of increasing safety.

In 1936, Frank Whittle invented the jet engine, which has transformed the approach to global living. As a result, each year, many millions of people engage in tourist activity, business activity, and other activities—numbers that were not previously considered possible.

I move on to 1959, when Sir Alec Issigonis was the author of what was more a great British innovation than an invention. The motor car was already in existence, but Sir Alec Issigonis thought up the concept of the mini-car—a revolutionary approach to the way in which cars were thought of at the time, and an example of what innovation, rather than invention, is about. Innovation is about change; about suddenly having the insight to grab hold of an existing invention and do something with it that has not been done before.

The motor car had been in existence for many years before 1959, but Sir Alec Issigonis took hold of it and said, "We need something new; something different." The motor car had been growing larger, but Sir Alec Issigonis reversed that trend. He counterthought, and his idea was in the opposite direction to the way in which innovation had been going until that time, but no one would deny that he was a man of his times, because the mini-car turned out to be the start of a new design trend. Motor cars are becoming smaller, producing great fuel-saving benefits.

While I am on the subject of minis, it would obviously be inappropriate not to mention Mary Quant, who is credited with inventing the mini-skirt in 1964. That is significant in relation to innovation and invention. I have always considered the fashion industry in this country to show great creativity, and that should be recognised.

I believe that many people are not aware of the significance of one specific scientific invention, because it tends to be much closer to the laboratory, but it is significant nevertheless. In 1944, Mr. Martin and Mr. Synge invented something called paper chromatography, which involves the ability to separate out complex chemicals. As a result, we have been able to analyse a multitude of substances for the benefit of mankind, in the pharmaceutical and consumer industries. I spent some time in my youth in a research laboratory, using chromatographic techniques on spearmint to ensure that our toothpastes today could be better flavoured than they were 30 or 40 years ago.

Those inventions, whether they took place in the laboratory, the back yard or the garden shed, have all developed into major, world-beating inventions. It has been suggested that 55 per cent. of all major inventions since the second world war have come from this country, compared with about 25 per cent. from the United States and 5 per cent. from America.

It was suggested to me—regrettably, it is one of the statistics that one cannot precisely prove—that about half the world's trade today is based on British inventions. I should think that much depends on whether one includes the motor car in that, but whether or not half is correct, the point is that a substantial part of world trade today is based on British inventions. We punch well above our weight in terms of our ability to develop inventions and have them accepted as a fundamental part of world trade.

[Mr. Shaw]

If we are to go on leading the world, we must recognise that there is always more to be done and that more effort and energy is always needed from Government, from us as individuals and from the public at large. Indeed, one of the depressing factors about discussing inventions and innovation is that the public attitude towards inventions in this country appears sometimes to be very negative. Our inventors always appear to be struggling to produce their inventions against the odds, and we often criticise ourselves for not being willing enough to accept new inventions and innovation.

It is one of the perversities of this country that, for all the negative aspects, our inventors struggle away and seem to overcome the negativism, and often produce bigger and better inventions as a result of the negativity. Nevertheless, that negativism is a problem and needs to be overcome, because many of our inventions are exploited overseas. However much Governments—of any political persuasion—do, we are confronted with the problem that an awful lot of inventions end up overseas.

I understand that some of the research that I quoted earlier has been carried out by JETRO—the Japanese equivalent of the Department of Trade and Industry. The Financial Times recently studied worldwide statistics and information on inventions, and carried an article suggesting that we are losing about £165 billion a year from our gross national product because, over the decades, we have been unable to take advantage of all our inventions in the way that we should have done. We need to examine whether there are ways in which we can bring that gross national product, that world trade, back to the United Kingdom—whether we can do more to develop our inventions.

I have no quarrel with the Government about whether the United Kingdom Government are supporting British inventions and inventiveness. Any Government who are putting more than £5 billion a year—in fact, about £6 billion at today's prices—into annual research and development, are putting a very large sum into advancing new inventions and inventiveness in the United Kingdom.

Although about 42 per cent. of that money is spent by the Ministry of Defence on military inventions, we should never forget that some of the greatest inventions of our time, and those that have had some of the biggest consumer impact, have been inventions designed for the military.

The Internet, of which we hear much these days, was designed for the United States military, but the British military has been involved in using and developing it, and much of the development of the information super-highway is now taking place in the United Kingdom because we have been quick, in this instance, to take advantage of those inventions from America, and there is no reason why we should not occasionally play the Americans at their own game.

Government help is available in many different forms. I wish to acknowledge the Government's most recent new initiative—the information society initiative, for which about £35 million is to be made available in recognition of the fact that the information super-highway will be enormously important, not only to this country, but to the world.

The information society initiative, which the Government have brought into being in only the past few weeks, recognises that the communications and telecoms and information technology sector in this country is expected to grow to at least 10 per cent. of United Kingdom gross domestic product not long after the year 2000. Based on current trends—many of the projections in that sector are often underestimates—the super-highway will be a world-changing new invention and innovation as it develops, with worldwide networks, and we need to ensure that the United Kingdom gets a considerable share of the benefits. I am very pleased that there has been a substantive initiative by the Government, to ensure that British business can take advantage of that.

After this debate, at the Conservative political centre, my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology will launch his pamphlet on the information super-highway. I shall be in attendance, to support something which is enormously important and which, I hope, will ensure that a much wider audience becomes aware of what the information super-highway is about.

In the remainder of my speech, I should like to concentrate on the United Kingdom's smaller inventors—one of the purposes behind the debate. I was able to attend a reception organised by The Daily Telegraph last December at the natural history museum. I was grateful to be invited, as the event was designed to promote invention and innovation. As a result of attending that reception, I met not only a number of people in the media who were interested in inventors and invention, but one or two inventors.

One of the inventors who stimulated my interest was Trevor Baylis, who invented the clockwork radio that does not rely on electricity. I shall later explain why that invention is important.

Before I talk about the individuals I have met since then, I should mention that there is a 75-year-old institute in this country for inventors called the Institute of Patentees and Inventors, which was set up with the approval and assistance of the forerunner of the Department of Trade and Industry. It is a non-profit-making organisation, with subscribing and non-subscribing members of the public. It is also supported by, and gives information on complex issues relating to invention and innovation to, small manufacturing enterprises, medium-sized companies, educational establishments and many other organisations and businesses.

The institute receives an enormous number of inquiries from the public. Many people in this country invent things. Sadly, some people's inventions are not up to the standard required in the marketplace, but some people have genuine inventions that they do not know what to do with. They somehow find their way to the Institute of Patentees and Inventors. One problem for the institute is that it has too many inquiries from the public to handle. Its budget in the past few years has been only £35,000 a year, and it has had to exist on virtually nothing. It has been providing a service to vast numbers of the public and, as a consequence, it has been difficult for it to focus on helping individual inventors to any great extent due to its role as a public service.

I was pleased when the Department of Trade and Industry recently announced that it had given an award of £10,000 a year towards the institute's annual costs. While I am delighted that that sum is to help British invention,

I urge the Department, within its sizeable budget—I recognise that it is not enormous in relation to many areas of government—to see whether it can edge up that budget slightly in future years. I do not think that many Ministers or hon. Members on either side of the House would begrudge £10,000, or even £20,000 or £30,000, being spent on helping British invention and innovation.

The institute has made another application to the Department of Trade and Industry because it wants to publish an updated version of its directory of contacts for inventors and innovators, so that they can be best informed of the amazing help available to them in this country. Inventors often do not know what is available and desperately need a contacts directory. The institute is going on the worldwide web—I believe that it has some trial pages and intends to ensure that a lot of information can be disseminated to inventors via the worldwide web.

It is important to look at ways in which the institute can be supported in its work. I fervently hope that it will be able to develop further into a royal academy. Here, I return to Trevor Baylis, whom I met at the reception held by The Daily Telegraph. When Trevor discovered that I was a politician, he wanted to explain not only his invention to me, but his ideas for a royal academy for inventors and innovation. He sees it as fundamental to helping inventors to bring their great British inventions to the marketplace.

I should explain why Trevor sees the academy as so important by giving him a little publicity for his invention. It is a remarkable invention and, clearly, not many people had thought of it. Trevor developed the clockwork radio in order to help to put radio into the third world. He developed it so that it could be used in areas with no electricity. He suffered a number of rejections during the development process. He says that such rejections humiliate one as an inventor when trying to get an important invention off the ground.

One of the other aspects of invention is that one never knows where help will come from. In Trevor's case, help came from the BBC World Service. When the World Service studied his invention, it recognised its importance for the third world and decided that it would be sensible to introduce Trevor to the BBC programme, "Tomorrow's World", in a final attempt to help him to secure the funding that would allow his invention to go into production. It was a make-or-break move for a great British inventor, and if it had not succeeded, the idea would have been lost abroad.

Fortunately, as a result of his going on "Tomorrow's World", the invention secured some financial backing and supporters. As a consequence, 1,000 radios a day are currently being produced in South Africa and there is a demand for many times that number. Many of the purchasers are charities and, in a short period, the turnover could well approach £30 million a year, with some of the benefit returning to this country. I am pleased to say that the Government have been giving their support, and Baroness Chalker, in her role as Minister for Overseas Development, has been very much involved in helping to establish, with the British embassy in South Africa, the initial production factory. President Mandela has taken a great interest in the invention and has met Trevor Baylis.

That is an example of one small British inventor, operating from Eel Pie island in Twickenham—from what is virtually a garden shed. That makes one think how one can succeed in getting a British invention from a garden shed in Twickenham all the way around the world. It is a difficult task, which is why Trevor believes that we need a royal academy, where inventors could not only get together with other inventors to share their experiences, but meet entrepreneurs and others capable of helping them to develop their inventions.

Inventors occasionally meet the wrong sort of entrepreneurs and suffer what might proverbially be called the rip-off. A royal academy would prevent the rip-off and enable inventors to meet people who could assist them in developing their inventions. It is difficult to take an invention from a dream to a successfully marketable product. We must do more to ensure that our inventions reach the marketplace.

I shall briefly mention two other inventions of great relevance. I have no commercial interest in either of them, or in Trevor's invention, but they are worth mentioning. The first invention won the prize at the recent exhibition sponsored by The Sunday Times at the Barbican, which I was able to attend. I was pleased to see 150 British inventions there and I wish that I could mention them all in the debate.

The rules of the House do not allow me to produce an object in the Chamber unless I describe it for Hansard. This invention, which is definitely worth mentioning, consists of a map that is printed at 6 million dots per inch. It is printed so well that it is possible to carry maps of the whole United Kingdom on a few postcards in one's pocket. The invention comprises not only the maps, but the viewer that I hold in my hand. It has been designed carefully to allow the map to rest on a curvature in the viewer, which ensures that the magnifying glass eye-piece is always at the correct angle. That is the skill behind the invention as it was explained to me. I hope that I have done credit to its inventor, Jeffrey Woolf, in describing it.

The viewer went into production this week. It will be useful to those of us who get lost when driving around the countryside, as we shall be able to keep maps of the whole country in a small box in our glove compartment. More significantly, hon. Members will recognise the benefits for our military forces, which will have access to maps of the world on a few postcards. The invention has advantages for use in both civil and military life, and Jeffrey Woolf has done an enormous service to this country.

Although Jeffrey Woolf has been able to get that invention off the ground, he has at least one other invention that would also benefit this country. He has invented a revolutionary windscreen consisting of two pieces of glass with a see-through liquid in between. The liquid remains transparent while the car is under the control of its owner, but if someone breaks into the car and attempts to steal it, the liquid becomes opaque and it is impossible to see out of the windscreen. One may think that that is a brilliant invention that many people in the United Kingdom would wish to purchase in order to improve the security of their car. Sadly, to date, no British company has offered to take up Jeffrey's invention. At present, he is talking to a Belgian company and an American company that have expressed interest in his invention. I hope that a British company will come forward and back it in due course.

We should recognise that some of our inventors have slightly strange images. I hope that Joshua Silver, an academic at Oxford university, will forgive me for describing how he introduced his invention to me. Joshua is sub-warden of New college, Oxford and is undoubtedly a first-rate academic. However, I thought his invention a little odd when I first saw it. How would hon. Members feel if they were approached by someone wearing a pair of goggle-like spectacles with syringes hanging on either side? I am sure that they would wonder what was coming.

[Mr. Shaw]

In fact, the invention is a third-world eye test. Some parts of the third world do not have electricity, so the conventional eye tests that we have when we go to an optician cannot be performed. Joshua's invention works by pouring water into the syringes on either side of the goggle-like spectacles. One then squirts the water from the syringes into the goggles in order to move the lenses apart and create the number of dioptres that the person looking through the goggles needs in order to see properly. The invention allows eye tests to be performed in the third world without the use of electricity and conventional optical equipment. It is a very imaginative invention. Estimates show that at least 1 million people in the third world need spectacles, so it has enormous market potential. One might describe it as an eye-opening invention.

There are many other inventions to which I should like to refer. When I visited the inventions exhibition, I was enormously impressed by the material that warms up when an electric current is passed through it. Many people will say that the seats in their Swedish motor cars do that also. However, anyone who has sat in those seats will know that the filament that warms the seat is a wire that leaves a funny looped pattern on one's back. A British inventor has threaded the wiring through the material so that it warms the entire surface. The invention has benefits not just for car seats, but for diving suits and for use in industry, when people must be kept warm in adverse conditions. The material is called Gorix and I hope that a British company will develop it. However, when I spoke to its inventor at the exhibition, he told me that an American company was considering using it in car seats.

I was enormously impressed by another incredibly simple invention that has stayed in my mind: a safety lock for curtain rails in hospitals. Apparently 3,000 people die each year by strangling on curtains in hospitals. The safety lock is designed to break when a human's weight is put on a curtain. We must consider how we can do more to promote British inventions and innovation. We must try to produce those inventions in Britain and put them on the market.

I referred earlier to the work of the Institute of Patentees and Inventors. It is only fair that I mention also the chief executive of the institute, Paul Ambridge, who has devoted his life to supporting British invention and innovation. He works for the institute for no remuneration, except expenses, and he organised the exhibition at the Barbican to which I referred. I believe that we should examine the honours list in that context. The Prime Minister has called for the awarding of honours to a wider group of people, and it has occurred to me that British inventors and innovators have not appeared on our honours lists in recent years. A few have been recognised over the years, but I ask the House to consider also the fact that more than 100 civil servants receive honours each year.

We honour our business men who have clawed their way to the top of their field and who do much to promote British business overseas. However, we do not often honour the inventors who invent the products that those business men sell overseas. Perhaps we should be congratulating, supporting and honouring some of those imaginative people who never become millionaires. They have produced many small inventions over the years that are of tremendous benefit to this country, and I hope that the Government will consider recognising a number of our great inventors in future honours lists.

I draw attention also to the great British fashion industry. Some years ago, before I entered Parliament, I was financial adviser to one of Britain's prominent fashion designers. One day after I had given her an accountancy lecture, she said, "I wish that they had taught me that at fashion school." That made me reflect on the fact that there are few £500 million companies in the British fashion industry, although we have some of the best fashion designers in the world. Some of them are world beaters. They are fantastic at developing new ideas and imaginative products. I referred earlier to Mary Quant and the mini-skirt in 1964, but there have been many developments since then.

Although the Prime Minister recognises our designers by holding a regular reception and party at 10 Downing street on the eve of British Fashion Week, we still do not have major multinational businesses on the scale of Versace and Cardin. How can we achieve that? Perhaps the answer is in training, as the fashion designer I helped told me. We should consider whether fashion schools should teach more managerial, financial and marketing skills. Fashion students are taught a great deal about creative design, but not much about the practical aspects of getting the products out into the marketplace. Trevor Baylis made the same point when he wrote to me promoting the concept of a royal academy for invention and innovation as a practical bridge between the inventor and getting a product out into the marketplace.

We need to promote British invention and innovation, to bring benefit to the country. There should be more awards and competitions recognising British invention and innovation. Recently, an American millionaire established a new foundation within the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with a view to helping American invention and inventiveness. That was private sector money. We could do more to encourage people to work with British universities and set up competition and award schemes to help inventors and university graduates.

Our universities should provide more training in the practical aspects of invention and innovation. There should be finance and marketing courses for young graduates considering a career in scientific invention, to help them get their inventions out of the laboratories and into the marketplace.

We also need to educate our children, and we should consider whether the national curriculum should cover invention and innovation to encourage schoolchildren to think of new ideas. Many inventors succeed because they have a childlike ability to think across subjects as well as to think logically. Perhaps we should do more to encourage our children in that direction.

We need to do more in regard to finance—which is my background and that of my hon. Friend the Minister. Inventors always complain about the difficulties of getting access to finance. I suggest that the contacts directory that the Institute of Patentees and Inventors plans to produce and the encouragement of venture capital in Britain—where it is better than anywhere else in Europe—could do a great deal to make it easier for inventors to obtain finance.

We need to do more about marketing, development and encouraging inventors to get their products into the marketplace. It does no harm to learn from missed opportunities. One does not have to be political to recognise that it can be useful to learn from one's mistakes. Governments of both political persuasions have had opportunities to do more.

We could do more to develop our institutions, some of which are a little stodgy in their approach. Inventors and innovators should be more welcome. We need greater recognition of inventors and innovators in the awards and honours each year. I hope that the royal academy that I mentioned earlier might be considered for funding by the Millennium Commission. Although one proposal that was backed by the excellent magazine Inventors World did not succeed in getting millennium money, I hope that people will agree that, in the year 2000, Britain should do something to celebrate British invention and innovation. I am talking about not a one-off building, event or activity, but something that might remain in existence for many years and could be visited by hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people. We need something to inspire the thoughts of many people towards invention and innovation.

I also hope that we can do more to use new technology, such as the worldwide web, to promote invention and innovation. We have a long way to go, although we started from a very good base. It would be sad if Britain did not continue to develop our inventions. We need to be alongside the United States of America and Japan as one of the world leaders in invention. I hope that the Government and the Opposition will produce ideas to support that proposal. I hope that something like a royal academy will be established, and I look forward to my hon. Friend's comments.

10.15 am

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): I congratulate the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on securing the debate. The fact that he did not have sufficient time to cover everything demonstrates the need for more parliamentary time to be allocated to the subject, which is crucial to the competitiveness of British industry.

The hon. Gentleman set out a formidable list of inventions and discoveries by British scientists and inventors. I do not recall whether he mentioned the discovery, by a British scientist, of the electron in 1897—a discovery from which so much scientific and technological work derives. The hon. Gentleman asked for a number of Government initiatives. I am sure that he will join me in proposing the issue of a commemorative stamp next year, marking the centenary of the discovery of the electron.

The Government have a key role to play in creating the conditions for encouragement of invention and innovation. It is clear from his comments today that the hon. Gentleman recognises the importance of that role. The hon. Gentleman is not renowned for commitment to proactive government, believing instead in minimal, "could not care less" government. He is known for belonging to the "get government off our back" school of thought. Therefore, it is good news that he is prepared to modify that quaint and damaging philosophy in regard to invention, innovation and related technological activities. I agree with much of what he said and I anticipate the Minister's response with interest.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the invention by Trevor Baylis of a new radio which can be used in remote parts of the world and would allow those regions access to the BBC World Service. It is a pity that, although a British invention is on the front line of radio communications, the Government are cutting back on the message that we want to impart. Invention and innovation are essential to a strong, wealth-creating economy. They are also important in improving the quality of life through the provision of life-enhancing and life-giving drugs and of modern means of mass communication and the solving of environmental problems in Britain and elsewhere.

As the hon. Gentleman said, Britain has an enviable reputation for the number and quality of its inventors and innovators. That reputation goes back to the beginning of the industrial revolution and continues to the present day. It has to be accepted, however, that too many of the ground-breaking inventions discovered in this country were never translated into manufacturing strength. There is an all too depressing history of great ideas being discovered in the United Kingdom but developed elsewhere. That history cannot be undone; we must learn from the failures of the past and put in place mechanisms to avoid a repeat of such a mistaken approach to new ideas in the future. The hon. Member for Dover commented on some ways in which that could be done.

It must also be recognised that invention and innovation do not exist in their own separate compartments. They are by-products of a multi-faceted structure involving the private and public sectors, from education through centres of higher learning and research to a vibrant manufacturing base. If all those elements are not pulling together or are not in place, our overall capacity to discover new ideas and translate them into marketable products will surely flounder.

We still have a strong, well-respected science and technology base, from which our major inventors and innovators are still drawn. If it declines, so will our capacity to discover and to develop new ideas. Tragically, on any measure and by any analysis, our science, technology and research and development base is experiencing decline, and as a result of Government policies further decline will take place. Two recent publications of studies undertaken by the groups Save British Science and the Science Alliance, made up of trade unions involved in the sector, point all too graphically to the damaging effects of Government policies on the nation's science, engineering and technology base.

I do not agree with all the conclusions of Save British Science—a non-political group of eminent scientists who have developed a detailed analysis of what is going on—but its publication points out that one indicator of the UK's relative decline in the scientific sphere is the number of Nobel prizes obtained by scientists and researchers working in this country. In the decade following the second world war, 10 Nobel prizes were awarded to UK scientists. In the decade after that, we won 11; in the decade after that, 12. Between 1976 and 1985, however, we won only eight, and that dropped between 1986 and 1995 to only one.

[Mr. Adam Ingram]

That dramatic recent reduction in what could be classed as the high ground of scientific endeavour runs in parallel with the Government-induced collapse of the British manufacturing sector. Between 1979 and 1994, the proportion of gross domestic product generated by that sector dropped from 28.5 to 20.9 per cent. When the Government took office in 1979, there were 6.6 million jobs in manufacturing; by the end of last year that number had fallen to just 3.9 million. While the Government forced through that retreat from manufacturing, they also participated in a retreat from publicly financed research and development activity.

Save British Science points out in its publication:

"The gap in total civil R and D investment between Britain and other countries remains wide, in some cases wider. In a unique act of policy the United Kingdom Government has deliberately reduced its investment in civil R and D in real terms. Expenditure in 1993 was approaching £500 million per annum less than in 1981 and it continues downward . . . as a fraction of national wealth there has been a steady fall from 0.72 per cent. of GDP in 1981 to 0.47 per cent. of GDP in 1995."

Those are dramatic and worrying trends, and the cuts are matched by others of similar dimensions in the higher education sector. As the Association of University Teachers and others have pointed out, the Government plan to cut £630 million in real terms from spending on higher education over the next three years. A 6.3 per cent. cut in spending in 1996-97 will be followed by cuts of 3.7 per cent. in 1997-98 and 1.9 per cent. in 1998-99. Perhaps more critically, the universities' capital funding allocation for England and Wales has been cut by 30 per cent.—£110 million—in 1996-97, with a further reduction in the following year, giving a total 50 per cent. cut over the next two years.

It is hard to see how any of that can be seen to be encouraging industry to commit itself to long-term R and D investment or to be a facilitator of innovation and technology transfer.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Does my hon. Friend agree that, with all those cuts in university research and development, it is hardly surprising that vice-chancellors and senior scientists in the university world are all talking about low morale? In some ways morale is more important than cash, but the latter is related to the former because there is a feeling that the Government do not care about innovation and research.

Mr. Ingram: I agree. If time permits, I shall discuss the collapse of morale among researchers. My hon. Friend is right to refer to the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, which has been highly critical of the Government recently—to the point of suggesting that cuts in medical research will lead to deaths. An anonymous spokesperson at the DTI tried to rebut that idea, with the result that the head of the British Medical Association accused the spokesperson of being a liar. That shows just how deep the anger runs in the university and research sectors.

The Government's attitude and cuts are hardly likely to lead to a resurgence of Britain's pre-eminence in the generation of innovative ideas or new inventions. All in all, the picture presented is a dismal one. I realise that the Minister may claim that he has other indicators pointing to successes. He is likely to say that R and D has increased in real terms in the past year and now stands at £14.6 billion. That is true; but a careful analysis of the statistic by comparison with our major international competitors shows that in certain key sectors—aerospace, telecom, cars and chemicals—we are lagging behind.

Much of the increased expenditure is down to one sector—the pharmaceutical sector—coupled with an unexpected rise in defence R and D. The Minister must therefore deal with the real dimensions of Government policy and their impact on the nation's science and R and D bases. He must not rest on a few specious feel-good indicators. Without a commitment to research, there is little hope of expansion at the level of innovation and invention.

That relationship is borne out by recent figures produced by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which measures the level of relevant activity in a country by its inventiveness co-efficient: defined as the number of patent applications filed by organisations in a given country per 10,000 of population. The UK co-efficient fell from 3.71 in 1981 to 3.23 in 1993. In the same period, the OECD average rose from 4.38 to 5.61.

The reason for the decline is clear. The most recent OECD science and technology indicators show a dramatic fall in the number of UK companies and organisations applying for patents in the UK—from just under 21,000 in 1981 to just under 19,000 in 1993. While I accept that the details of patent data should always be treated with care, the overall trend speaks for itself. Put simply, it would appear that there is less innovation in the UK under the Government than there was before they took over.

The hon. Member for Dover is to be congratulated on stimulating today's debate. He has highlighted several concerns, and many others could be examined. If time permitted, it would be useful to look at how the Government are undermining areas of research excellence under their direct control—the public sector research establishments, which could be used as part of an incubator strategy for small start-up companies looking to test innovative ideas. The hon. Member for Dover mentioned that possibility. Those establishments are faced instead with—at best—contraction to possible privatisation or even closure.

I understand that the Deputy Prime Minister has directed Ministers to examine the future of the research establishments with the object of obtaining more contracts from the private sector—not in itself a bad thing—privatising them, or rationalising them. No mention is made in that directive of the overall scientific objectives of the establishments and how they could be used to create wealth or enhance the quality of life. Is the Minister convinced that such an approach helps in any way to bolster or add to the sum of innovative activity?

There is significant demoralisation within the nation's university research base, which is the generator of so many new ideas and innovations. There is an increasing movement towards short-term temporary contracts for so many researchers. There were 11,500 such contracts in 1982, but there were 21,500 in 1994, and the trend continues. Researchers in such circumstances spend so much time worrying about the future and trying to generate more finance to keep themselves in a job that they overlook many new ideas. There is a less conducive environment nowadays within our centres of research excellence to stimulate the pursuit of new ideas.

It would be tempting to enter into a debate on the many detailed ways in which a Government can assist in the generation of new and innovative ideas, and the ways in which the inventor can be helped to the market, but that would be the wrong approach. The debate should focus not on the minutiae of Government policy or on whether this or that glossy shop-window initiative is working as intended by the Department of Trade and Industry, but on the fundamentals of Government policy.

If the Government continue to erode and undermine the very fabric of the nation's science, engineering and research and development bases, it does not matter how many small-scale initiatives they start. Either the talent will not be there to participate in such initiatives, or it will have gone abroad to a more fertile innovative environment. The Minister must take that reality on board. For those reasons, the Labour party is committed to improving the nation's education base, to increasing the skills of the work force, to re-energising the public sector research base in universities and other public sector research establishments and to developing a coherent and structured approach to pushing forward the technology foresight programme in a co-ordinated and cross-departmental approach.

Above all, we need a Government who recognise science, technology, innovation and design as vital ingredients in the nation's economic health. A Government who cut and undermine that base sell the nation short. That is why the Government have lost the confidence of large sectors of British industry, and why they are under attack from the scientific and research community. The only hope for revitalising and expanding innovation and invention is the return of a Labour Government. That cannot come soon enough.

10.32 am

The Minister for Science and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): I, too, add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on securing the debate, to which the House should pay attention. It is an important subject. Indeed, it is one that goes to the heart of so much that I as Minister for Science and Technology am trying to encourage. Apart from the party political comments with which the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Mr. Ingram) concluded his remarks, there was quite a lot in what he said with which I agreed. I shall deal with points of difference, because I think that he grossly underestimates the exciting things that are happening. However, the hon. Gentleman will have to wait while I first respond to my hon. Friend's excellent speech.

My hon. Friend's speech was excellent in its coverage and in its sympathetic understanding of the plight of inventors, many of whom feel rather lonely in their struggle to gain wider acceptance. I have met many inventors who are perhaps slightly more fortunate than others. If I am meeting them, it is probable that I am providing them with Government money through small firms merit awards for research and technology or support for products under research. Perhaps those inventors I meet have larger smiles than one or two of those my hon. Friend has met. There is no doubt, however, that some exciting things are happening.

Sometimes I have to face certain difficulties. For example, I went to Newcastle to see some exciting new developments. One of the awards that I gave was to a company that had introduced a new generation of lugworm, which was capable of enabling fishing to take place 365 days a year. As the cameras were present, and as I was publicity conscious on behalf of the company while self-effacing on my own behalf, I agreed that I would hold up the lugworms to the camera, which I duly did. I replaced them when the photographs had been taken. The director of the company virtually embraced me and said, "Minister, you are extremely brave because they bite." He gave me that information after I had handled them. He added the good news that not so long before Neil Kinnock had had the opportunity to do the same thing, but had taken fright and not done it. At least my action demonstrated the vibrancy and standards of Ministers in this Parliament.

It is important that innovation is part of the title of the debate. Inventors and inventions are crucial, but the process of innovation is the broader encapsulation of turning a good idea into a commercially possible product, or even taking an old idea and turning it into a commercially viable product. When I first became Minister for Science and Technology I found it difficult to define innovation precisely. A definition quickly came to me, however, and the hon. Member for East Kilbride will enjoy the way in which it arrived.

I was at a university in front of an extremely large and erudite audience. The vice-chancellor gave me a lengthy introduction as the visiting speaker. Finally, he announced the title of my talk. It was one that I could not understand. Furthermore, it bore no resemblance to what I thought was the subject on which I was to speak. I stood in front of the audience, momentarily nonplussed. To gain time, I said, "I am from the DTI and I am here to help." Somebody at the front of the audience said, "Well, that is an innovation." In those circumstances, I rapidly realised that there were many things with which I had to get to grips.

Innovation and invention are crucial to the competitive challenge that Britain needs to face. I am sure that, unless we make better use of our inventors and innovators, the country will not be properly equipped to face the challenges of the next century.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dover that not all inventions have been properly understood. In a pamphlet imminently to be launched to an expectant world, which my hon. Friend was kind enough to flag, and which I have written, there are some examples of inventors' original purposes and activities not being fully understood. Alexander Graham Bell, who invented the telephone, thought that its main use would be to pipe music to remote groups of people. When Bell demonstrated his equipment in 1876 to Western Union, the company's executives wrote to him as follows:

"Mr. Bell, after careful consideration of your invention, while it is an interesting novelty we have come to the conclusion that it has no commercial possibilities."

As we all know, Marconi invented radio. He thought that it would be used mainly for ship-to-shore telegrams. And, wait for it, a Government report of 1956 stated that

"four computers would satisfy the needs of the whole nation."

That is an example that all Science Ministers and, if I may say so, Opposition spokesmen on science, should bear carefully in mind. It is possible that the Government do not always get it right. That is especially so in the context of the Government being asked to do more in recognising inventions and innovation. In my judgment, the

[Mr. Ian Taylor]

Government's role is that of a support and encouragement operation. We should not try to second-guess which ideas are most likely to be taken up by industry in the wider community.

I visit universities and companies throughout the country and I have no doubt that the creativity for which we have been famous is alive and well. We are doing some stimulating things. On a recent visit to Japan, interestingly, the one thing that Japanese industry wanted to talk to me about was the creativity occurring in the United Kingdom. As a result of their inward investment here, the Japanese see that creativity and are taking advantage of it. In conversations with Bill Gates of Microsoft, I found that he was certain that creativity in computer software existed in the UK in a way that it did not in any comparable economy, so we have tremendous opportunities to succeed and to take advantage of our creative skills in all dimensions, in research and in industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dover mentioned the fashion industry. I enthusiastically endorse his comments about the talent here. The Government have done much to sponsor London fashion week and we help to focus what the markets can offer in that sector. I should like even more attention paid to it.

My problem is that it is difficult to know which inventions will be the real killer applications, which ones we should be pushing and in which environment they are most likely to come. My hon. Friend mentioned many lone inventors and I have already paid tribute to them, but often some of the great breakthroughs in applications occur in big companies.

Dr. Coyne of 3M gave a fascinating speech at the DTI-sponsored innovation lecture. He said that one of the great skills that 3M had always had was that it encouraged research and other employees to come up with ideas and to develop them in company time, almost for themselves. One of the most interesting involved the use of sticky tape. An employee had tried to sell more sticky tape to car paint companies, which were using it for spraying and then had to pull it off and touch up the bits where it had taken paint off as well, which was time-consuming. He developed the idea of almost non-sticky tape, which has become part of our everyday lives. That was good lateral thinking. It was developed in 3M, which then adopted it.

There are many examples of companies not realising what they have. "Triumph of the Nerds" is a wonderful programme that has been running on Sunday evenings on Channel 4, I think. It showed that the Xerox board failed to realise that it had at its fingertips the future of personal computers. No personal computers ever had the Xerox name on them despite the fact that all the great breakthroughs were made in Xerox laboratories. We must, therefore, be extremely careful when trying to anticipate how the Government should best provide support in this sector because, even in circumstances where industry had a clear motive to bring things to the market, it has failed to do so.

Mr. Sheerman: I am listening carefully to what the Minister says, but what can the Government—any Government—do to stimulate across the board? He has mentioned some of the biggest companies. There is a serious and worrying decline in research and development. I mentioned universities in my intervention. Even at the level of the small inventor, which the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) mentioned, the enterprise allowance has been knocked back. We need a policy that stimulates such innovation across the board. Sir Ron Dearing is not dealing with the aspect even of universities. Surely we need a thorough look at what works and at what is successful, and then go for it.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that. It is crucial that we do try to look across the board, partly because I cannot predict where good ideas will come from. I have been applying a logical policy. We are encouraging universities increasingly to consider their use of intellectual property. Recently, we have encouraged, through, for example, the DTI challenge competition, a technology transfer award, won by University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology in conjunction with Aromascan. It produces an electronic nose for detecting changes in smells, which is crucial in certain production processes or where smell change can mean a security risk. Universities are increasingly being encouraged to consider spin-outs.

Some research councils are also considering that closely. The Medical Research Council has its own internal spin-out company. When I visit companies, I constantly deal with the point of them working more closely with universities. Our best universities are comfortably working with industry, but I need more industry to realise that that is the right way forward.

The DTI is applying pressure at each stage. We have the small firms merit awards for research and technology for companies with fewer than 50 employees. They can receive a grant of up to £150,000—which includes intellectual property, incidentally. That is a crucial early stage. Often, the companies employ not 50, but two or three people. I have given many of those awards, which migrate into a SPUR award for slightly larger companies with up to 250 employees.

The new business link structure throughout the country involves innovation credits and information technology counsellors. We give £250 to enable companies, especially small companies with a good idea for a product, to seek outside advice so that they can have the confidence to take the project further forward. I am convinced that I am putting in place a framework for the sort of objectives that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) seeks to influence me on.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dover raised many points and I cannot touch on all of them in the time remaining. Let me try nevertheless to do some of them justice. There is no doubt that this country is losing money because some of its inventions have gone abroad, but it is difficult to estimate it accurately. The figure that he quoted of nearly £160 billion a year does not seem to break down into anything that we can identify.

In a recent report, the Intellectual Property Institute has estimated that the share of gross domestic product produced by the 10 most patent-intensive industries by rank has increased only from 5.2 per cent. of GDP in 1985 to 7.81 per cent., or some £46.5 billion. Hence, it is difficult to see how the Exchequer could be losing £157 billion each year either as an additional contribution to GDP or, certainly, as tax, so we need to be careful about some of our use of figures. We do not want to get things out of context, exaggerate and then find that we cannot justify them.

My hon. Friend was right to say not only that the Government are spending about £6 billion a year, but that a proportion of that—around a third—was on defence research expenditure, which is not a growing sector. One of the intriguing things, however, is that much of what used to be spin-out from defence research is spinning in from civilian research.

Not long ago, I was at a company that will remain nameless, finding that a product that had been developed for civilian use had interesting defence implications. With the chief scientific adviser, I am considering some of the interfaces between civilian and defence research to ensure that this country's overall technological base is safeguarded. It is important that we do that.

One of the areas that I am concerned about is information communication technologies. The information society initiative is an important way of safeguarding the creativity in the UK that has stemmed from the liberalisation of communications here. We have a tremendous opportunity to be one of the research centres—if not the research centre—in many sectors of communication technologies in the world. The initiative was one of the key parts of the technology foresight exercise, which allowed the Government to attempt not to pick winners, but to identify the areas that we should concentrate on in our research and technology activities. Information communication technologies are crucial in that.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Institute of Patentees and Inventors, which is an important player in the matter. I am delighted that we have been able to provide some modest support for it. On his request for further funds, obviously I will always consider such requests. There are difficult competing indicators, but I want to draw his attention to other sectors where we are reinforcing the institute's work. In the business link system, for example, we provide genuinely independent advice for small companies and lone operators, not only on their corporate development; we also provide information and technology counsellors and design counsellors. We can help them to marry management skills and to identify sources of potential finance. The combination of business links with some of the initiatives that were mentioned will be an important way forward, and I shall monitor that carefully.

The idea of a royal academy of inventors is intriguing. I shall encourage people to work on the project and to discover how it might be financed and justified, because it will obviously need private and other support. I cannot influence the Millennium Commission and we should be cautious about that because the commission is independent. I would certainly give an application a fair wind.

There is no deliberate passing over of inventors in the honours list, but I shall certainly raise the issue again to see whether there is another way to provide objective recognition of the enormous work of people such as Trevor Baylis, which my hon. Friend has mentioned. I am going to South Africa shortly for the Group of Seven developing nations conference on the information super-highway. I should like to take some of the details that my hon. Friend mentioned about production in South Africa of the clockwork radio.

We are doing important work to spread information through the developing world not only through that invention but by way of some remarkable happenings. The global digital mobile network was developed in this country and is now the global standard, and the remarkable use of satellites, through the very small aperture terminal systems, is rapidly bringing information to parts of the world where the people thought that they could not receive it because of the sheer cost of digging up parts of deserted areas to lay cables. Cable is no longer required to carry information technology.

I have mentioned interesting ideas that I have seen. In the recent Science, Engineering and Technology Week there was a demonstration of glass changing its molecular structure at the flick of a switch so that it becomes impossible to see through. That is not quite the invention that my hon. Friend the Member for Dover mentioned, but it is an example of the ways in which new technology is transforming the way in which we view a product. Glass is no longer glass in the sense that we just look through it or that it can be pretty or painted. We can now change its molecular structure, and such inventions will eventually affect our way of life.

I hope that British companies will give a good reception to UK-based inventors. I accept that, in that respect, the record is not perfect, but as I travel around the country I preach to people to look more at the innovative process. However, I do not want to underestimate the matter. I have met some inventors who think that the invention is it, a wonderful idea. But the inventor is only one part of the process, and I am not being cruel to the inventor when I say that.

One of our more interesting awards is the MacRobert award, which is funded by the DTI in conjunction with the Royal Academy of Engineering. The award is for innovation in engineering but also recognises the excellence in engineering which achieved the commercial success of the original idea. It is a combination award, and that is important because one of my objects is to raise the status of the engineer in our society. That is crucial, because, while an inventor can produce a good idea, it will be the engineer who will help it to become a commercially viable product.

The 1995 winner of the MacRobert award was British Gas research division and Gill Electronics for a new gas meter based on ultrasound. It is accurate to many decimal places and can be installed and left in place for 10 years. Mr. Gill told me that developing his invention, which is based on the ultrasound testing of gas flows, through British Gas research laboratories into a product that can be marketed worldwide was a complete eye-opener to him. He could not have done it without the resources of British Gas. I have seen other developments of that process.

British Steel is developing a new railway steel. That emerged from work on mathematical models in Cambridge, when, I believe, two years of work on mathematical models suddenly resulted in a breakthrough which British Steel is taking forward in conjunction with Cambridge university.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Taylor: I am running short of time, so I shall not give way. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. It is clear that the Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Taylor: One of the key points in the debate related to management training, which is crucial. I am trying to enthuse the Engineering Council to bring management training into engineering courses so that more engineers can be competent managers. The same goes for many scientists because management is a key tool for the engineer or researcher or anyone else. I am glad to see that more universities are beginning to pick that up, because it will determine success.

From my discussions with the venture capital industry it seems that there is no shortage of money, but marrying a good idea to finance often requires other factors, most particularly management. In the DTI we are attempting to work with financiers and industry to find a way to encourage greater access to management skills for people with ideas so that the venture capital industry can have more confidence in evaluating a project and in trying to determine how it will become a commercial proposition for the industry. I hope that that process will yield results in the near future.

I shall deal briefly but determinedly with the comments about the decline in the science base. When I visit universities, I do not see any decline in that base. We could trade statistics across the Dispatch Box, but I can say that the amount spent on the science base by the Office of Science and Technology and by the higher education funding councils in terms of research is up in real terms by 10 per cent. over 10 years. However, I do not want to go into statistics or engage in trade-offs about Nobel prizes which often reflect research that has been carried out some time before such awards are made. However, I congratulate the chief scientific adviser on winning the prestigious Crafoord prize from Sweden only this week.

I do not wish to trade statistics on manufacturing, save to say that the prospects for manufacturing investment and for productivity and output are currently extremely good. We discussed that at a recent Question Time. Allowing for the various economic cycles, over the past 10 years productivity in the United Kingdom has been extremely good. I appreciate the point about capital funding. That is why the higher education funding councils and I this year presented a targeted project for capital funding of £18 million of Government money which is reassigned specifically to equipment. With matched funding, that will amount to £36 million.

I am looking longer term at how we might overcome some of the difficulties of universities in funding capital equipment, which is vital for universities and for the quality of their research. I recognise that, and I do not intend to duck that issue, because it is important for us to realise that the quality of university research can often depend on fairly mundane pieces of equipment such as fume cupboards.

On its science and technology activities, the DTI will spend level cash of about £350 million over the next few years. Our figures have been distorted by factors such as the fast breeder and by launch-aid inputs. The Department is firmly behind the work of industry in innovation and application. It has a series of initiatives, some of which I have mentioned, such as the management in the 1990s programme, an area in which we wish to improve our activities and raise the standards of British companies.

Increasingly, I talk to universities about the way in which they can identify smaller companies, which can be difficult. The Faraday concepts are being examined by research councils, particularly by the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council. We are working with research and technology organisations and trying to get people to transfer from universities to companies because the skills-based transfer is important. The teaching companies scheme and the postgraduate training partnership are crucial. I have introduced a college-based scheme to ensure that we do not lose sight of the role that colleges and vocational qualification college students can play in companies in the areas in which they work. All that is themed to try to improve the competitive position of the United Kingdom in the vital fields of science, technology, innovation and inventiveness.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Dover for his work in highlighting the matter. I warmly endorse the work of inventors. I am trying to provide a successful framework for them and to stimulate British industry to realise that in the next century, we will succeed only by adding value and using our wits. It is not only a question of keeping our costs down but of trying to compete with the rest of world with better products, new ideas, better design and a way that leads us forward into the next century based on the competitiveness and creativity of industry in Britain. Inventors have a crucial role to play and I pay tribute to all those mentioned by my hon. Friend. If there is anything that I can do to stimulate them, I shall ask my officials to consider it closely.

British Council

11 am

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): I am delighted but saddened to have the opportunity to highlight the impact of the £22 million cut over the next three years on the British Council and its role as our principal agency for cultural relations abroad and in our aid programmes and diplomacy. The council's future has been undermined and jeopardised by the cuts. The Government know that full well, because the council has emphasised its difficulties in meeting the costs of restructuring to come to terms with the demands placed upon it by the swingeing cuts.

The council does not have access to capital to fund the restructuring that will be forced upon it to implement the cuts. It is a Catch-22 situation. The planned reduction in the British Council's grant and the enforced restructuring have not been thought through. It is another victim of ill-conceived Treasury policy and of what the Secretary of State described to me in his letter as

"the recent very tough spending round which has reduced the Foreign and Commonwealth Office budget."

That is it in a nutshell. The council is a victim of public expenditure restraints, no matter how valued is its work. Dr. Roger Bowers, its Manchester assistant director general, informs me that its long-term commitment depends on whether there is any further significant change in the Government's financial support. My advice to him is not to hold his breath. We cannot rely on a Government that can impose such unexpected cuts without considering the effects on the service and especially on the efficient and dedicated staff. We cannot rely on a Secretary of State who, in a two-line sentence, informs me:

"We will do our best to help the council next year but that must depend upon the outcome of the next spending round."

Those comments do not sound reassuring to me and I do not think that they will reassure management and staff.

I am assured by the British Council that it has a good efficiency record. It was on target to reduce its UK overheads and was restructuring its regional offices, producing savings and exceeding Treasury targets for efficiency savings. It had cut staff over three years by 25 per cent., so it had played its part. Regrettably, that could not satisfy a Government hellbent on cutting public expenditure. Where better to do that than with an organisation that, in spite of its excellent activities, is little known domestically?

The ordinary voter knows little or nothing of the work of the British Council. Such savage cuts would not be a vote loser. How many people realise that the British Council promotes British interests abroad through many and varied channels? How many know about its management of overseas development projects, its promotion of the English language, its vital partnership links or its involvement with education and training, science and technology and the promotion of British arts? How many know how that work has benefited millions over the past 60 years? So what? It is not a vote loser. Nobody on the domestic front will miss it, so who cares?

There are many who care and who are anxious to make their concern known. This debate has generated a great deal of interest in what is happening to the British Council and where its future lies. I know that other right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak who have taken a long-term interest in its activities and followed recent events with great concern. They are far more knowledgeable than I about the details of its crucial role in world affairs.

I regret that other interested Members such as me were not contacted earlier. Neither I, as Member for Manchester, Central where the council is sited, nor my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) who represents the adjoining constituency and who is a Front-Bench spokesperson on foreign affairs, were aware of the extreme difficulties facing the council until a few short weeks ago when we received a two-sided A4 sheet from the Public Services, Tax and Commerce Union.

Several hon. Members were disturbed by the lack of communication between the British Council and Back-Bench Members. There appears to have been an air of secrecy and a softly, softly approach to its impending doom. Do not rock the boat; be nice to the Government—as if that course of action would make any difference. It was not until my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), in his role as chair of the parliamentary Labour party foreign affairs departmental committee, invited officers such as the council's director general, Sir John Hanson, and Dr. Roger Bowers to our meeting that we realised its predicament. That meeting took place only four or five weeks ago. The cuts will damage the work of council in general but will have a detrimental effect on Manchester in particular.

On hearing of the fate of Manchester, my mind went back to a lovely summer's day in July 1992. Manchester was agog and there was an air of excitement and eager anticipation. Her Majesty the Queen was visiting the city. The crowds and the children turned out to offer the usual warm Manchester welcome. The Queen was there for a dual purpose. She had come to open the prestigious new British Council building to which its headquarters had relocated. She followed that opening ceremony by declaring the new metrolink tramway open. It was a day of achievement for the city and its citizens. The metrolink is still running; it has proved to be a huge success. However, the same cannot be said for the British Council, for what a sad, sorry story that has turned out to be.

Who would have thought that, only four short years from that July day in 1992, the British Council would face such a situation? It is four years since Her Majesty paid tribute to the building's architectural merit and admired the internal decoration, the new carpets and the unique wall-mounted clock. It is three years since it won the office of the year award, but that building will no longer serve the purpose for which it was intended. The building was a vital part of the jigsaw of our regeneration programme and the British Council's coming to Manchester was part of the process of urban development that we were trying to achieve. What we had envisaged as a success story is now in a state of collapse. After the depletion of our manufacturing base, we welcomed the new service industries that brought jobs to Manchester. Where do we go now?

It does not take a genius to work out that enforced redundancies—about 180 people are to lose their jobs in the current financial year—and staff being moved elsewhere means that the British Council will have to seek alternative accommodation. I am informed that it is exploring all options for possible new tenants and a new home for itself. Although we hear the mutterings of management, who say that they are committed to staying in Manchester, I am sceptical of what they really mean—the city of Manchester or Greater Manchester. A new venue of Salford quays has been mooted, but Salford is a neighbouring authority. The British Council would be moving away from the city itself if it takes that decision.

[Mr. Robert Litherland]

I appreciate that the management are expressing regret that the reductions are taking place so soon after the official opening, especially when the council's work is most needed, but it is the staff of the British Council who concern me.

I recently received a letter from an employee, who told me that, as the letter was being written, the family were still in the throes of upheaval after relocation and were surrounded by cardboard boxes waiting to be unpacked. The family had faced the trauma of upheaval in leaving their home down south to move to Manchester, where the spouse had acquired a part-time job. The children had been placed in a new school, made new friends, and the family had made a new life. They informed me that they liked their environment and did not want to move on. Yet they could find themselves left high and dry without a livelihood, far from their relatives and friends who remain in the south of England. The Secretary of State has an obligation to offer a full explanation to such people of how they will be assisted and compensated for such loss.

The worry is that the cost of restructuring will be extremely high. The estimated cost of redundancies, based on previous redundancy programmes, is in the region of £12.6 million. With additional costs, a total restructuring cost of £17 million is estimated. If the Government will not meet those costs, will the council face insolvency? The council emphasises that it has no means of funding such costs unless it does not carry out its operational work for at least a year. Can anybody imagine that? It would seriously discredit the Government, their foreign policy and this country.

Where do the staff stand in such a scenario? Close to £15 million was spent on relocation, and a plan to save costs by going to Manchester was devised. What happened to all those carefully thought-out schemes? Why did the Foreign and Commonwealth Office allow the British Council to go ahead with its decision to restructure when it must have been aware that the Treasury intended to impose such draconian cuts? It must have known the effects that such cuts would have on the council's operations and staff.

The council is in an impossible position. There is no scope for savings of such magnitude. How can it maintain its present global coverage under such demanding financial guidelines? The short answer is that it cannot. The scale of cuts has crippled the organisation and there are grave doubts that it can carry on and meet the stated objectives of Britain's foreign policy for the 21st century. It is ironic that the 1992 Conservative party manifesto said:

"The British Council acts as a cultural ambassador for Britain and for the English language—We will promote the English language by strengthening both the British Council and the BBC World Service".

Strengthen indeed! The Government should tell that to the family surrounded by unpacked cardboard boxes and with no future to look forward to.

If it is the intention to save the British Council's frontline operations at the expense of UK operations—the management are looking for a £5.5 million reduction in the UK—we can expect more families to meet the same fate of the family that I have described. What a peculiar way to treat staff of an organisation that has fulfilled all its obligations and has been described by the Secretary of State as dedicated and one that has made an outstanding contribution. I am always cynical of the Government. Perhaps their aim is to undermine the viability of the British Council and make room for the private sector, which we know is watching events with interest and would quickly cream off the most lucrative commercial operations if it were allowed.

I picked up two articles on the subject recently. A letter in The Economist said:

"The most drastic solution would be to privatise the council's commercial activities and restrict it to promoting the interests of all British providers of such services."

The Times Higher Educational Supplement said:

"What the Government refuses to accept is that this structure undermines its stated belief in market forces, the private sector and the discipline of competition."

My, my, the private sector is now telling the Government their obligations to the private sector.

I was delighted that Sir John Hanson, the council's director general, dismissed the complaints. He was reported as pointing out:

"the council still farms out many of the contracts it wins to other British suppliers, rather than doing the work itself. But he believes British firms would not win so much work if the council did not run its own language schools and consultancy projects, as showcases for Britain's skills."

As we all know, privatisation has always been the Government's panacea to all the country's ills. They would forsake all for their ideology. I sincerely hope that in this special case, the Government will have a serious rethink. The British Council, its staff and Manchester deserve better.

11.17 am

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid–Sussex): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) on securing this Adjournment debate on the British Council. I share many of his concerns about the British Council. He has represented a Manchester constituency over the years, so I appreciate his strength of feeling on behalf of British Council employees in Manchester, which he so vividly expressed.

I do not at all agree with the hon. Member that the British Council is—I think that I am quoting him correctly—in "a state of collapse". I do agree, however, that there is very widespread concern at all levels in the council about precisely where its future will be. I state that as an unpaid vice-chairman of the British Council—an interest that has regularly been declared in the Register of Members' Interests. I have had the honour and good fortune to hold that post for nearly four years, and during that time, two themes have dominated our board meetings and all the contacts that I have had with British Council staff in London, Manchester and abroad.

The first theme is simply the relentless pursuit of better housekeeping, through greater cost-effectiveness, more modern accounting and a better use of information technology. The move from London to Manchester was one aspect of that, and was intended to save substantially on salaries and associated expenses in the United Kingdom.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Central has stated that there has been a substantial reduction in UK staff in the past four years, before any consideration is made of the effect of the new grant in aid proposals. We have recently sold or let half the headquarters building near Trafalgar square to bring United Kingdom costs down.

The other—and more positive and exciting—side of our affairs has been the careful expansion of British Council posts in, for example, eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, and the re-opening of posts in Shanghai and Beijing. These can help us take advantage—usually on a fee-earning basis—of the enormous opportunities for all aspects of English language teaching, training and technical co-operation in the contracts that are now available to the British Council, often on a competitive basis. We must fight to provide ELT services against competition from Australia and the USA, and we must fight to win technical co-operation contracts with the Overseas Development Administration, the World bank and the European bank of reconstruction and development.

In the past three or four years, I have heard the British Council praised and encouraged by the Prince of Wales, the Prime Minister, successive Foreign Secretaries and countless ambassadors, both abroad and at home in London. It is worth pausing to think that, on a rough calculation, there are something like 1 billion people in the world at the moment who want to learn English. English is now by far and away Britain's most valuable export. It is the universal second language, the language of computer-speak and the language that almost all professionals use in discussing technicalities through the Internet. To the chagrin of the French, English is now the language of diplomacy. In a euphoric mood, I could say that every one of those billion people—or their teachers—is in some way a potential client of the British Council.

I am delighted to add that the revenue earned by the British Council from its activities is increasing. The amount was £62 million in 1990-91 and increased to £115 million in 1994-95. It is estimated to increase further to £130 million in the year that has just ended.

I wish to refer for a moment to China. I visited the British Council's offices in Shanghai and Beijing after going to Hong Kong in October. No one can go there and not be amazed at the potential for opportunity. After all, it is a country with 1.2 billion people, and its GNP is growing at a rate of 10 to 12 per cent. a year. It has more than 1,000 universities. English is now the official second language for everyone aged nine upwards until they finish their education. That is against the background of the fact that more than 90 per cent. of students do not have any English language teachers because they do not exist. The scope for an organisation like the British Council to team up with the Chinese open university, the BBC or David Puttnam to provide distance learning in English and to train and teach people up to the professional standard for English teaching is absolutely huge.

Even if some of the British Council's activities become fee-earning, they need seedcorn capital to get started. As the hon. Member for Manchester, Central said, the British Council's activities are often not recognised in this country because we do not trumpet them around the United Kingdom enough. The council is helping to win for Britain its present market share in the global education and training export business. This is estimated by the Department of Trade and Industry—not by the council—to be worth some £7 billion a year. The council's education and counselling service operates in 10 key markets in the far east and, through our education fares, exhibitions and face-to-face advice to students, the service is contributing to increasing the number of overseas students in Britain to beyond the level it was when full costs for fees were introduced. I simply do not believe that that would have happened without the British Council.

The council is involved not only in higher education, but in the promotion of United Kingdom education at all levels. I attended an education seminar over lunch in the Jubilee Room on Monday, which was aimed by schools, universities and colleges of technology in Sussex at overseas students. Without my proclaiming that I was the vice-chairman of the British Council, strong credit at that meeting was given to the council for its work.

My right hon. Friend the Minister is well aware that the council's overseas offices depend for their viability on a fixed bunch of activities. It is not possible to say to any of them that they should concentrate on revenue-earning activities because such activities are not yet of a sufficient size to enable the posts abroad to be viable and to justify themselves. Such a demand would totally ignore the original aims of the British Council—the promoting of British art, culture, books and music abroad. The other side of our activities brings in a good many people into our posts, but the availability of libraries and information centres about Britain and the sponsoring of art and culture tours abroad are not necessarily financially viable.

Continued grant in aid is necessary to keep the whole plethora of council activities going. Without grant in aid, many British Council overseas posts will simply have to close, as they will be unable to expand their revenue activities quickly enough. Against that background, I find it hard to believe that the Government will wish to force the British Council—that jewel in the crown for marketing Britain abroad—will wish to force us into the closure of libraries or overseas posts. I must say, however, that the present forecast for grant in aid for the British Council would have exactly that effect.

The sums needed to prevent this are not large. The British Council would certainly need assistance with the cost of redundancies at home in which we are now bound to be involved. Beyond that, we have spoken of the restoration of some £5 million grant in aid in 1997-98, and £10 million each year thereafter to avoid the closure of posts. Frankly, that would run wholly contrary to the Government's policy of support for the British Council and the better presentation and marketing of contemporary Britain, its education, IT and modern technology abroad in which the British Council excels.

I know that the board, senior management and staff of the British Council very much hope to hear some good news from my right hon. Friend the Minister—if not today, then next week. Many important people have told me recently in relation to the British Council that they are on our side—they are with the angels on this. That is very nice, but frankly being with the angels at the moment is not enough. They will have to have clutched between their wings some rehabilitation and improvement of our grant in aid if we are to avoid the closure of overseas posts, libraries and information centres. Everyone in the House would greatly regret that.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. There is clearly great interest in the debate, so I hope that in the short time remaining those hon. Members who wish to speak will make their contributions as brief as possible.

11.29 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I shall be brief.

The British Council is central, not peripheral, to the orientation of Britain's foreign policy. It is not on the margin. Therefore, I simply ask: what is the Government's thinking on the British Council's position in the resources queue?

The right hon. Member for Mid–Sussex (Mr. Renton) has just reminded us that the British Council is a significant earner. The figure that we have been given, as he will know from the board, is £130 million. That could go up and up over a period of years for the very reasons that he has given. There is a huge market for educational training, and the British Council has a key role in the British economy.

I take just one example. I was lucky enough to be selected for the recent Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation to Nepal, which was led by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman and I went to see the Minister for Overseas Development about the British Council in Kathmandu and how possible cuts might affect it. I can only say, without being maudlin, that it was a moving experience to see people from Nepal who, frankly, have no other decent library, streaming into the offices of that well and imaginatively run British Council post in order to enlarge their knowledge.

Doubtless colleagues could repeat such experiences from many parts of the world; I can talk only about that recent experience. To see the amount of service that was being given to that country, one of the poorest countries in the world on any index, really did make one feel rather proud to be British. Of course, a great deal more could be done. Certainly in Nepal, more could be done by distance learning in areas where, because of the terrain, it is difficult to get children to any kind of central primary school. The possibilities of distance learning there are immense, and the British Council is the body to do that.

Therefore, if we are to talk meaningfully about overseas aid and the help that we give to developing countries, the British Council and its capacities and skills in areas such as distance learning are of enormous importance.

You, Madam Deputy Speaker, asked us to be brief and we want to hear the Minister, so I end with these two questions. Where is the British Council in the resourcing queue? Do the Government take the view, as many of us do, that it is not only morally right in many countries to support the British Council, but in the British national interest? I shall leave it at that.

11.32 am

Sir Jim Lester (Broxtowe): It is a delight to follow the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I agree with every word that he has just said.

I recognise that the public in general do not know about the British Council. But I speak as a member of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs since 1982—14 years' experience of looking at the British Council as part of the Select Committee's responsibility to consider foreign policy. That is why I want to speak today, and I just want to say three things.

First, the credit for the figures that I am about to quote rests with my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) in his Macleod essay entitled "No Hiding Place: British economic policy in the modern world". That is the context in which things should be placed.

Britain consistently punches above its weight. The figures in the essay show that Britain has only 1 per cent. of the world's population, but 3.5 per cent. of its gross domestic product. Since 1979, Britain's overall international trading position has changed from 20 per cent. for exports and 27 per cent. for imports in 1979 to 23 per cent. for exports and 25 per cent. for imports in 1994. Our exports of goods and services at constant 1990 prices have risen from 22 per cent. of GDP in 1979 to 27 per cent. in 1994. Those are critical figures in terms of Britain's economic place in a new world with a global economy, and they are good figures.

We know that, diplomatically and politically, we punch above our weight. Britain is a tiny country, which is a member of the Commonwealth, the United Nations Security Council and all the rest. I shall not rehearse the details because I think that we all accept that: Britain punches above its weight, economically, politically and diplomatically. Part of the reason for that is that, in the years since 1979, the Foreign Office has targeted the improvement of its performance.

The Select Committee is now committed to producing a report on cultural diplomacy and it has shown that that plays a vital part in Britain's export efforts and capacity to work in the world. The term "cultural diplomacy" had not been thought of before the Select Committee considered it, but the two essential elements of cultural diplomacy are the BBC World Service and the British Council. The Select Committee's most recent report on the future of the Commonwealth comes back again to that question and gives tremendous support to the British Council and the role that it plays.

We are a member of the European Union, with an economic base that enables us, through the Commonwealth and the rest of the world, to look ahead to a prosperous future. I come here to the point made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, which is the second thing that I wanted to say. Obviously, British policy must be to expand and to continue to punch above our weight in the world, but on what basis should we evaluate the things that are vital in terms of achieving that objective? The Government have no way of determining whether something is a real benefit that should be backed and on which extra money should be spent because it is good.

The English language, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Sussex (Mr. Renton) has just suggested, is one of those things, as is the British Council. The Foreign Office comes into the same category. I wish that we had a Treasury Minister on the Front Bench rather than my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, because for the Foreign Office, which does such magnificent work overseas, to be spending less than 1 per cent. of our gross public expenditure and achieving so much for it, yet to be subject to regular miserable chippy-chippy cuts that result in what has happened to the British Council, is absolutely crazy. By spending very little money, we could achieve even better figures than those that I have put forward.

I work closely with my old university, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex mentioned education. Britain attracts 250,000 students at a value of about £2 billion to our economy through the joint operation of universities and the British Council. The Americans, with their great country, attract only 450,000. Again, we punch above our weight and we are attractive because of our language and standards and because of the high regard in which people hold what Britain has to offer.

We must have a system of government that evaluates the purpose and the value to Britain of the British Council's budget and, therefore, backs winners rather than chopping things that clearly have an enormous benefit, particularly when we are talking about piddling amounts of money. Bovine spongiform encephalopathy is serious and suddenly a lot of money has been found for the farmers. The British Council needs only a fraction of that.

My third point concerns the way in which things are done. Great institutions such as the British Council cannot suddenly make reductions in their costs without facing what I call double jeopardy. People have to be made redundant, so the cost of redundancy must be added to the amount of money that has to be found. That is double jeopardy because money is being wasted in order to get rid of people, particularly people overseas who have often been devoted servants of Britain, working for the British Council. They require some notice in their own interests, because they have no fallback in terms of social security in many of the countries in which they work. That operation has been very badly handled, and leaves the British Council in limbo because of double jeopardy.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) suggested that people do not know much about the British Council. Last Wednesday, the Foreign Affairs Select Committee had before it Sir Martin Jacomb and Sir John Hanson to press all those points. The hearing was televised, although I suspect that it was not shown on any television channels. Nevertheless, the transcript of that meeting is available.

I should like to quote from the hearing a question—naturally from me—in which I said that the council was strongly backed by the members of the Committee. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex said, we had been talking to the right people and received warm words and suggestions that action might be taken. I asked Sir Martin:

"Are they really taking your concerns seriously? Can you give us some idea of the timescale in which you would want an assurance on which you can work before you actually have to take the sort of decisions, which you are obviously working on, which you feel would be very damaging to your future?"

Sir Martin replied:

"The fact is we are already really in extra time. We have been talking about this since last November, which is nearly five months, and still there is no assurance of money. If there is to be no alleviation and we have to make reductions, particularly reductions abroad, to handle that sensibly and sensitively and in such a way as to secure the minimum damage to this country, action has to be taken now."

That is a very profound statement from someone who has devotedly worked with the British Council.

The impact of the cuts is completely out of proportion to the amount of money that we are talking about. I beg my right hon. Friend the Minister, and any other right hon. Friend who can help, to grasp the nettle, turn round the situation and give a positive assurance—which has money at the end of it—to bring this unfortunate saga to an end.

11.41 am

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and West Devon): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) on ensuring that this important subject is being debated at all. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and to listen to the vice-chairman of the British Council, the right hon. Member for Mid–Sussex (Mr. Renton), who said that he was speaking with some euphoria when he reeled off credit upon credit for the British Council.

All of us could list the council's credits, because it is a most remarkable organisation—but the right hon. Member for Mid–Sussex perhaps ducked the issue at the end of his speech. Surely he cannot be in favour of the disastrous—or near-disastrous—cuts to the British Council, because a 16 per cent. cut in real terms will surely most seriously threaten its capacity to maintain an effective presence internationally and its programme in regions that are important to British interests.

The council operates in 109 countries, and, as we all know, it is currently the only Government organisation that sustains and promotes British culture. We know that the British Government will not rejoin the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, so we must rely for the promotion of the English language and British culture wholly on the British Council.

I am unclear why the Government wish to impose on the British Council this serious public expenditure cut of 16 per cent. in real terms. Surely we are correct in saying today, as the vice-chairman has already said, that there has been immense praise for the British Council, even from a former Foreign Secretary and from the current Foreign Secretary.

In his letter about the cuts to the council's chairman, the Foreign Secretary stated that the reductions did not mean that he did not appreciate "the outstanding contribution" that the council

"makes to the UK's overall diplomatic effort."

He also acknowledged that the council had "done a great deal to improve efficiency by rationalising its UK network and reducing overheads", and that the council was

"extremely leanly staffed."

The Foreign Secretary went on to ask again for the impossible. He said that he nevertheless hoped that it would be possible for the council

"to continue to maintain a global network and to avoid significant post closures."

Of course, those two objectives just do not match up.

I understand that the council has only one way in which to meet the new grant in aid regulations, which will be a significant reduction in its staffing levels, with higher proportions of cuts in the UK. The saddest aspect of those cuts is that the British Council is a people-led organisation. How can we imagine that the skills of those whom the British Council will be forced to shed are replaceable in the short term? We know that it takes a lifetime to learn the language and culture of a country. It is a lifetime skill. I believe that British Council staff have been vastly underrated by the Government, and I am sad that those magnificent and skilled people will be lost in helping to implement British Government policies.

[Miss Emma Nicholson]

Hon. Members have, of course, already mentioned the possibility of private investment. The council does not have the means or access to the means to pay for investment, so private funding has been suggested. But if we examine the closure of the BBC's Arabic service, we immediately notice that private funding on the international diplomatic scene brings significant and heavy political and diplomatic costs. The Government's mishandling of the unfortunate al-Masari case has led to the direct closure of the BBC Arabic service, which was surely a private investment in a Government effort.

My questions on the BBC Rwanda service have still not been answered by the Foreign Secretary. We again notice immediately that that service might go because of the private investment that is keeping that service alive. Therefore, I suggest that to look for private funding to fund the British Government's policy internationally is a very shortsighted and ultimately foolish way in which to try to fill the gap, to replace the funds that the Government have mislaid somewhere. I am tempted to say, and believe, that the Government are asking the British Council to cut its cultural coat—which is Britain's cultural coat—to fit the Conservative party's shaggy cloth.

I also suggest that the pre-eminence of the English language internationally may have come about more because of the fact that English is the language of the computer industry and of the air traffic control industry. Mere communication by a language in the modern world does not mean that culture will come with it. English language culture—the civilisation of Shakespeare—is daily diminishing because of our absence from UNESCO. When we speak of the British Council, we speak no longer about its excellent underlying work in teaching the English language, but about the loss of the English, Scottish, northern Irish and Welsh cultures internationally.

The 1992 Conservative party manifesto, for the present Parliament, stated:

"the British Council acts as a cultural ambassador for Britain and for the English language . . . We will promote the English language by strengthening both the British Council and the BBC World Service."

I was deeply saddened when I realised that that was not a valid statement of the policy being implemented. The reverse of that statement has happened with the BBC World Service, and the reverse is now happening with the British Council.

I should like to talk about the great difficulties in restructuring the British Council, which has been restructured and moved to Manchester—hence the initiator of this excellent debate. That restructuring was surely designed to make a leaner, meaner British Council to act into the millennium and beyond. Of course it is necessary—if the council is to protect its front-line operations, as the Secretary of State demanded in his statement to the House of Commons on 29 November—that the reductions come from savings in the United Kingdom. By 31 March next year, 350 posts will go, and those job losses will cost £36,000 per person. The Government, in their dying throes, are forcing an expensive game upon the British Council.

As the hon. Member for Linlithgow has already asked, why do not the Government allow the council's revenue-earning activities to finance its continuing development and perhaps even its enlargement? There is no subsidy for the activities of the enterprises from the grant in aid. Those areas of work have to build their own reserves in order to provide for capital investment and cover commercial risk. If they do not do that, they will not grow and will ultimately fail. The added loss of impact for Britain overseas will be large because the British Council operates in markets or parts of markets that might not be commercially viable for other United Kingdom service providers, as the vice-chairman has already pointed out.

How is the British Council to find cash savings of the magnitude required from internal efficiency and reorganisation? It cannot. There is no way open for it other than by losing important, valuable, highly trained and skilful people.

The consequences for us all are real. It is open to any of us to go to see the British Council's work in Russia or in any part of the world and to be overwhelmed, as the hon. Member for Linlithgow said, by its efficiency and care. I believe that it is even more important than that. The British Council has built up expertise and experience over many years and these cuts are at odds with the objectives of Britain's global foreign policy today.

11.51 am

Mr. Mike Watson (Glasgow, Central): This is one of the rare occasions when hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber seem to be singing more or less from the same song sheet. I hope that, because of the pressure exerted from both sides, when the Minister responds he will have something positive to say about the future funding of the British Council. I should like to put to him a quotation from his colleague the Foreign Secretary, in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Sir J. Lester). He said:

"We have protected the operating costs of . . . the British Council from the economies that are being made elsewhere in the public sector. I entirely endorse the objective that my hon. Friend has stated."

That was about improving Britain's influence in the world through trade flows.

"If we did not take the same view, we would have subjected the operating costs of the . . . British Council to cuts. We have not done so. That is an indication of our good faith."—[Official Report, 29 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1189.]

If that is good faith, I would not like to encounter him in a bad mood.

We have heard a litany about the projected cuts and the effect that they are likely to have if they are not reversed. I am concerned particularly about the prospect of a reduction in the British Council's influence in a number of countries in various parts of the world. The hon. Member for Broxtowe quoted from the transcript of last week's hearing of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. At that meeting, the director-general, Sir John Hanson, suggested that it was likely that there would have to be a pull-out from 27 major cities and 16 countries, seven of which would be Commonwealth countries.

I must ask the Minister whether the Government are prepared to tolerate that. If they are prepared to see withdrawals from certain countries and closures in certain major cities, will he name the cities and countries that he thinks are dispensable? If he does not, he will put an intolerable burden on the British Council, not just in terms of the work that it has done in the past, the contacts that it has made and the vacuum that would be left behind, but in trying to choose one against another. It is an impossible task and it is one that it should not be facing. It is incumbent on the Government to take some of that responsibility and on the Minister to tell us whether he feels that it is acceptable for such closures to be made.

Some hon. Members have mentioned the fact that the British Council is far better known overseas than in this country. That is true. Perhaps the debate and the coverage that it has received—there is a comment in The Daily Telegraph today—will help the council's image with the public.

I am concerned about the British Council's work in respect of international students in the United Kingdom. My constituency contains two universities, and I was at a meeting as recently as yesterday dealing with cuts in education. As we all know, those cuts are across the board and are aimed at fattening the calf—if that is not too topical a reference—for the tax cuts that it is hoped will help the Conservatives at least to hide some of their embarrassment at the general election. It will be futile, and it is a shame that organisations such as the British Council and universities have to bear the brunt of that political axe.

Both the universities in my constituency, Glasgow-Caledonian and Strathclyde, have international students. The British Council's role in influencing the number of students who come to this country should not be underestimated. The number doubled between 1984 and 1994, and with universities being so strapped for cash, they desperately need the full-cost funding brought by international students. If there is to be a reduction in numbers—there might well be as a result of a reduction in the British Council's influence and in its education counselling service—it could have a knock-on effect in the United Kingdom, quite separate from the British Council's situation. That must be borne in mind. I realise that that is not directly part of the Minister's remit, but I hope that he will comment on it.

There are 28 British Council offices in the United Kingdom, and a number of them could face closure. How will it help the British Council to improve its image with the British public if it has to withdraw from areas in which it already has a presence? It needs to be better known in this country and needs more outlets if it is to do its job that much better.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland), whom I congratulate on obtaining the debate and on the content of his speech, made it clear what the closures could mean for jobs. If the jobs go, there will be a knock-on effect on the way in which the British Council operates overseas. That is the base from which many of its activities are resourced, and if that base is cut, it will seriously affect its operations.

I am concerned at the extent to which the cuts imposed on the British Council have been disproportionate to the cuts announced in respect of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. If there are to be cuts across the board, every Department must take its share. However, within that, it is unfair that an organisation as vulnerable as the British Council has been forced to take a disproportionate cut of 16 per cent., if one takes its Overseas Development Administration and diplomatic wing funding together. That is double the cut in the FCO as a whole. Can the Minister justify such a swingeing and unfair cut?

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central talked about the British Council's approach to dealing with the cuts since they were first announced some five months ago. It has been a softly-softly approach, quite different from that of the BBC World Service. It is up to the British Council to decide what tactics are best suited to it and, at the end of the day, their effectiveness should be the deciding factor.

Sadly, it seems that the softly-softly approach has not been effective. There is clear evidence of that in what I suspect the Minister will say today—although I remain optimistic—and in the views of the British Council's chairman. He seems finally to have lost faith in any approaches that he could make behind the scenes or in any ears in which he could whisper in the corridors that he treads.

It is strange that Sir Martin Jacomb has been placed in a position in which he has to be so trenchant in his criticism of the Government in general and the Foreign Secretary in particular. I have no doubt that he feels uncomfortable with that. He has talked about being strung along with assurances and of promises remaining unfulfilled to such an extent that he has now said that he is disappointed and filled with despondency. He is no icon of new Labour with a background of Eton, Oxford, Prudential and the Bank of England and all the other badges of honour that come from the corridors of power in this country. However, he has made that criticism.

It is shameful that the Government should treat people in that way, regardless of the organisation involved. There are means of arm twisting and negotiation to reach the end that one wants. Clearly, there is a feeling that the British Council has been let down. Everybody who knows the organisation, here and abroad, feels that if the cuts go ahead, the organisation will be severely undermined in an unfair and unwarranted way. I hope that the Minister will bear those comments in mind, as well as those from hon. Members on both sides of the House.

There is a great deal of good will towards the organisation. It wants to continue and even to expand the work that it is doing. It will be strangled in a number of areas in the world if the cuts go through. I urge the Minister in his response to tell us that there will be some alleviation of the cuts announced in November last year.

11.59 am

Ms Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) on initiating the debate, and on the way in which he introduced it. I am not surprised by the strength of feeling that he showed in his speech—indeed, that strength of feeling has been widely shared by all hon. Members who have spoken. This has been a cross-party debate in terms of support for the work of the British Council and the deep concern about the effects that the cuts will have on it.

I know that this concern is widely shared by hon. Members who have not been able to speak in the debate. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford

[Ms Joyce Quin]

(Mr. Lloyd) also speaks on foreign affairs from the Front Bench. His constituency adjoins that of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central. As a Front-Bench spokesman, he knows—as I do—the effect that these cuts will have on areas of the world for which we have responsibility in our Front-Bench roles.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central spoke eloquently about the fact that the British Council was relocated to Manchester only four years ago. However, it is now facing major upheaval: there will be a dramatic loss of jobs and the office will be vacated—it took possession of the office so proudly only four years ago. The office was named 1993 office of the year. Despite that, the British Council is being forced to find smaller premises.

We also know that 1992 was the year of the general election, and the year in which the Conservative party put in its election manifesto its commitment to a strengthened British Council and a strengthened BBC World Service—that has been referred to by several hon. Members. Until now, this has been a less well publicised broken promise of the Conservative Government. The Labour party intends to continue to draw attention to this issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central recognised that the British Council has an impact far wider than Manchester and his constituency—that it is of worldwide significance, that it is an important part of Britain's role and image in the world, and that its work brings substantial economic, trading and other short-term and long-term benefits to this country that are difficult to calculate but are evident.

It has been said that the villain of the piece is the Treasury, in forcing these cuts on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. While I do not dissent from that, it seems to me that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has achieved particularly poor performance in defending those parts of its budget that are particularly useful, such as the British Council and the BBC World Service. The Minister will remember the strength of feeling in the debate on the BBC World Service earlier this Session.

The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Miss Nicholson) referred to the position of the BBC World Service Television in Arabic. A few days ago, I asked the Minister a question in this regard. He replied:

"Decisions about any future developments are a matter for BBC Worldwide Television."—[Official Report, 29 April 1996; Vol. 276, c. 358.]

In other words, the Minister has washed his hands of the future of the BBC Arabic service, which is unacceptable, given the Government's responsibility for the budget of the BBC World Service and the concern about the future of the Arabic service and the BBC World Service in general.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) and other hon. Members have said, the British Council has tried to be reasonable in its approach to the Government in the face of the huge problems it is encountering. The enormity of what is happening is only just starting to strike home, because it has not received the publicity that has been given to other issues. As a result of this debate, the Government can be in no doubt that there is great concern about this issue. Now that publicity has been given to the problem, we will not be satisfied until some proper action has been taken.

It is important to stress that we are talking about cuts on top of cuts—that is what is making the situation so difficult for the council. It was hard enough to manage the cuts that were already in train, but the practical and economic consequences of cuts on cuts will make the problems catastrophic.

The British Council contests the figures that the Government gave in the narrative report accompanying the expenditure of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. It has said that the report ignores the effect of cuts announced in the 1994 public expenditure round—cuts that take effect during the current survey period. The British Council has to face cuts of 16 per cent., rather than the 8 per cent. that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is facing as a whole. I should like the Minister to comment on that.

This morning, hon. Members have given examples of the ways in which these cuts will affect the services of the British Council—they may even result in some closures. The British Council also gave examples in its evidence to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. They seemed to me, and to other hon. Members, very alarming indeed.

For example, cutting services in central and eastern Europe seems to be a crazy and short-sighted decision when those countries are going through such a difficult transition period and need help, support and advice on a huge scale from western Europe and other parts of the world. It is particularly short-sighted if we are really interested in establishing long-term, good economic and political relationships with those countries. North Africa has also been mentioned. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) referred to Nepal and to some of the work that the British Council does in the poorest countries.

What is the Minister going to tell us this morning? Is he going to say where he is prepared to see those cuts? He should not evade his responsibility. As he has put the British Council in this situation, he has to be open with hon. Members and say where he expects those cuts and closures to take place, and what problems will be created as a result.

The debate has shown that hon. Members who have spoken are familiar with, and appreciative and supportive of, the work of the British Council. I have participated in some of the conferences organised by the British Council, in particular a recent conference in Oxford that brought together participants from the European Union and from central and eastern Europe. That event was most worth while. I know that the contacts that are made in such forums are likely to have long-lasting and positive effects.

Today, hon. Members have referred to the cuts that the British Council is being forced to make, and have said that they are short-sighted and, in many ways, self-defeating. The value of the council's work is tremendous. The spin-off of its work is terribly important in terms of the British economy and good relationships with other countries.

I have had interesting contacts with the British Council in Japan, and I know that the work done in that office is of dramatic value to the United Kingdom economy. An example was given where the arts section of its budget—which is about £500,000 a year—helped to promote activity that was estimated to be worth £50 million. The figures provided by the British Council and some of the activities that it has promoted show a 10:1 return on investment—sometimes the investment is modest, but it has enormous economic spin-offs.

We are also very worried about the costs of closures. The BBC World Service has made that point effectively, especially in its evidence to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. For example, the closure of the French service was estimated to cost £300 million, even though the overall cost saved was only £400 million, so one had to spend a tremendous amount simply to make such a closure. The British Council is especially worried about the cost of redundancies that will be caused by the loss of jobs resulting from the cuts.

I ask the Minister to give a specific commitment to give the British Council help with those redundancy costs. One of the problems that are especially acute at present, as the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Sir J. Lester) said, is that, if a decision to give some help with redundancies is not taken in the next few weeks, it will mean accelerated closures in some of the council's overseas operations—and the Minister must realise that no one who has spoken in the debate wants that.

The British Council is being put in an impossible position because it is required to live within the new rules, the new cuts, without adequate means of getting there. That is a real problem, which demands urgent negotiations with the Government and with the Minister. Perhaps the Minister will give us a commitment to hold urgent negotiations and discussions with the British Council.

I should like the Minister to give us an assurance that the cuts that we know affect the Overseas Development Administration, and which in turn affect the British Council, can be mitigated, so that the work of the ODA and of the British Council does not suffer disproportionately as a result of the contractual relationship between them to provide specific services.

Interestingly, in the public session that the Foreign Affairs Select Committee held earlier this week, the Chairman said that he was very concerned at the apparent mismatch between the central role that the British Council plays in our national endeavours, and the inadequate priority that it seems to get in the public expenditure queue. That point was reiterated earlier.

The debate and the speeches of hon. Members on both sides of the House amount to a serious indictment of the Government's approach to the British Council. The concern that has been expressed today, like the earlier concern about the BBC World Service, goes beyond the Opposition; it is widespread in and outside the House. We call on the Government to respond to that concern today by announcing that they will reconsider those savage cuts, which are highly damaging, not only to the work and future of the British Council and to Manchester and the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central, but to British interests in today's world.

12.12 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): As the Minister responsible for the British Council, it is my privilege to reply, on behalf of the Government, on the subject chosen by the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland)—the British Council. I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for initiating the debate, and for giving me the opportunity to make clear the Government's appreciation of, and strong and continuing support for, the British Council.

As my noble Friend Lord Chesham said in the other place on 1 February 1996, the council is an integral and essential part of the United Kingdom's diplomatic and aid effort, and has been working in support of British interests overseas for more than 60 years.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have spoken in glowing terms of the council's activities in a broad range of areas. I do not want to pick any particular speech. I shall mention the sacrifice of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson); I believe that he is speaking on his birthday, and it cannot but be a great tribute to the British Council that he should give his time for that cause.

The scope of the council's work is indeed impressive: from promotion of the English language to the recruitment of overseas students, from high-tech information services to the promotion of development and good government, from scientific collaboration to the contemporary arts. All those activities have something in common: by highlighting British excellence and creativity, they enhance our prestige, support our exports and make long-term friends for the United Kingdom. In doing so, they complement and contribute to the work of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in diplomacy, overseas aid and export promotion.

During the past 10 months, I have been most impressed by the council's operations, and have tried to visit them in every country I have been to. In Vietnam, the council is teaching English to officials who need English so that the country can play a full role in the Association of South-East Asian Nations. The Vietnamese Government were warm in their appreciation when we discussed the subject.

In Japan—to which the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) referred—the council's activities support and underpin our important political and economic relationship and help to satisfy the hunger of a discriminating Japanese public for the best that is available in the arts and sciences. They succeed so well that the council's input often triggers a much larger contribution from the Japanese themselves, to which the hon. Lady also referred.

In India, I was especially struck by the council's network of libraries, which are an important source of information and expertise to their very large membership—people who are working hard to transform that country, already the world's largest democracy, into a developed and prosperous state. The libraries are also used by students seeking information about study in the United Kingdom. In some cities where we have no official commercial presence, the council's Department of Trade and Industry-funded overseas business centres provide facilities and contacts for visiting British business men and women.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked where the council stood in the list of priorities for Government resources. We have recognised the council's valuable role in public diplomacy and development by substantially increasing its grant in aid, which we have increased by more than one third in real terms since we took office—between 1979-80 and 1995-96. That, together with internal efficiency savings and an expansion of non-grant activity, has enabled the council to expand its operations massively. It now has more than twice as many officers as, and operates in a third more countries than, in 1980.

[Mr. Jeremy Hanley]

The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Miss Nicholson) said that we now operate in 109 countries, and she is right, but she did not say what the growth had been, because the council now has 229 offices in 109 countries, as against 108 offices in 79 countries in 1980. That extremely good record of expansion has been achieved under Conservative Governments.

We have been especially pleased that the council was able to seize opportunities opening up in central and eastern Europe after 1989, capitalising on the good will created and the friends made as a result of its persevering work during the dark days of communism. In the subsequent years, the council has helped those countries build up their English language teaching capacity and restore a flourishing network of contacts with fellow professionals in the west. The council's resource centres have also given the United Kingdom a high profile in many cities throughout the region.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hanley: I am sorry: I really must place on record what I want to say, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, with his customary courtesy, will allow me. If I have time towards the end, I may allow him to intervene.

I say all this to emphasise that the Government recognise and very much appreciate the council's work throughout the world. Against that background, I turn to the subject that most interests hon. Members today—the reductions in the council's grant in aid during the next three years.

Hon. Members will know that the council receives two separate grants in aid, one from the diplomatic wing of the FCO and the other from the ODA. The diplomatic wing at present provides about three quarters of the total.

As hon. Members will also recognise, pressure for further efficiency means that the last public expenditure round was extremely rigorous, and all Government Departments have been involved in a drive to cut costs and sharpen priorities. In the public expenditure survey settlement, the FCO diplomatic wing took a cut of about 7 per cent. in its baseline in each of the three years covered by the survey. As a result, the diplomatic wing budget is scheduled to fall by about 12 per cent. in real terms over the period.

As it is Government policy to strengthen, rather than reduce, the promotion of British interests overseas, that represents no mean efficiency challenge. In those circumstances, inevitably the council could not be exempt from the need to make further savings.

In deciding the grant in aid for the council, the diplomatic wing took account of the fact that the council's baseline was already declining following the 1994 PES, and sought to lessen the impact of the 1995 settlement. Accordingly, we passed on to the council only part of last autumn's cut, imposing an extra burden on the diplomatic wing. In that way, we ensured that the percentage reduction in the diplomatic wing's grant in aid to the council over the three-year PES period was broadly in line with the reduction in the diplomatic service's budget as a whole.

That was a tribute to the value that we attach to the council's work, given the pressure for extra effort and resources for other FCO activities, including the promotion of exports and inward investment, consular work and immigration control overseas, diplomacy and negotiation—all of which are crucial to the prosperity and well-being of the people of this country.

As for the ODA grant in aid, hon. Members will be aware of the pressure on the aid budget, especially given the inexorable rise in our binding commitments to the multilateral agencies and European Union programmes. Within the reduced bilateral aid budget, Ministers' first priority remains the country programmes, which provide direct assistance to those developing countries working to put in place sound development policies and good government. That placed additional pressure on other parts of the aid budget. The real terms reduction in the British Council grant in aid was comparable with that for non-country bilateral programmes as a whole.

However, the council contributes to development, not only through its grant-in-aid work, but through contract work under the bilateral aid programme, for which it competes with other British suppliers. The council has a good record in winning such business. Overseas Development Administration contracts will account for nearly £100 million of the council's turnover this year. We expect that project work to continue, and hope that the council will also be able to promote development increasingly through the management of multilateral aid programmes.

The Government welcome the fact that, in the present circumstances, the council has chosen to take a radical look at all its operations in order to focus on what is essential and what might be done differently. It has concluded that its most valuable asset is its network of overseas offices, which has enabled it to build up extensive contacts with overseas Governments and organisations. It has decided—rightly, in the Government's view—that the first priority must be to preserve that overseas network as far as possible.

The corollary to that is that there will have to be radical changes in the United Kingdom. How the council chooses to restructure its operations in those circumstances is largely a matter for its management. We understand that its management propose to make greater use of specialist advisers from outside the council rather than in-house expertise, and to concentrate on front-line functions by making reductions in support staff—both proposals are very much in line with trends in other organisations in both the public and private sectors.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Central and other right hon. and hon. Members have drawn attention to the staffing reductions that that process will entail—on top of reductions that have taken place over the past few years. The council has already embarked on a new voluntary early retirement programme. Some compulsory redundancies will almost certainly be required, too, although the actual number is not yet known. That is always a painful process, especially with staff who have given loyal and committed service to a cause in which they strongly believe.

We naturally regret the distress that the process will inevitably cause to those involved. We understand that staffing reductions are likely to occur in both London and Manchester, but that the council is most unlikely to withdraw from Manchester completely. I have visited the office, and share the admiration that has been expressed for it in the House today.

The Government recognise that, even after restructuring in the United Kingdom, the council will need to make some adjustments to operations overseas. The council is currently discussing its plans with the Foreign Office, to try to ensure that the impact on our interests overseas is kept to a minimum. The Government do not want to see the closure of British Council posts.

Studies are therefore being undertaken with the aim of avoiding closures. The results of those studies should be available later this month, and I cannot today anticipate the outcome, but I believe that the results will emerge before the end of the month. We do, however, recognise the council's urgent need for clarification of the funding prospects.

Studies are also being undertaken by the efficiency unit, which is looking at the council's proposals for dealing with the projected decline in the grant in aid following the 1995 PES settlement, including redundancy plans, and its approach to improving the efficiency and effectiveness of its operations at home and overseas. The council is co-operating fully with the efficiency unit in its work. We expect that report by the end of this week.

The council is, of course, much less dependent on the grants in aid than it used to be, with nearly half its income now drawn from revenue-earning activities. The council's English teaching operations in particular have expanded rapidly, spreading the highest professional standards and attracting an influential clientele in a wide range of countries.

I have visited many posts throughout the world and seen English teaching in action—it is popular, and there should be more of it. We are delighted that the council, together with other organisations involved in English teaching, is taking advantage of the huge demand for English overseas to promote the language at no cost to the taxpayer. I agree with those right hon. and hon. Members who have today said that they want English English, not some other version of English, to be taught around the world.

The council's direct teaching operation is entirely self-financing—there is no question of subsidy from the grants in aid. People sometimes level criticism at the British Council because they believe that it subsidises the teaching of English, and is unfair to those who teach English in the private sector. I can assure the House that I have looked into the matter, and that the council's teaching of English is on a very fair cost basis—there is no subsidy from grants in aid for it.

The council has also been very successful in drawing in sponsorship and partnership funding, both to make the grants go further and to cement relationships with partner institutions both here and overseas. The Education Counselling Service, which runs a student recruitment service in key markets overseas and is co-financed by the council and British academic institutions, is an excellent example of partnership in action. The arts events supported by the council are now largely paid for by sponsors, with the council's contribution limited to professional expertise and modest seedcorn funding.

Mr. Dalyell: What has been said today by the Minister's colleagues should be brought to the attention of those undertaking the studies and of the Treasury. Parliament's views should be taken into account.

Mr. Hanley: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance—indeed, I was about to mention that subject.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Sir J. Lester) mentioned the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, where the Chairman recently remarked on an apparent mismatch between the council's central role and its position in public expenditure terms. The Select Committee will be looking at FCO expenditure in greater detail later this month, and will then consider the council's position in relation to the diplomatic wing and the ODA as a whole.

Obviously, there is no point in my commenting on the transcript of the Select Committee's minutes, except to say that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and I have read it, and we shall take it into account in the next few days. There is no point in my commenting in detail on the Chairman's remark before the Committee has completed its deliberations.

Right hon. and hon. Members have spoken most eloquently this morning about their support for the activities of the council, both at home and overseas, and their concern over the reduced funding of those activities. The debate will be read, and decisions will be complete by the end of May—I repeat that assurance for the benefit of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

Let me conclude by reiterating the Government's strong support for the British Council and its role in winning hearts and minds for Britain around the world. The council, like many institutions, is having to face up to a period of change. It will in future have a smaller UK base, and rely more on outside advice. There will have to be some reordering of priorities overseas.

Some of those adjustments may be painful, and we recognise that hard choices have to be made. But all organisations today face the problems of challenge and change, and the council has a long record of successful adaptation to new circumstances. I have no doubt that the council, with its extensive overseas network, will continue to play an important role in furthering Britain's prestige, influence and interests for many years to come. That is certainly the Government's intention.

I conclude by repeating that the council now has 229 offices in 109 countries. When the Government took office, there were 108 offices in 79 countries. That is a record of achievement.

School Transport (Devon)

12.29 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Perhaps the most popular reform introduced by the Government since 1979 is that which enables parents to send their children to a school of their choice. That policy appeals to parents of all political persuasions and of none. I initiate this debate because, if the policy is to work in rural areas, the local education authority must operate a fair, humane and justifiable transportation policy. At present, the policy in Devon operates along the same lines as the Ritz hotel: we are all free to dine at the Ritz, provided that we can afford to do so. Increasingly, in Devon one must be able to afford to send one's children to the school of one's choice.

The LEA has adopted a school transport policy that makes a mockery of parents' right to choose—and I would argue that that is its intention. I shall set out the facts for the House. The law is clear enough: section 55(1) of the Education Act 1944 states that free school transport must be provided when a designated school is more than two miles away for a child under eight or more than three miles away for children over that age. That is the law as it stands at present. The problem is that, when parents in Devon choose to exercise their right to send their children to the school of their choice, the local education authority tells them that they must meet the transport costs, as the county will not.

When pressed about the matter, the LEA sets out two arguments. First, it says that it does not have enough money. Secondly, it says, "If you think we are bad, the previous Conservative administration was bad also." As to the latter point, the previous Conservative administration followed a similar policy which I criticised at the time, as I do now. However, there are significant differences in the behaviour of the previous Conservative and the present Liberal administration.

As there are many excellent schools in Devon in general, and in Teignbridge in particular, more parents want to exercise their choice not to claim that one school is better than another, but to say that a particular school is right for their child. Even though I criticised the behaviour of the previous Conservative administration, I admit that it did not go to the same extraordinary lengths as the current administration in defying parental choice. I shall return to that point later.

I must lay to rest the claim that the LEA policy is all about money. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment will address the grant settlements issue in general when responding to the debate, but at present the settlements are very generous compared with previous awards. The case is much more fundamental. This morning, I debated the issue on a local radio station. The Liberal spokesman who argued the case with me said that I was asking for all transport costs to be subsidised, no matter what choice parents made. He made the ludicrous statement that I had argued that, if a child living in Exmouth wanted to go to school in Plymouth, the county should meet the transport costs involved. It is complete nonsense; I have never said that.

My view is reflected by the parents who have contacted me. They do not want the local authority to provide extra money: they want the county to make the contribution that it would make in any event. In rural areas, designated schools are often more than three miles away and there is a cost involved in transporting children to those designated schools. The scores of parents who have written to me, telephoned me, come to my surgeries or met me at public meetings in Teignbridge do not ask their fellow council tax payers to meet the extra cost that the county might incur. However, at the very least, they expect that the county will not profit from their desire to choose their children's education.

That is what is happening. When the county refuses to contribute what it would have paid if parents had sent their children to designated schools, it does not have to produce extra money—in fact, it makes a saving. It is important to stress that point. The parents to whom I have spoken and the teachers and the governors who have written to me do not want the county to meet the extra costs of transportation: they simply want the county to pay the money that it would contribute in any event.

The best way to illustrate the injustice and the inevitable motives behind the LEA policy is by giving some examples to the House. A local school has provided me with several such examples, but I shall refer to only three. The first concerns an older child who was to attend the King Edward VI school at Totnes, which is known as KEVICs. That is a designated school. However, the school was full that year, so the county sent that child to the South Dartmoor community college and paid the transport costs.

Two years later, a younger sister entered secondary education. She was to go to KEVICs, but her parents wished to send her to the same school as her sister. The parents were told that the county would not provide free transport and that they could apply for a concessionary place on the bus, amounting to £40 per term. However, that concessionary place can be withdrawn at short notice if an entitled child joins the school. If the parents cannot afford £120 per year, the only solution would be for the two children to attend different schools.

Another common example involves a group of parents from a village outside a school's designated catchment area who approach the LEA requesting that an established route be extended to the village. The parents agree to pay the balance of the cost of that extended route, but the county will not agree to their proposals. I heard of a similar case when I met parents from Chudleigh. Those parents had made it clear to the county that they would underwrite and reimburse the county for any extra expenses that might be incurred in sending their children to the school of their choice. However, their proposal was rejected.

The third example concerns children with examination commitments and GCSE courses of study. They may be provided with transport—usually an expensive taxi—if they move from within the catchment area to a new home outside that area. However, younger children with no GCSE commitments cannot be considered for transportation to their original school and are expected to change to a new school, even if a taxi with seats available is provided for the older child. The teacher who provided me with those examples concludes:

> "The Government's laudable policy of free parental choice of schools cannot operate at present as parents who exercise their right then find themselves faced with a transport bill which can run to several hundred pounds per year, or serious personal inconvenience".

I am not aware of that teacher's political affiliations, but I know how he feels about the issue of parental choice.

I shall give the House two other examples. The first relates to my constituents who live in Lustleigh, which is a village on the edge of Dartmoor. There are two villages near Lustleigh—Moretonhampstead and Bovey Tracey. Lustleigh no longer has a school, but there are schools at the other two villages which are virtually equidistant from Lustleigh. I believe that in the past they were co-designated schools, but that is no longer the case.

Mr. and Mrs. Foskett of Lustleigh have written to me about their experience, and it is worth quoting from their letter at some length. They say:

"School transport for pupils attending both Bovey Tracey and Moretonhampstead Primary Schools has been a long-running issue for parents in Lustleigh and one which has now progressed to the ridiculous, as evidenced by the disgraceful treatment my youngest son, Richard, has recently received.

When my 8 year old son Michael came of school age he was unable to attend Bovey Tracey school"— the designated school—

"because of pressure of numbers. Consequently, we had no choice but to send him to Moretonhampstead Primary School. After much debate between ourselves and Devon County Council it was agreed that Michael should receive free school transport.

When our youngest son Richard started school last January we naturally wanted him to attend the same school as his brother for several reasons which should be apparent. This decision, after appeal in September 1995, was viewed by the LEA as an exercise in parental choice, and therefore, our appeal for free school transport was rejected. Richard continued to travel on the bus whilst we awaited notification as to how much, when and where to pay the fee. To this date"— the letter was dated January 1996—

"no such notification has been received by ourselves.

However, when school resumed following the Christmas break Richard's name did not appear on the passenger list. The bus driver continued to carry him on an unofficial basis, for which he has received a reprimand, whilst we attempted to resolve the situation. We were in the process of doing this and had been in touch with the LEA when Richard was refused access to the bus in order to come home from school. As we are not on the telephone it fell to his 65 year old grandmother to walk from her home in Moretonhampstead to collect him, whilst Michael travelled as normal. The insensitivity of this act towards a bemused 5-year-old child has left us shocked and dismayed, and has resulted in the ridiculous situation of one child travelling to and from school on the bus whilst we follow with the other in the car."

Their concluding words are far more graphic than anything I could devise:

"There are obviously wider issues here also. Government policy of expanding parental choice in education would appear, in rural Devon at least, to contain the proviso of having the financial wherewithal to reach the school of your choice. The result for many in Devon is, therefore, no choice.

I am aware that finances are tight—but this is an issue that can be resolved, in our case at least, at no extra cost to the council taxpayer."

That is a good example of what I said earlier.

Perhaps the most grotesque example, which, if it were not so serious would be laughable, concerns Mr. and Mrs. Walters who live in Denbury. Their nearest school is the South Dartmoor community college, which is some 4.3 miles away from their home, but that is not the school designated by the county council. The county has chosen Coombeshead college, which is an excellent school, as is Knowles Hill school, to which I shall refer in a moment.

Mr. and Mrs. Walters wanted their son Mark to go to Knowles Hill school. They contacted the headmaster and said that there appeared to be a problem in respect of the distance from their home to the school. So the headmaster had it measured. I quote from his letter to Mr. and Mrs. Walters:

"I have had the distance between your area and the two schools independently measured and I can confirm that Knowles Hill school is nearer than Coombeshead when measured along the route that all the children will travel."

One might have assumed that the country would be prepared to accept what the headmaster had said in that regard, but not a bit of it. Then, at God knows what cost in terms of officer time and the like, the county managed to devise a route whereby the designated school was nearer. It finally came up with a route which meant that Coombeshead was nearer than Knowles Hill by some 352 yd.

Coombeshead and Knowles Hill schools are not only in the same town and within sight of each other. Not only do they share part of a campus, but they share the same bus stop. In other words, whether Mark Walters travels to the school he wants to attend or the school that the county wants him to attend, he will have to get off the bus at the same stop. If one example shows beyond all doubt the motives behind the council's policy, that is it. The schools share the same bus stop, yet the county will not concede that parents have a right to choose.

I could cite numerous examples if time permitted. Some Catholic parents living in Dawlish wrote to me as follows:

"We thought that when our children left Our Lady and Saint Patrick's RC Primary School in Teignmouth to which free travel is provided they would be able to attend Cuthbert Mayne Secondary School Torquay with the majority of their classmates. At the end of the 1994 Easter term the 'temporary' bus service which had been in operation for many years was withdrawn by the county council from Dawlish. Parents wishing to send their children to Cuthbert Mayne then had to make alternative arrangements."

They continued, as so many parents have done, by asking what is happening to parental choice in Devon.

When one examines those cases and asks what fiscal policy is being served, the answer is none. Those parents are seeking the same contribution that the county would have had to make in any event. What possible straightforward, decent, laudable educational policy is being served by treating parents in such a way? It is ludicrous that a school bus is allowed to carry one sibling but not the other. The same bus route and the same bus stop can apply to two schools but the county will not allow parents any choice. Despite the fact that the LEA says that it is short of money, it considers it a good use of officers' time to devise a particular route to ensure that the route to its designated school is 352 yd shorter.

What can be done? I look forward to a change in the law so that local education authorities are not allowed to behave in that way. That is obviously something for the future. Today, I am concerned about the parents in my constituency. When the route between a designated school and a child's home is considered, it should be on the basis that it is a suitable, safe route that a child might reasonably take. I have cited a few examples, but I can give countless others where, to put it as neutrally as I can, there is a grave suspicion that the way in which Devon county council operates that policy has nothing to do with prudent financing and everything to do with thwarting an educational policy with which it is politically out of sympathy.

[Mr. Patrick Nicholls]

I hope that, in my hon. Friend's reply to the debate, she will at least say that she is prepared to examine those individual cases and the way in which Devon is operating the policy and attempt to bring some relief to parents in my constituency who, at present, have no hope.

12.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mrs. Cheryl Gillan): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) on securing the debate on a matter of great concern to parents and teachers in his constituency.

My hon. Friend is well known as a champion of parental choice in education. Therefore, it comes as no surprise to me that he has raised that issue in the context of school transport, particularly in the rural areas of his constituency. The Department is already well aware of my hon. Friend's deep concern about the issue following his correspondence with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last summer.

Home-to-school transport is a complex and at times contentious subject, so it is important to be clear about the legislation governing its provision. Let me begin by outlining the legislative duties and powers in relation to school transport that are set out in section 55 of the Education Act 1944. Briefly, it states that LEAs must provide free transport if they consider it is necessary to enable a pupil to attend school and that they may help other pupils with their fares.

LEAs have considerable scope to decide when transport is necessary. However, "necessary" is not defined in law; LEAs must consider each case on its merits. Relevant factors include specifically a pupil's age, the nature of possible routes to school and a parent's wish for a child to attend a school of religion or denomination to which the parent adheres.

Free transport is always necessary for pupils of compulsory school age—those aged between five and 16—who attend the nearest suitable school if it is beyond statutory walking distance. Free transport might exceptionally be necessary for a five to 16-year-old who lives within walking distance of the nearest suitable school or attends another school further away. It is for an LEA to consider such a case on its merits.

Court rulings, however, have made it clear that LEAs do not need to provide free transport for pupils whose parents have chosen to send them to a school which is not the nearest suitable one, even if it is beyond statutory walking distance. The additional cost of providing free transport in such circumstances has to be weighed against other priorities. LEAs have ample powers to support choice by helping pupils who do not qualify for free transport, but it is for each LEA to decide whether and how to exercise those powers.

In our view, LEAs' transport responsibilities have one main aim: to ensure that transport difficulties do not deny any pupil an education suitable to his or her ability, aptitude and any special educational needs. But the law rightly gives LEAs wide scope to adopt a transport policy that meets local and individual needs. However, two points are worth emphasising. First, an LEA's policy should always allow for individual cases to be considered and for appeals to be heard. Secondly, LEAs should ensure that their policy is widely known, so that parents can take account of it when making their choice of school.

In January 1994, my Department sent a letter to chief education officers setting out guidance which we have given in recent years to LEAs on a range of school transport issues. We made it clear that LEAs have the power to help with costs in cases where pupils are not entitled to free transport. We advised that those powers are intended, among other things, to help parents to secure their choice of school, especially in rural areas such as my hon. Friend's constituency, where we recognised that transport can pose particular problems.

It continues to be open to authorities to offer assistance to pupils whose parents have chosen to send them to a school that is not the nearest suitable one. In doing so, however, authorities will wish to continue to take account of two factors: first, whether a pupil's journey to school might be unduly long or tiring, or might otherwise conflict with a pupil's ability to profit educationally; secondly, the financial implications.

Against that background, I understand that it is Devon LEA's policy to provide free transport to a pupil's designated or nearest suitable school if it is beyond statutory walking distance. The policy allows for free transport to be provided in other exceptional circumstances, and allows for each case to be considered on its merits. As my hon. Friend has clearly shown, however, the LEA does not normally provide any assistance when parents choose to send their child to a school which is further away than their nearest or designated one—or, it would appear, to one just alongside.

As we have made clear in correspondence, that policy seems one which the courts would regard as lawful and reasonable, at least in the strict legal sense. My hon. Friend has helpfully outlined how the LEA is operating its policy in some specific cases, and he has certainly challenged its decisions on the basis of common sense. Moreover, on the basis of the evidence that he has presented, I have great sympathy with his views. There seems to be here an element of what might qualify for Esther Rantzen's "jobsworth" award. I would certainly like to look at it more closely. I will therefore follow up the matters that my hon. Friend has raised today, and I hope to be able to write to him in due course.

LEAs in England already spend about £300 million a year on home-to-school transport. Some 80 per cent. of that—around £240 million—is spent by the shires. Devon LEA spends about £12 million a year. My hon. Friend has said that Government funding is sometimes cited as a convenient beating board, so perhaps I should put on the record, once and for all, the financing of Devon's LEA.

Devon's education standard spending assessment for 1996-97 is about £345.9 million, an increase of 5.3 per cent. on 1995-96. It compares very favourably with the national increase of 4.5 per cent. Indeed, since 1990 Devon LEA has received a 38 per cent. increase in education funding. I hope that my hon. Friend will take note of the figures and use them in his constituency.

It is often argued, on parental choice, safety and environmental grounds, that school transport provision should be increased still further. Realistically speaking, demand for free or subsidised transport to schools will always exceed what LEAs think that they can afford, and spending more on transport would obviously mean spending less elsewhere on education.

There is, however, one way in which that gap might be bridged. Schools could supplement statutory transport provision by arranging transport to meet the needs of other pupils on a full cost-recovery basis. Such transport would help to enhance parental choice and could offer safety and environmental benefits.

Local authorities seem well placed to help schools with such arrangements. They have expertise in drawing up transport contracts and dealing with operators. They are familiar with transport law and with the strict rules governing transport provided for hire or reward. They also have greater buying power than individual schools. I think that there is great scope for LEAs and schools to co-operate in finding imaginative ways of helping—at minimal public expense—pupils who fall outside the free transport provisions established by the 1944 Act.

I get worried when I hear stories of LEAs allegedly attempting to thwart parental choice—one of the most successful elements of Conservative education policy. I fully appreciate, too, the difficulties that my hon. Friend has described. There is no doubt that decisions on the provision of school transport in rural areas like Devon can often be controversial and contentious, as my hon. Friend has ably demonstrated today.

I hope that I have explained that the law is perfectly clear on school transport and parental choice. This is an area of LEA discretion; but LEAs do have powers to assist pupils who do not qualify for free transport, including those whose parents have chosen to send them to a school that is not the nearest suitable one—even if it is beyond statutory walking distance. However, it is for each LEA to decide whether and how to exercise those powers.

The cases that my hon. Friend has cited will give anyone listening to the debate cause for thought. Hence, I repeat my undertaking to look into them in more detail and to write to my hon. Friend once we have probed more deeply into the facts. As for the other examples to which he referred but which, because of a lack of time, he was not able to describe in detail—I enhance my offer: if he will let my Department have the full details of those cases, I shall look into them as well. I hope that my response has been helpful.

Rural Development (Isle of Eigg)

12.57 pm

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The Isle of Eigg was bought from Mr. Keith Schellenberg in April 1995 by a still mysterious German—allegedly a "fire energy" painter, called Marlin Eckhard Maruma, of Stuttgart. He is understood to have paid about DM4 million, which is about £1.6 million. Mystery also surrounds where he got the money from.

This man's purchase of the island, and subsequent descent to it in a helicopter was surrounded with ballyhoo and promise. A fast ferry was to be introduced; holiday cottages were to be built; a sports hall and swimming pool would be constructed. There would be a medical centre; there would be horse breeding, and a fish farm would be developed around the lodge. Security of tenure was promised to tenants. The village hall site was to be sold to the community.

Now, 13 months on, only one thing has happened. The estate livestock—about 1,000 sheep and 70 cattle—have been sold, at an inappropriate time, to pay the stockman, who now has no stock.

I shall quote passages from letters in a continuing correspondence between the Government and myself about Eigg. I begin with a letter from myself to the Secretary of State on 29 August 1995. It reads:

"I am increasingly concerned about the future of the Isle of Eigg. I realise that the purchase of land is not regulated by the state, but, in this case, there is a small and precarious community whose life is very much bound up with the behaviour of the landlord. I wonder what consideration has been given to the situation by the Scottish Office and if it has included consideration of purchasing it for the nation."

A reply came from the Earl of Lindsay, not from the Secretary of State. The letter is interesting because it encapsulates the Government's attitude to this issue. The Minister's letter of 21 September 1995 reads:

"I am in no doubt that the system of private ownership of land which prevails in Scotland is the most effective way of achieving a good quality of life for all who live in Scotland. It would not only be undesirable but also impracticable for the Government to seek to purchase large areas of Scotland or to impose detailed management prescriptions on privately owned land."

I shall quote next from a letter sent by Lord James, our dear, beloved Minister of State, who I think is responsible for the highlands. But perhaps that is a task that the Under-Secretary of State has inherited. I see that the Minister nods. It is probably the only time that he will nod during the debate. On 3 April the Minister of State wrote:

"As you know"—

these letters always include "as you know", but I seldom do. When I am told, I often find the information difficult to believe. After "As you know", the letter reads:

"the Government are firmly committed"— they are always "firmly committed", not merely committed—

"to the removal of unnecessary and anti-competitive restrictions. The introduction of any regulatory mechanism governing who should be allowed to own property would be inconsistent with this policy."

[Sir Russell Johnston]

Let us consider more closely the Government's responses. We have the letter from the Earl of Lindsay about it being

"undesirable but also impracticable . . . to purchase large areas of Scotland".

I did not suggest that the Government should consider purchasing large areas of Scotland. No one has made that suggestion. I am asking the Government whether they are prepared to take some action in the few, but concerning, instances when a landlord behaves irresponsibly and insensitively and thereby puts a community at risk. That is what was asked. The Government chose not to reply to that question.

Incidentally, the Earl of Lindsay's letter of 21 September ended as follows:

"I know it must be unsettling for the people of the island and I shall continue to watch developments."

Doubtless the Minister has. He has certainly done nothing else. He, the Scottish Office and the Government have watched a community be put at risk, yet they have taken no action. At the same time they have excluded any of the solutions on offer.

Again, I shall quote the Earl of Lindsay, the Under-Secretary of State. The quotations may be boring for some, and I apologise to them, but at the same time they are interesting to me and others. On 25 March, the Earl wrote to me on behalf of the Secretary of State. The letter reads:

"You suggested that the Government might purchase Eigg, or allow the local community to do so, should the island be put on the market. We do not consider that it would be appropriate for the Government to purchase the island, but we would not stand in the way of the islanders acquiring the land if they so wished."

Big deal. How magnanimous.

Oddly enough, I did not ask the Government whether they would "stand in the way". I told the Secretary of State that there were proposals for a community buy-out, which might be a good solution. I explained that raising the money would be difficult. I observed that if the Scottish Office could in some way act as a guarantor, that might make such a buy-out feasible. I asked the right hon. Gentleman to give that some thought. The Government's evasion is a bad way of treating the islanders, bearing in mind the patient and polite persistence of someone such as Karen Helliwell, the secretary of the Eigg residents association, on whose behalf I advanced the argument.

I return to the Earl of Lindsay's letter. I apologise to my hon. Friends for so doing. His final sentence is one that my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) would describe as "a cracker". The Earl wrote:

"As you know"—

here we go again—

"we are committed"—

he did not write "firmly committed", only "committed". Weakness is creeping in. The letter continues to tell me that the Scottish Office is "committed"

"to the sensitive and sustainable development of rural areas."

All that I can say in reply to that is, "Rubbish." The Government are committed to the removal of any restrictions on the landlord's actions and opposed to any regulations, or central action, that might protect tenants or crofters, or any individuals living on an estate, in this instance Eigg. How can a Government who are pressing for unfettered deregulation be committed to the "sensitive and sustainable development of rural areas"?

As a Liberal, I applaud private initiative. I believe that it should be encouraged. By the same token, I see the state as having a duty to protect the weak and defend the exploited. Such action may require regulation or intervention. The Government have done nothing but watch.

What could they do? First, they could buy, as Rhum was bought. One of the national community instruments could be used to manage the island, as Scottish Natural Heritage manages Rhum and as the National Trust manages Canna, gifted through the generosity of that remarkable man John Lorne Campbell, who died, full of years, last week.

Secondly, the Government could underwrite a local community buy-out. As I have said, the Government have not responded to that possibility. Thirdly, the Government could urgently send a representative to Eigg so as to obtain a clear picture of what is certainly a fast-deteriorating situation, and then act directly on behalf of the community to negotiate with Mr. Maruma, who no one seems able to find. I am certain that the Germans would help the Government to find him. We know that he exists; he is in Stuttgart. Only the Government have the power, authority and resources to act in such a way. Neither councillors nor hon. Members can match the Government's powers in this respect.

Fourthly, and lastly—I give the Minister a little warning—in the short term, the Government should act to protect development funds that may lapse or have lapsed because of Mr. Maruma's neglect. I refer especially to the money budgeted for the hall and the prospect of funds for the millennium forest project, which should be reinstated. I am sure that the Minister knows that the project could not be proceeded with, given Maruma's failure to sign the requisite documents, despite the deadline being twice extended.

The people of Eigg look to the Minister to help them in a situation where only the Government can act. I do not intend to enter wider, long-term areas. I am sure that the Minister knows that what has happened in Eigg has happened before, as it happened in Raasay, which is still very much in my memory. Dr. Green was popularly known as Dr. No in those days. We know that Knoydart is again on the market. It is not enough for the Government to say simply that they will watch. They must act.

1.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Kynoch): I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) on securing this debate on the subject of Eigg, which is in his constituency. He has been on his normal form and most entertaining, but somewhat cynical in some matters.

I have considerable sympathy for the position in which the Isle of Eigg's residents find themselves. Small islands such as Eigg point up in an especially prominent way the problems facing many rural communities in the highlands and islands, where there is a need for all sections of the community to work together to common ends.

The Government wish to encourage such an approach, based on partnership between local residents and the main Government Departments, Government agencies, the local authority and private and voluntary bodies operating in the region. We believe that the way forward lies in promoting partnerships, not in introducing, as I suspect the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber might wish, new regulations on the purchase and sale of land.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I am interested in what the Minister says because the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) has raised a significant point. Is the Minister saying that the people of Eigg should have no legal redress? Surely, landowners' responsibilities should be matched by duties, and there should be some mechanism for legal redress.

Mr. Kynoch: I hear what the hon. Lady says. I believe not in regulation but in deregulation. That is a significant difference between Conservative and Opposition Members. Clearly, the island's owner has a responsibility not only for the environment, but for looking after his asset.

May I just recap? As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber said, Eigg is one of the group of islands west of Mallaig known as the small isles. Each island—Eigg, Rhum, Muck and Canna—has its unique features, different landownership and other characteristics. Each is outstanding for its scenic and natural heritage qualities.

Eigg's economy has traditionally been based on crofting, with some larger farms, forestry and inshore fishing. I am glad that, more recently, efforts have been made to increase tourism to that beautiful part of Scotland. The islanders have taken the initiative in developing new enterprises such as a tea room at the pierhead, craft goods and accommodation for visitors.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): As the Minister mentions the efforts to promote tourism, which, as he rightly points out, are extremely important to the economy of fragile islands such as Eigg, may I draw his attention to the concerns of people on the Sleat peninsula on the Isle of Skye? Despite the fact that there is an improved service between Mallaig and the Isle of Skye, Caledonian MacBrayne's summer schedules do not allow people to make day trips to the small isles. The good efforts to promote tourism and to help the island of Eigg in that respect have been thwarted by Caledonian MacBrayne's inability to get its schedules in order. Will the Minister do something about that?

Mr. Kynoch: As I think the hon. Gentleman knows, about 10 days ago I chaired a meeting of the Scottish tourism co-ordinating group in Inverness, where all the relevant interests associated with tourism meet regularly to discuss how they can work better together to ensure that we build on our remarkable success with tourism in Scotland. We are trying to ensure even better co-ordination on transport links both within Scotland and to Scotland so that we can build on that success, but I take on board the hon. Gentleman's comments.

It is important that we have good transport links, but, equally, it is important that we have good facilities for tourists when they get there. That is why I wanted to refer to the moves by Eigg's population to build something to attract tourism to their island. On that front, I recommend that they work closely with the local enterprise company and with Highlands and Islands Enterprise to find out what assistance and co-ordination they can achieve in their efforts to achieve even greater success.

There is an active community life on the island. All that augurs well for the locally based economic and social development that we wish to promote through the partnership measures set out in the rural White Paper. The Government believe that there can be merits in local communities taking greater control over their own future, including in—

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth and Kinross): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Kynoch: I wanted to try to get through a response to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber and I understood that the tradition was that, if hon. Members wanted to intervene in an Adjournment debate, they should give notice in advance. I have not had prior notice and therefore I have been more than generous in having local interventions—the constituency of the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) certainly adjoins that of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber.

Sir Russell Johnston: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Kynoch: Certainly.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am sorry to intervene. I say with some hesitation, but gently, to the Minister that we have 15 minutes left and I doubt whether he will take the whole lot. We have that time because the last debate ran short, so we should take advantage of that to allow other hon. Members to take part.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. These are half-hour Adjournment debates and the traditions of such debates are exactly the same in the mornings as they are late at night. These are not the one-and-a-half hour Adjournment debates where there can be adequate interplay, but strictly half-hour constituency Adjournment debates.

Mr. Kynoch: I follow what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and shall proceed accordingly.

The Government believe that there can be merits in local communities taking greater control over their future, including, in some cases, by the purchase of land where they can raise the money to do so. The Government's crofting initiative, whereby the Secretary of State's crofting estates are available for sale to individual crofters or to crofting trusts, is a demonstration of that.

In the case of private estates, the Government do not favour compulsion or new regulations to intervene in the land market, but their agencies stand ready to assist local communities in particular circumstances—for example, where projects that are developed with the backing of local people merit priority. It is, of course, open to any community to bid to acquire an estate in the same way as any other party.

[Mr. Kynoch]

We are all aware that crofters in Assynt set up a trust to purchase the North Lochinver estate to ensure that its future development would be in their best interest. If the people of Eigg wish to follow that route, I wish them every success, but, as far as I am aware, the island has not been put on the market. I commend the islanders, however, because I understand that they are already looking to put together a funding package against the possibility that it is offered for sale.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber made light of and was slightly cynical on the subject of raising funding. It is clearly not easy to raise funds, but I know that the islanders will benefit from the experience of the people in Assynt and that they have already, I understand, been in touch with the new Highland council. I hope that they will have included also Highlands and Islands Enterprise. Clearly, they need first to produce a business plan. I understand that they are well advanced in that, for which I commend them.

Mrs. Ewing: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Kynoch: With respect to the hon. Lady, I understood what you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, said regarding Adjournment debates and, with the hon. Lady's agreement, I should like to proceed.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber gave me some indication last night of the efforts of the former Highlands and Islands development board. I recall that the board developed plans in the late 1970s to intervene in the management of private estates where that management was regarded as being inconsistent with the interests of the wider community. However, such draconian powers have never been tested, and I do not think that they are the correct approach. The Government's approach is to encourage local communities to work in partnership with Government Departments, Government agencies, local authorities and private sector bodies. Such an approach is at the heart of the measures that were announced in our rural White Paper in December.

Rural policy in Scotland is about the livelihoods of rural communities, the countryside and the lives of those who live and work there. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about the people of Eigg?"] As far as I am aware, Eigg has a largely rural community to which rural policies relate, and those policies should be applied so that the people of Eigg can benefit.

The future of rural Scotland should rest with the people in the rural communities because they are best placed to understand what is most needed in their areas. We are determined to encourage and empower rural communities to achieve a prosperity that is shaped by their own priorities. The White Paper on rural policy for Scotland brought together the many and diverse activities that are already under way to support Scotland's rural communities. It drew into one document our policies for rural communities and how they are put into practice. Working in partnership has been and will continue to be the cornerstone of our approach to rural Scotland.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: This is flannel.

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman speaks about flannel. We believe in partnership but, unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman believes in the state taking over ownership, which is why he is so closely allied to the Labour party. As we all know, the Liberal Democrat party is in bed with the Labour party but its members do not like saying that in parts of Scotland, because it would be electorally disadvantageous.

The White Paper contained more than 25 commitments to action, ranging from new research on rural schools and rural crime to the publication of a discussion paper on the coast and planning guidance for small towns. It also contained three linked proposals for a framework for rural development in Scotland and a system that would help local people to take action on their own behalf. The White Paper consists of three main elements. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) should listen, because the White Paper deals with partnership.

The document consists of three elements. First, it proposes the establishment of local, rural partnerships, drawing together the main bodies that operate in a particular area and including the local residents. Secondly, it proposes a national, rural partnership to provide advice on good practice to local groups—a process that could benefit the people of Eigg. Thirdly, and most importantly, the White Paper contains proposals for a new Scottish rural partnership fund totalling £2.5 million and additional resources to help local partnerships to become established and to help local projects.

A new rural challenge fund of £500,000 has been set up, and it is part of the Scottish rural partnership fund. It is now open to local communities to apply for help to fund projects that meet local priority needs. I encourage the residents of Eigg to form a local partnership in conjunction with the local authority and Government agencies, and to submit proposals to the rural challenge fund. The closing date for the first tranche of bids is 15 June. That is the way forward for the residents of Eigg, and we hope to announce the first successful projects in July.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber spoke about the funds for the hall and forest and suggested that they should be protected. I understand that the funds for the forestry projects on Eigg remain available and that the only hindrance is the agreement of the landowner. As the hon. Gentleman has flagged up, that is clearly a problem, but I hope that in due course the hurdle can be overcome. Highlands and Islands Enterprise is always ready to consider proposals, and in the past has provided funding for a music festival.

Specific projects should be submitted to that body and, of course, they will be judged on their merits. The hon. Gentleman's speech was full of cynical jibes which, as I have said, are typical of his party, about the Government's commitment to rural Scotland. My right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) contributed much to rural Scotland during his many years as a Scottish Office Minister, and knows exactly what I am talking about.

The Government's commitment to rural Scotland is measured in billions of pounds, and there is evidence that the commitment is working. Employment in rural Scotland increased by 6.5 per cent. in the period 1981-91 compared with an overall Scottish increase of 1.1 per cent. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Moray makes light of that but, of course, the opposition parties do not like hearing success stories. Unfortunately, they thrive on failure, which is why they will never make progress in Scotland.

The population of rural Scotland increased by about 3.5 per cent. over the same period compared with a Scottish decrease of 1.4 per cent. Long-term unemployment tends to be less severe in rural Scotland. Moreover, rural dwellers feel that the disadvantages that they face are more than balanced by the positive aspects of a clean, safe environment and their sense of belonging to a community.

The Government are doing much to help Scotland's rural communities, which include islands such as Eigg. That is not done by applying restrictive and oppressive controls of the kind that failed so disastrously in eastern Europe and elsewhere and which might be advocated by opposition parties, but by empowering local communities to identify and meet the challenges that they face. The measures in the rural White Paper provide real opportunities to local communities, such as those on the island of Eigg. I recommend that the islanders take full advantage of those opportunities.

Wind Turbines

1.27 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am grateful for the opportunity to open this debate, which is important to my constituency. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Sir D. Thompson) and the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall), who is extremely interested in wind turbines, are in their places.

Energy consumption is increasing, and it is right for the Government to weigh up the environmental impact on the country of increased demand. They have to fulfil their Rio commitments to reduce harmful greenhouse gases, carbon dioxide and methane, and the acidic gases, sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxides, which are associated with traditional fossil fuel burning.

Sulphur dioxide and carbon dioxide damage crops, cause a decline in forests, acidify lakes and damage the soil. Historic buildings and metals are also eroded and, of course, there are the damaging long-term effects on human health. Asthma and bronchitis are examples. We cannot be insensitive to the appalling problems that will face the world if action is not taken to reverse global warming and acid rain.

Faced with increasing energy demands and improved research, which is able to quantify in detail the environmental damage that is caused by fossil fuels, how substantive is the lure of any energy source that offers a menu of safety and cleanliness and which is renewable and natural? Why do I seem to do a rather poor impersonation of Don Quixote by tilting at windmills when I should be embracing them? It was Don Quixote who, on glancing at 30 or 40 windmills on the plain, stated that he was prepared to engage in battle to slay those giants:

"For this is righteous warfare, and it is God's good service to sweep so evil a breed off the face of the earth."

He was a few hundred years ahead of his time. If he was to travel around some parts of the country, he would find no shortage of monstrous giants to tilt at.

In 1991, there were 13 wind turbines; today, we have 518. In my constituency, two anemometers are testing the strength of wind power. If it is sufficient, there will no doubt be an application for wind turbines in the Ribble Valley, which is one of the most beautiful parts of the country. Some wind turbines are 100 ft high, and there are proposals for some more than 200 ft high, monotonously pumping iron and producing relatively small amounts of energy at enormous cost to our natural environment by wrecking the peace of rural areas, scarring the countryside and ruining landscapes. As they multiply around the country, they will prove to be a price not worth paying.

The more I investigate wind turbines, the more I am convinced that the Government will take a long, hard look at their efficiency and benefits compared with the massive sacrifice that some parts of the UK have had to make. They will say that enough is enough. I hope that they will reach that conclusion sooner rather than later. As the chairman of the Countryside Commission said at the beginning of the year:

"England's scenic countryside is in danger of being turned into a windpower wilderness."

[Mr. Nigel Evans]

Seventeen wind energy sites have already been earmarked in or adjacent to sites in the vicinity of national parks. Seven are to be developed on heritage coasts or areas of high landscape value. We are in danger of industrialising some of our most beautiful countryside.

If economic benefit and the efficient production of energy were on the side of the wind argument, cost-benefit analyses would fall more often on the side of the wind factories. However, they do not. According to planning policy guidance 22, the aim of the planning system is to secure economy efficiency and amenity in the use of land in the public interest. That is where wind turbines do not measure up to the hype that surrounds them.

It would take a wind farm the size of the city of Birmingham to produce the same amount of electricity as a modern 1,000 MW nuclear power station. When I learned that, I did not think about the amount of space involved or the raw materials needed to build so many wind turbines, but it made me realise how inefficient wind farms are. There are 518 wind turbines in Britain. To put the matter into context, at 5.10 pm on 29 January this year, UK demand for power was 48,400 MW. The 40 wind farms produced 64 MW of that energy. That gives some idea of how many we would need to have a real impact on our energy supply.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): May I invite the hon. Gentleman to attend meetings of the all-party renewable and sustainable energy group, which discusses such matters regularly and makes it clear that the energy and electricity supplies of the future will depend on relatively small contributions from a range of different renewable resources? Does he accept that the impact of wind energy is as nothing compared to the huge ecological impact of the continued use of fossil fuels—let alone that of the use of nuclear energy?

Mr. Evans: I would be delighted to attend future meetings. We must examine a variety of energy resources, but also what measures can be taken to ensure that the fossil fuels that are burned contribute less to sulphur dioxide and carbon dioxide emissions into the atmosphere. Certain measures must be taken by the energy companies to reduce harmful emissions into the air.

That does not mean that we should do away with one energy source and cover the United Kingdom with windmills. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that the biggest wind farm in Europe is in Powys; it has 103 turbines that produce in a year what a conventional 2,000 MW power station produces in two days. It would require 16,000 windmills to produce that energy.

As well as driving up the costs, the intermittent nature of wind brings other disadvantages. According to the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology:

"the variable and unpredictable nature of wind energy may mean that . . . not all of the potential savings in emissions will be realised."

That failure to fulfil its potential is caused by two main deficiencies. First, there is the need to provide reserve capacity. Secondly, there are cycling losses caused by the additional fossil fuel used in the increased start-up and shut-down of stations due to the need to adapt to unpredictable changes in the supply of wind. Fossil fuels would still be needed.

Wind power supplies up to 0.1 per cent. of our national electricity needs. To reach the potential that is often talked about, which is in the region of 10 per cent. of the nation's energy, we would need between 30,000 and 40,000 wind turbines. That would occupy 1,500 square miles. It is not only a case of not in my back yard, but not in my front yard as well.

The Countryside Council for Wales said in its policy document on wind turbine power stations:

"while they are welcomed as a source of renewable energy, the scale of their contribution to meeting energy needs does not justify overturning established planning policies and safeguards".

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): I have no interest to declare. My hon. Friend will agree that the wind factories are blown. The biggest U-turn in politics this decade has been that by the Greens, the conservationists and the rest against wind farms. They are recognised as blights on the land.

My hon. Friend can frighten them away. He can be Don Quixote. We frightened them away from the Bronte moors by sticking to the truth and by putting the facts to the people, not by hiding behind the spurious figures and comparisons that are turned out by a business that is in the honourable profession of making money, but also in the dishonourable profession of irreparably scarring the landscape.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is his own Don Quixote. I congratulate him on his success in preserving the natural beauty of his countryside. Up to now, the argument in favour of windmills has been dominant. People have been afraid to say that there is a downside to them. That is why I have initiated this debate.

Even Friends of the Earth, which recently wrote to me saying that the best way to stop pollution and save energy is to "turn off the light and the television set", admits:

"most of the best areas for wind energy, due to the high mean annual wind speeds, correlate with areas that have . . . landscape and conservation value."

Those are often beautiful areas.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): I thank the hon. Gentleman for introducing the subject in the way he has. Does he agree that the point is not so much the existence of wind turbines, which have an important part to play in renewable energy, as the problems that he mentioned with their location? To speak selfishly, that is especially true in his constituency of the uplands that form an important part of the landscape for many thousands of my constituents who live miles away from them. Does he agree that it is invidious to put the biggest windmills so far all the way down Kirby moor in south Cumbria, blighting an important landscape?

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. It is not only people who live in such places who suffer from the visual impact of wind turbines. Thousands of people visit those places because of the beauty of the countryside. The last thing they need is industrial activity—and that is what it is—created by the imposition of wind turbine factories.

The siting of such turbines must be handled sensitively. That is one of the major reasons that I sought the debate. It is not only the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Industry but of the Department of the Environment to take action to review PPG 22, which has done some damage in respect of where turbines are to be sited.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have seen the wind farm at Cliviger, between my constituency and Calder Valley. It is in a most beautiful area, and is visible wherever one is in Burnley. The planners said that it would be possible to see it only in close proximity. It is very damaging, and further wind farms in our area would be unacceptable.

Mr. Evans: I totally agree with the hon. Gentleman. I know his strong feelings on the issue. One would have to have extremely impaired vision not to be able to see the windmills in his constituency.

Mr. Pike: They can be seen from your constituency.

Mr. Evans: Indeed, I can see them from mine. I know about his problems, and wish him well in any future fights to prevent further intrusion on the open countryside in his constituency.

Not only is the north-west suffering. In Scotland, there is a proposal for 37 turbines at Helmsdale. I have spoken to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), whose constituency includes Helmsdale. He has fought the proposal.

It is amazing that such an application has been accepted, particularly in the face of opposition from Scottish National Heritage, the community councils, local landowners, tenants, tourists and most of the local inhabitants. There is a very strong campaign. I understand that those 37 turbines would be visible from one of the most scenic stretches of road in the country. It would have a devastating impact in the area, and I hope that the Secretary of State for Scotland will use his power to look at the decision, and—hopefully—his good sense and judgment to overturn it.

As the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) has intimated, some of the turbines are far taller than Nelson's column and can be seen for miles around. I agree with my noble Friend Lord Parkinson, who said about wind turbines when he was Secretary of State for Energy:

"nobody could call them beautiful, in fact they are extremely ugly".

Lord Stoddart made the point succinctly when he said:

"wind turbines are visually ugly and destructive of the landscape. The best way of obtaining energy is to conserve it."

When applications to erect wind factories have reached a public inquiry—there have been four to date—they have always been defeated, because the environmental impact has always outweighed the energy they produce.

Apart from the problems that I have already mentioned, there are also problems of noise and electromagnetic interference. The latter affects television signals, and people have to switch to cable television to overcome interference. Unfortunately, the noise problem is not so easily overcome. Mechanical noise has resulted in several turbines on a wind farm in Holland being stopped for eight hours each night due to complaints from neighbouring residents.

One victim of wind factory blight said in The Daily Telegraph a couple of years ago:

"The 'thrump' of the blades and grinding gears is driving us to distraction. My kitchen amplifies these noises sickeningly. Since commissioning in July, the house has frequently vibrated with penetrating soundwaves. At night, these disrupt sleep, even when all the windows are closed. As I write, turbine droning is audible above the computer's hum. For my family and those in a similar plight on windfarm sites in Wales and Cornwall, there is a distressing human cost to this supposedly environmentally friendly electricity. For us, this is no brave, new, clean energy but a rapacious industrial giant."

Research in America, Japan and Germany predicts that people living within two miles of wind farms may have medical effects from infrasonic vibration. One person is the first in Wales to achieve a council tax reduction because the value of his house has fallen. The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs has even admitted that the noise is clearly disturbing and unpleasant, and may have some psychological effects. If we want the green and the peace, turbines are not for us.

Even such an authority as Jonathon Porritt wrote in The Daily Telegraph:

"The modern wind turbine is a mighty intrusive beast. It's not into nestling, blending in or any of the other clichés so beloved of rural romantics".

Of course turbines have to be obtrusive in the landscape, in order to catch the wind.

Turbines have also proved deadly to birds. A two-year study in California showed that 500 birds had been killed, including 78 protected golden eagles. Other studies have demonstrated that some of the more astute birds fly up to 500 m away from the wind turbines to avoid them, and therefore reduce their natural habitat. If it were not for the non-fossil fuel levy, skewing the price in favour of such a form of energy generation, nobody would touch it.

Mr. Dafis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evans: No, I am coming to the end.

Wind turbines are relatively inefficient, highly visible and extremely ugly. They scar the natural beauty of the countryside; they are a blot on the landscape. Their continuous noise—audible and subsonic—is extremely monotonous and unpleasant, and might cause health and psychological problems. Bird habitats are destroyed, and many birds are killed. Tourists dislike them, and residents suffer through lower property values. Infrastructure still has to be erected in the countryside first to direct and then to harness the energy produced. If it were not for the subsidy, we would not be buying their power.

What is in favour of windmills? There is the mythology that, somehow, there is no downside to the sticking of a few harmless windmills out of the way in remoteish areas where they will produce bounteous amounts of energy at no cost to anyone. I am afraid that that is tosh.

I ask the Minister to look again at fresh ways in which to conserve energy, and at research into improving the harnessing of wind energy, making it more viable, and giving more weight to local authorities so that they feel secure in saying no to unsightly turbines in the countryside—not only in areas of outstanding natural beauty or national parks, but areas abutting them. Many areas outside areas of outstanding natural beauty are still remarkably beautiful. If we are to persist with such turbines, we must get the siting right. If we do not, we will be guilty of ruining one of Britain's greatest assets: our green and pleasant land.

1.45 pm

The Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) for giving us the opportunity to debate wind power. I also thank him and all hon. Members who are present for not falling into the obvious trap of saying how appropriate it is that politicians are discussing wind.

My hon. Friend's speech and the interventions in this very short debate show the interest in the subject. My hon. Friend will have noticed that there is not a completely unanimous view on wind power. I should like a much longer debate in future, because the matter is extremely important and valuable to our country and our economy.

My hon. Friend raised the specifics of wind power. It is a major part of the renewable energy scene. In supporting renewable energy, the Government are committed to the principle of sustainable development, and make it the touchstone of their policies. If my hon. Friend has some idea that the Government will walk away from the idea, he is doomed to disappointment.

Government policy is to stimulate the development of new and renewable energy sources, including wind energy, whenever there is the prospect of it being economically attractive and environmentally acceptable, to contribute to the diversity, security and sustainability of energy supplies. My hon. Friend rightly referred—if he did not mention it, I certainly would—to the reduction in the emission of pollutants.

In doing that, the Government have to take account of what influences business competitiveness. We are working towards 1,500 MW of declared net capacity of the new electricity generating capacity from renewable sources by 2000. That broadly sets out the Government's objectives. The principal instrument for achieving that 1,500 MW by 2000 is the making of orders under the non-fossil fuel obligation—with parallel arrangements, as everybody knows, in Scotland and Northern Ireland—that goes under the name of NFFO. That makes it sound like some sort of toffee bar, but I think that everybody knows what it stands for. It is a considerable success, of which the Government can be rightly proud.

Already, more than 330 MW of declared net capacity is operational, of which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley has said, about 66 MW comes from wind. There are 37 wind projects, including 28 wind farms, operating in the United Kingdom. I am very pleased with the progress made in that direction. It shows that the Government have been right to give some support to the wind industry to enable it to gain a footing.

To justify that confident support, the industry has had an opportunity to show its skill and enterprise. The Government announced a fourth renewable order in England and Wales in November 1995 for another 400 MW, which will help us towards the target of 1,500 MW. There are also proposals under SRO-2 for an expected 70 to 80 MW of new capacity in Scotland, and for 45 MW of new capacity in Northern Ireland under the NI-NFFO 2 order. These are aims and the objectives of the NFFO programme.

I have been most encouraged by the response to the NFFO orders, which expresses the enthusiasm and commitment to an emerging industry. The industry is not just about providing energy for this country from renewable sources, as there are other areas of activity that can help this country. I wish to talk in a moment about the export and manufacturing capacity created in this country through the NFFO orders.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley calculated that the city of Birmingham would need to be covered with wind farms if we were to reach the 10 per cent. energy level. I must assure him that the Government have no intention of turning the city of Birmingham into a wind farm—the wind levels there are not quite sufficient. Nevertheless, we must remember that, if we were to move towards that 10 per cent. level, we would reduce the pollutants coming into this country from carbon sources by 8 million tonnes of carbon. That is an immense amount of pollutant, and it cannot just be lightly tossed to one side. The 10 per cent. figure is the maximum practical response that can be achieved, but would require, I understand, some 1 per cent. of the UK's land area to bring that about.

The export potential of wind energy is considerable. It is estimated that about 50,000 wind turbines, representing 22,000 MW of electricity generating capacity, can be built in the next 10 years, and that the business is worth £11 billion. In Britain, the NFFO programme has created success stories. The packed Gallery up there ensures that such success stories receive no publicity in the press.

For example, a company called Airlaminates is selling wind turbine blades around the world, and its orders in 1995 have exceeded £2.3 million. Coupe Foundry Ltd. in Preston has won some £2 million of orders to supply the major components of a German wind turbine. McNulty Offshore in South Shields recently won an order to supply 30 towers, with a value of more than £2 million, for a wind farm in Scotland. Aerpack Ltd. is planning to go ahead with a factory in Scotland to manufacture complete wind turbine blades. I wonder whether the workers in those factories would want wind energy to be tossed to one side, following the rather draconian measures advocated in some quarters.

Progress ultimately depends on developers' abilities to find sufficient sites that are acceptable in planning terms, particularly from the point of view of noise and visual impact. I must emphasise that the holding of a NFFO contract does not confer any special presumption in favour of gaining planning consent.

Mr. Dafis: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Page: With respect, I want to put on record the planning process, and I literally have only a few minutes to do so. Today's debate is not long enough to do the subject sufficient justice.

In view of the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley, I thought that it would be helpful to set out some of the planning arrangements in detail. The Government recognise that renewable energy is different from fossil and nuclear forms of generation, in that they are decentralised and small scale. Hence they differ in land use and other material planning considerations.

In considering this, the Government issued specific planning guidance on renewable energies, PPG 22, in February 1993. PPG 22 reiterates the fundamental principles of planning, and deals with particular issues raised by renewables. It states that planning decisions have to reconcile the interests of development with the importance of conserving the environment—the issue at the heart of sustainable development. Specifically in relation to energy, it states that the Government's general aim is to ensure that society's needs for energy are met in a way that is compatible with the need to protect the environment, both global and local.

PPG 22 says that planning authorities must weigh carefully the Government's policies for developing renewable energy sources with those for protecting the environment, and draws particular attention to those relating to the countryside, PPG 7, and the coast, PPG 20. PPG 22 states that planning applications should be determined in accordance with the structure plans of the county council and the local plans of the district councils. Those plans are required to include policies for conserving wildlife and the natural beauty and amenity of the land. PPG 22 also requires that they now take account of the Government's policy on renewable energy.

Although we have had a quick gallop through the subject, I hope that the House will return to it in the fulness of time in much greater detail, because it is of immense value to our society. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley's parallel with Don Quixote is a good one, and perhaps he should not use it in the future. If I remember rightly, Don Quixote had a fairly chequered career, most of which was completely and utterly unsuccessful. Wind power is here to stay, and we must make sure that it is introduced in a sensitive fashion.

It being six minutes to Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS

University College London Bill

Order for consideration read.

Considered; to be read the Third time.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Beef

1. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to meet the Scottish National Farmers Union to discuss problems in the beef industry associated with bovine spongiform encephalopathy; and if he will make a statement. [26048]

4. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with representatives of the beef industry in Scotland. [26052]

11. Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the National Farmers Union of Scotland concerning beef production; and if he will make a statement. [26061]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Scottish Office Ministers have regularly met representatives of the Scottish National Farmers Union over recent weeks and I have established an industry group which regularly meets my senior officials.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that urgent practical steps need to be taken now so that consumer confidence can be won back and the European ban lifted? Will he therefore consider the possibility of ensuring that the cattle disposal scheme is fully available throughout Scotland by the end of this week, and will he use his influence with the intervention board to try to get more beef out of the system north of the border? In addition, will he consider the possibility of relaxing some of the rules of the special beef premium scheme so that more cattle will be eligible for the subsidy and of waiving the scaling back of the financial limit on the scheme for 1995? If he does not do so, in six months there will be no beef industry to save.

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of lifting the beef ban, and I hope that he and his colleagues, who have been such enthusiasts for passing more power to Brussels, will learn from this experience.

With regard to the proposals that he has put forward, I will ensure that they are drawn to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. My right hon. and learned Friend and I have been determined to take measures as speedily as possible, and we have been guided in our conduct of policy by the splendid way in which the farming unions have spoken for the industry as a united industry and have worked with others who have an interest in the matter.

Mr. Arnold: Is my right hon. Friend aware that farmers throughout the country bitterly resent the proposal by bureaucrats in Brussels for a holocaust of British cows in response to the panic of the German housewife? Is it not an irony and a tragedy that the panic about British beef was started in this very House by the irresponsible scaremongering of the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman)?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend about the considerable concern throughout the United Kingdom about the impact of this unjustified ban on British beef. I also agree with what he says about the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), but I would exempt from that criticism the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and his colleagues, who were rather more restrained in their response and did not, in my view, contribute to some of the hysterical coverage which came as a result of the hon. Member for Peckham trying to make political capital. I hope that that will not embarrass the hon. Member for Hamilton.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my right hon. Friend accept that everyone appreciates very much the work that he and Lord Lindsay have done to resolve this problem? Will he answer two questions? First, as the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) asked, will he implement the disposal scheme as quickly as possible, particularly in relation to slow-maturing cattle? Secondly, will he say something about exporters of beef, who are in desperate trouble along with the farmers?

Mr. Forsyth: The 30-month scheme will be in operation tomorrow, and steps are being taken to get information out to producers so that they are aware of the system. On exports, my right hon. Friend is absolutely right to point out their crucial importance to Scotland's beef industry. We produce very high-quality beef products, and we have worked for years to develop those export markets. The position is similar in Northern Ireland. It is very disappointing to see the stress that is being placed on those sections of the industry that have done so much for British interests in the past. I am currently considering, with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, what measures we can find to help those who are dependent on the export trade, and how to take account of the specific circumstances of exporters.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the Secretary of State regret in any way his statement at Inverness that the scientific committees in the European Union were under political direction?

Mr. Forsyth: I neither regret it nor retract it. The fact is that it is there for all to see. Our scientific advice states that there is no justification whatever for the ban on British beef, and the World Health Organisation has taken the same view. It is quite sad to see the way in which people who should be free to take a professional view are at variance with the view of every major global authority. In my view, that is because they are acting under political direction from member states, which have no justification for keeping British beef out of their markets other than their own commercial interests.

Mr. Hood: Having visited Luxembourg this week, met judges in the Court of Justice and been told that no complaints have so far been lodged with the Court of Justice by the National Farmers Union, the Government or, indeed, any exporter against the ban on beef, can the Secretary of State tell us when the Government intend to put their complaint to the Court of Justice, as they have previously told the House that they would?

Mr. Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will make a statement to the House later today. As Opposition Members would expect, the Government will be as good as our word, and we shall pursue our legal action very swiftly.

Mr. Bill Walker: My right hon. Friend will be aware that every sector of the beef industry has been affected. Can he confirm that when the culling process is in operation, no one sector will have an advantage—for example, the abattoirs will not have an advantage over the auction marts—so that the pricing structures that have been arranged to compensate will take care of that matter?

Mr. Forsyth: I am not sure that I can answer my hon. Friend's question in precisely the terms that he would like. I can tell him that no one will gain any advantage from this catastrophe, which has blighted our industry. The blame for the difficulties that our farmers and meat industry currently face rests four square with Brussels. The sooner Brussels lifts the ban, the sooner those people will be able to go about their legitimate business—as they ought to be able to do under the terms of the single market.

Mr. Wallace: When the Minister of Agriculture made a statement in the House on 16 April, he said that the Government were considering ways in which there might be some exemption from the 30-month slaughter for specialist herds which take longer than 30 months to mature. That statement was welcomed on both sides of the House. When some colleagues and I visited the Commission in Brussels last week, we found that it was responsive to such a measure and thought that it might be one step towards lifting the export ban; yet it had received no proposals from the British Government. Can the Secretary of State tell us when the Government will present such proposals?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken to suggest that the British Government have not put proposals to the Commission for the lifting of the ban. The hon. Gentleman heard what my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture said in his statement to the House. Of course we wish to see exemptions from the 30-month rule in respect of slow maturing cattle such as Galloways and Highland cattle, and that is a matter that we continue to pursue. The hon. Gentleman must not lose sight of the fact that the ban on British beef of whatever kind is not justified. That remains our position and we shall continue to argue that case while also arguing for the widening of the exemptions to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister committed himself in the House.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The German Chancellor has proposed a final solution to the BSE problem which involves the unnecessary slaughter of a large part of the British national herd and he has been warmly supported by many of our European competitors. As the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has said on many occasions that he would not wish to be isolated in Europe, does not the logic of his position mean that he would have to support the German Government rather than the interests of the British people?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend to the extent that Opposition Members who are so keen to give more power to the Community will find it extremely difficult to explain in their constituencies how their policy is consistent with standing up for British interests. There has never been an occasion on which British interests have been more threatened. It is important that the ban is lifted.

On the point about the public statements that have been made by leading figures in Europe, I agree with my hon. Friend that it is difficult to understand how people can say that they eat British beef and believe that it is safe and yet continue to go along with a proposal to exclude it from the Community. I do not often agree with the Daily Record, but it is absolutely right to bring that message home to the people of Scotland. I understand that it has approached a number of leading figures in Europe, all of whom have taken the same view on British beef. It is high time we saw action which reflects their view and which allows our farmers and producers to go about their daily business.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Secretary of State agree that the best way to help the exporters of Scotland and Northern Ireland is to get their beef back on to the European market? With that in mind, has the Secretary of State read early-day motion 773, tabled by the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs) and now signed by 79 hon. Members on a cross-party basis, which argues that the way to go forward is to get the quality-assured, naturally fed beef from Scotland, Northern Ireland and elsewhere back on to European markets?

Given the indications of support for that approach from European farming ministers and the fact that the motion has been signed by the hon. Members for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) and for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), will the Secretary of State retract his dismissal of that attitude, start arguing the case for Scottish beef and stop putting his unionist politics before the livelihoods of my constituents?

Mr. Forsyth: I will continue to argue the case on behalf of the Scottish industry and to take advice from that industry. The Scottish industry's advice is clearly that we should argue for the ban to be lifted and that we should not seek to divide the industry. If those involved in the Scottish farming industry—they are the people whose livelihoods and work are on the line—change their position, we will take account of that. The hon. Gentleman will have to do more to satisfy the people of Scotland than try to play politics with this issue. I am sure that they will take note of the fact that, at a time when our industry is being savaged by this ban, he thought it appropriate to put a European star on his party's logo.

Mr. Jessel: Does not the consumption of British beef—Aberdeen Angus beef—by Chancellor Kohl at No. 10 Downing street make absolute nonsense of the European Union's ban on British beef, which it pretends is being imposed for health reasons?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend: seeing is believing. The President of the Commission, Chancellor Kohl and the Commission have indicated by their actions that they believe that British beef is safe. We now want to see the Commission and the Community act accordingly so that our people can get the benefit of what we were promised when we joined the European Union—access to a single market.

Mr. George Robertson: The Opposition accept that there should be a lifting of the European ban on British beef as soon as possible. We agree with that position as strongly as the Secretary of State does. However, does he recognise that, if the Conservative party continues to treat this issue as part of the battleground of European politics which is tearing that party apart, it will hinder our chances of persuading our European partners of the strength of our case?

The crisis did not start in Brussels. It started as a result of an announcement by the Government on the link between bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. Public reassurance will return only when there is an agreement on the effectiveness of actions to eliminate BSE from our cattle. How can people be reassured on this issue when the arrangement to dispose of the carcases of cattle more than 30 months old has become a shambles all over Britain this week?

The Opposition have taken a constructive attitude because a huge Scottish industry is at stake and thousands of jobs are in peril. Practical steps have to be taken to reassure the public across Europe. If those practical steps are taken, we will support them. At the end of the day, the Government must govern and they will be judged.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman took a long time to say that action must be taken, but he did not put forward a single proposal. That is typical of what we have come to expect from the Labour party. The hon Gentleman believes that the Labour party's approach on Europe is in Britain's interest. I point out to him that the beef ban has been imposed by qualified majority voting—and the Labour party wishes to see more qualified majority voting in Europe.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Kirkwood: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the totally unsatisfactory nature of the Minister's answer, I give notice to the House that I will seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Madam Speaker: Order. In that case, I am not able to call Mr. Gallie and I must close the question.

Veterinary Scientists and Technicians

3. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many veterinary scientists and technicians were made redundant in the past year, 1995–96, in Scotland; and how many of these redundancies were followed by withdrawal of Government grants. [26051]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): The information that the hon. Gentleman has requested is not held centrally.

Mr. Clarke: I am surprised at the Minister's answer, as I have been co-operating with him to try to get the answers I want. As a result of the bovine spongiform encephalopathy situation, a number of scientists—including my constituents Dr. Melrose and Mrs. Margaret Clark, who are scientific technicians—have been made redundant due to Government cuts. I believe that they should be employed. The area that I come from is renowned for scientific excellence and veterinary research. A review of 35 of these institutions throughout the United Kingdom is currently under way. The confidence of the people involved is low because the Government have withdrawn their grants.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his question with regard to his constituents. That is an indication of how seriously he takes this issue. The Overseas Development Administration has a contract with the university of Edinburgh for the provision of certain research services. However, it is up to the university to decide how it delivers the service and the number of research staff it needs to do so. The number of staff will vary according to the nature of the research at any particular time.

I emphasise that the ODA—and therefore the Government—is not the employer. That is a matter for the university. Individual contract staff who have a grievance about their employment should pursue the issue with the university, which may then decide to take the matter up with the ODA. If the hon. Gentleman has any further information that he would like me to pass on to the ODA, I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. Gallie: Does my hon. Friend agree that the use of veterinary and other scientists in the United Kingdom goes beyond that of other countries in relation to food hygiene and ensuring the safety of the public in general? On that basis, does he not despair that the sound advice given by scientists in our country that British beef is safe is ignored by scientists elsewhere, who do not carry out tasks at similar levels with the same degree of responsibility in their own countries?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend raises a valuable point. This year, the Government are spending more than £9 million on research into bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, and the amount will be increased to £10 million next year. As my hon. Friend said, all the scientific advice available from the world's experts is to the effect that British beef is safe. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has so eloquently said, the ban should be lifted.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister aware that the closure of research institutes and the dismissal of research teams goes far wider than that? The prior options study is cutting a swathe through Government research establishments and greatly weakening the efforts in Scotland. Is he further aware that the progress of scientific research, which underlies the ability to tackle diseases such as BSE and CJD, depends critically on the underlying basic research, which has been savaged by the Government?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman does himself no credit with his wilful scaremongering. The prior options review of the research establishments is no threat to the marvellous work done in the United Kingdom. The Government are fully committed to supporting the excellence of the UK science base, and we are spending more than £6 billion per annum on science and technology.

However, the research establishments cannot be immune from regular review and appraisal, and there is a need to ensure that research is being conducted in the most effective manner, providing the best value for money. With his background, the hon. Gentleman should be praising what is going on in this country, not seeking to run it down and trying to score cheap party political points.

Drug Abuse

5. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to deter drug abuse in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [26054]

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas–Hamilton): On 7 May we are launching a new all-party drugs campaign, which will build on the significant progress that has been made in implementing the recommendations of the ministerial drugs task force report.

Mr. Martin: Every mother and father heaves a sigh of relief when their child joins a youth club, because when they are in the youth clubs they are off the streets and away from the drug pushers. Will the Government give every encouragement to local authorities and the voluntary sector by helping such organisations? People in my community and throughout Scotland are also sickened to see those who are making money from drugs buying up land, public houses and taxi companies and many other so-called legitimate organisations. May we hope that the courts will not only sentence those people harshly but take away their ill-gotten gains?

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I agree wholeheartedly with everything that the hon. Gentleman has said. We have passed into legislation measures to the effect that the proceeds of drug trafficking should rightly be confiscated. That provision is in place, and that is now happening in Scotland. Youth clubs need to be strongly supported, as the hon. Gentleman said, and I am glad to confirm that the all-party campaign will build on, not replace, the drugs task force work already under way. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the drug action teams are very active in and around his constituency. Many measures have been put in place, and we intend to advance them in a co-ordinated manner.

Mr. Bill Walker: What measures will my hon. Friend introduce to tackle the problem that arises when senior social workers make comments that are unhelpful to the all-party campaign? There is no doubt that the great advantage of the all-party campaign has been its all-party basis, and it is making progress.

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I think I know what my hon. Friend is referring to, and I am glad to note that the person concerned subsequently acknowledged that drug misuse was illegal and unsafe, and declared that she would never condone the taking of Ecstasy or any other drug. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. There are a lot of arguments across the Floor of the House. Has the Minister completed his answer?

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: It was impossible for me to hear what the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) was saying, but I shall be only too happy to answer him.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman did not ask the question. It was asked by someone else. Has the Minister finished? If he has, I will call Mr. Davidson, who very seldom gets called.

Mr. Davidson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am particularly glad to be called today as this programme appears on Scottish television, although my mother, who resides in Galashiels, will not be able to see it because Border Television does not carry the programme.

Does the Minister agree that, in the fight against drug dealers, the police are greatly handicapped because, when they catch people for offences and charge them, those people are often quickly back out on the streets, either because the procurator fiscal's department does not oppose bail or because the courts grant it far too readily? In my constituency, there are many youngsters running around who have committed serious offences with knives. They are released and can then offend again. Such occurrences demoralise the police and the public. What does the Minister intend to do about that?

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I shall certainly look into the matter, although it comes within the responsibility of the Lord Advocate. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that guidelines have been issued to procurators fiscal, especially in relation to restricting bail. If the hon. Gentleman will give me the names and examples, I will ensure that the matter is followed up speedily with the Law Officers.

Forestry

6. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many staff in his Department are involved in the administration of forestry, and at what cost. [26055]

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Kynoch): The Forestry Commission currently employs 3,600 staff throughout Britain, at an annual cost of £66 million.

Mr. Pawsey: I thank my hon. Friend for his typically helpful, detailed and comprehensive reply. Given the amount of resources being made available within the Scottish Office for United Kingdom forestry, does my hon. Friend feel that it might be wise to transfer those responsibilities to the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Kynoch: I am not sure that I heard my hon. Friend correctly. My hon. Friend's interest in forestry matters is well logged. Under Scottish Office guidance, forestry is faring exceedingly well. The Forestry Commission is looking for significant efficiency improvements in its manpower and expects to achieve a reduction of about 10 per cent. in staffing over the three years from 1994. Perhaps Labour-controlled local authorities in Scotland could learn from that.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: What effect will the right of pre-emption have on the Government's plans for forestry in Scotland, given that it is likely to cause great difficulties in the transfer of crofting estates? Do the Government intend to introduce legislation to remove that feudal remnant from our past?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Lady will be aware that a consultation document on crofting has been issued. All the matters will be raised when the results of that consultation are known.

Police Officers (Protective Clothing)

7. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made with research into protective clothing for police officers, and if he will make a statement. [25056]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A £100,000 research project, largely funded by my Department, is currently under way at the university of Strathclyde. It will, I hope, pave the way for the development of a lighter vest to protect police officers against stabbing attacks.

Mr. Shaw: I welcome the news that the Government have made that finance available. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that that was possible because police funding in Scotland is ring-fenced? Does he accept that the issue of drug abuse, which was raised earlier, is connected with our ability to protect the police from stabbings and other threats to the body, and that protective clothing is clearly necessary in such circumstances?

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's words of welcome. Police funding is not ring-fenced in Scotland. Funding for that particular project came from central funds, from my budget, following representations made to me last year by the Police Federation. I strongly believe that we have a duty to ensure that our police on the streets are equipped with all the means we can find to protect them when carrying out their difficult duties.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: On the subject of protective clothing, will the Secretary of State ensure that his research also takes into account the findings from last night's incident, when the police and others in the vicinity of the Skye bridge were placed at risk due to explosive material left behind by the developers? The material had to be safely taken care of and detonated at a nearby quarry. The Minister of State spoke to me about the matter over the telephone this morning, and there is local anxiety that the inquiry for which the Scottish Office has called is to be carried out by the company and not by the police. No individual would get away with that, so why should the company?

Mr. Forsyth: If indeed it turns out that the blasting explosives were left by a subcontractor, that is not the same as the company doing it. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware of the distinction. I understand that the main contractor—the company—is inquiring into how the explosives were left behind. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, it is a serious matter. Fortunately, no one was hurt, and I am sure that the whole House is grateful for that. When the company has produced a report, we shall consider whether further steps are necessary.

Mr. Stephen: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, in the current year, Scottish local authorities will receive an increase of 7 per cent. in the police grant which will enable them to equip police officers even better than at present? Does he recall that, when Labour left office, the Scottish police service was undermanned and underpaid, and experienced police officers were leaving in droves?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is correct. We are determined to see more policemen on the beat and we have provided more resources in the public expenditure survey round to facilitate that. Although we never anticipate succeeding PES rounds, I am happy to confirm to the House that the police will again be a priority in the next PES round.

Mr. McFall: The Opposition welcome the funding of research into protective clothing, which is necessary, in part, because of the Government's complacency about law and order. Since the Conservatives came to power, the number of recorded crimes has more than doubled, to almost 1 million per year. Despite the Minister's warm words, the culture of knives prevails in society, with increases in the number of offensive weapons crimes, violent assaults and drug-related crimes. Is it not clear that the soundbite politics that is cheered at Tory party conferences does not help to solve the problem? The message is that today's streets are more dangerous than ever before because of Conservative law and order policy. When will the Secretary of State do something to assist beleaguered communities?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is looking increasingly ridiculous. He speaks for a party that has opposed virtually every measure that we introduced to make life tougher for the criminal. In recent days, he criticised me for calling for longer sentences for criminals and for more prisons to put them in. If we are to have safe streets, we must lock up the criminals. The hon. Gentleman and his party oppose that policy.

Tourism

8. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent measures he has adopted to promote tourism in Scotland. [26057]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend has increased the resources made available to the Scottish tourist board this year by £3 million, or 20 per cent.

Mr. Coombs: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that most encouraging information. Is he able to reveal the financial and the commercial success of last year's Autumn Gold campaign? I understand that the marketing campaign resulted in a substantial number of inquiries, but was it a success financially? What support do the newly established local tourist boards receive from local authorities throughout Scotland?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend, who takes a great interest in tourism matters, is absolutely right: Autumn Gold has been a remarkable success in its early stages in seeking to extend the tourist season in Scotland. Some 37 per cent. of those who requested an Autumn Gold pack then took an autumn break in Scotland in October and November 1995, which was an increase on previous seasonality campaigns. I am sure that the campaign has contributed to the 11 per cent. increase in the number of tourists from England who visited Scotland in [illegible].

Mr. Maxton: Does the Minister agree that local authorities play an essential role in maintaining our tourism industry, by providing funding for the arts, halls, museums and recreation areas as well as by enforcing health and safety standards in our hotels and restaurants? Does he further agree—as he is nodding—that the swingeing cuts that he and the Secretary of State have imposed on local authorities will damage our tourist industry?

Mr. Kynoch: I agree with the first part of what the hon. Gentleman said, but I disagree totally with the second part of his question. The hon. Gentleman does not seem to have got it into his head that this year the Government have provided an extra 3.7 per cent. of local government funding. In addition, most local authorities have increased their council tax far in excess of inflation—there have been 10, 12 and 15 per cent. increases, and some were even greater. Therefore, local authorities have more than enough resources to spread around the services.

I hope that local authorities play their due part in the partnership that is needed in tourism to ensure that their areas are promoted. Tourism is important to small and medium-sized business. It makes a considerable contribution to the Scottish economy, and local authorities have a significant part to play in encouraging it.

Mr. Stewart: Is it not a matter of concern to my hon. Friend that so many tourists visiting Scotland go to Edinburgh, where they encounter one of Scotland's leading slums called Prince's street and sit around in the virtually permanent traffic jam there? Does he agree that it would be better for Scotland if tourists were encouraged to visit the city of Glasgow, which has superb facilities, thanks to the partnership between the public and private sectors? While they were there, they could also visit the superb facilities in Rouken Glen park in Eastwood.

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is always a staunch supporter of his part of the world, but I hasten to add that there is a much larger section of Scotland north of the central belt. I would like all tourists to Scotland to experience the benefits of the entire country. I was particularly pleased that, recently, the Scottish tourism co-ordinating group which I chair discussed ways of getting tourists to travel further afield in Scotland.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right: most tourists visit Edinburgh. There are many reasons why they should go further north. Some airlines, particularly Ryan Air and Easy Jet, are considering taking favourable fares for tourists further north. I hope that we shall be successful in our campaign, because much of Scotland's heritage, history and countryside, which are of great benefit to tourism, is further north.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Following on from what he has just said, does the Minister acknowledge that, although it is fine to promote attracting visitors to Scotland, they need information on the ground? In the light of that, the cuts in local government support for tourism have reduced the number of information centres: there are now no information centres whatsoever between Aberdeen and Fraserburgh since the closure of Ellon, Turriff and others. In those circumstances, does the hon. Gentleman recognise the need to increase funding, to provide local information centres? That will ensure just what he wants—tourists visiting all parts of Scotland, not just the capital.

Mr. Kynoch: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has the cheek to raise that question here, as he is referring to the action of the Liberal Democrat administration in Aberdeenshire and the Labour-controlled Aberdeen city council, which decided to reduce their funding of the new area tourist board. I hasten to point out that central Government, through the Scottish tourist board, have put an extra £700,000 into the area tourist board network.

It is for local authorities to decide their own priorities. Aberdeenshire has been given more money than ever before and has certainly increased the council tax by some 20 per cent. across the area, yet it has decided not to give as much to the area tourist board. If local authorities decide not to make tourism a priority, they must be accountable to their electorates. I hope that the Liberal Democrats will stand up and be counted.

Mr. Foulkes: Has the Minister seen the report in The Herald today on the threat to tourism in my constituency from the sludge dumped in the Clyde in the 1970s and 1980s containing dangerous chemicals that are now being dispersed throughout the firth? Why has he kept the marine laboratory's report secret? What action are the Government taking to protect public safety and ensure that there are no threats to tourism in Ayrshire and beyond?

Mr. Kynoch: I have not seen that article in The Herald, but I shall draw it to the attention of my hon. and noble Friend Lord Lindsay, the Minister with responsibility for the environment and for the new Scottish Environment Protection Agency, which I am sure will be interested in looking into the matter.

Thomas Campbell and Joseph Steele

9. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will make his decision regarding a review of the Thomas Campbell and Joseph Steele case. [26058]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Once consideration of this case is completed, a decision will be announced.

Mr. Wray: Does the Minister agree that, under section 124 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, due to come into force on 1 April 1996, the Secretary of State for Scotland will be allowed to refer this case? The families of Thomas Campbell and Joseph Steele think it unjust that a conviction was obtained on the basis of evidence from a perjurer who was known by the procurator fiscal and by a Queen's counsel to be lying.

A fortnight before the trial of the Doyle murderers, he had stated that he was living with his sister and never left the house between Friday and Sunday. A fortnight later, he gave evidence to the effect that he heard the relevant conversation. He is now saying that he conspired with the police—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should ask a question.

Mr. Wray: The man is now saying that he conspired with the police and the procurator fiscal.

We want justice for this family. Will the Secretary of State bring section 124 of the Act into operation?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Some of the petitions received raise difficult and complex issues of law and judgment, requiring careful and detailed consideration. This may involve interviewing witnesses and commissioning expert reports. Most petitions are dealt with quickly; in some cases, it takes a considerable time to complete the detailed examination which the matters raised in the petition require. I can, however, give an undertaking that these matters will be looked at thoroughly and rigorously.

Care Services

10. Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what extra resources he plans to make available to local authorities to carry out responsibilities designated by his circulars (a) under the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 and (b) in increasing inspection of residential nursing homes. [26060]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No extra resources are required.

Sir David Steel: I am astonished by that reply. Since the financial settlements were reached with local authorities, six circulars have been sent out to social work departments imposing new responsibilities on them—one of them only today. Some of them are perfectly sensible, such as the requirement to inspect nursing homes twice, not once, a year, but no new resources have been attached to the circulars. May I plead with the Minister, therefore, that no circular should in future be sent to local authorities without the accompanying cash to enable them to carry out their new duties? Without that, undesirable cuts will be made elsewhere, such as in the home help service in the borders area.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Many circulars confirm good practice and give appropriate guidance without involving extra funds. Borders council has £14.5 million for its community care responsibilities; that is an increase. The Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995 stresses good practice; the guidance does not require more funding.

The guidance on local inspection of residential and day care services does not impose significant additional burdens on local authorities but does provide up-to-date guidance. That is why additional funds are not being awarded—they are not required.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that £662 million for community care in Scotland this year is a substantial sum? Does he further agree that many elderly folk are pleased that the Chancellor, in his Budget, increased the capital sum below which support has to be provided for residents in these homes?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. There has been an increase of £41 million on the 1995-96 settlement. It is for authorities to establish their expenditure priorities.

Ms Rachel Squire: In this National Carers Week, does the Minister agree that it is completely unacceptable that young carers in Scotland are not to have a statutory right to an assessment of their needs, unlike young carers in England and Wales? Will he further agree that this is another example of the Government saying one thing and doing another? Other hon. Members and I understood the Minister to promise, during the debate on the Bill on the Floor of the House, that Scotland's young carers would have such a legal right to an assessment of their needs.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government strongly supported the Carers (Recognition and Services) Bill during its passage through Parliament. Differences with the English provisions will not significantly disadvantage carers in Scotland. The guidance that we are giving encourages more co-ordinated, better-quality respite care services. We are encouraging local agencies to provide appropriate support for carers.

Travellers' Children

12. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will meet the Scottish Showmen's Guild to discuss the education of the children of Scotland's travelling people; and if he will make a statement. [26064]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Neither my right hon. Friend nor I have had any request to meet the Scottish Showmen's Guild to discuss the education of the children of Scotland's travelling people. Our policy is to promote equal opportunities in education, including education for travellers' children.

Mr. Galloway: The guild is desperate to meet the four Scottish Office Ministers who are taking their place on the coconut shy in the fairgrounds these days because of the savage cuts in local government funding that they have imposed. The cuts have led to the imperilling of Whiteinch primary school in my constituency, where the travelling people send their children. Is the Minister aware that Whiteinch is the most popular primary school in Britain for the children of travelling people because of the hospitable welcome that they have been given there by the staff and by other pupils? Would it not be a tragedy if the school were to close as a result of the mean, tight-fisted settlement that the Government have reached with Glasgow city council, which has made such dreadfully painful choices necessary?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is on the dodgem ride in dodging responsibility for his Labour-controlled local authority. He will agree with Accounts Commission for Scotland reports telling us that there are 300,000 surplus school places throughout Scotland, and it is only right that new unitary authorities consider school closures carefully and sensitively. As I have said in the House on other occasions, when authorities come to do that I hope that they will take all factors into account. When considering the position of Whiteinch primary school, they must take into account the specific care and the sensitive treatment given to travellers and their children.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will arrange an early meeting with his Labour-controlled council to put the points to it that he has put to me. At the end of the day, it is the council that must come to a decision.

Mr. Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree that the guild represents a responsible set of people? Many of them will be at the Neilston show this Saturday, which starts at 11 o'clock, if my hon. Friend is free. Does he agree also that the education of travellers' children involves a genuine issue? If he receives a request from the guild for a meeting, will he agree that either he or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or, if appropriate, his Scottish Office officials should have a discussion on genuine issues, not the points raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway)?

Mr. Robertson: When my hon. Friend sees the members of the guild on Saturday in his constituency, as he takes his place at the fair, he can pass it on to them that my right hon. Friend and I will be delighted to see any delegation that is led by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Connarty: It is obvious that the Minister will be concerned about the closure of any school that is attended by travellers' children and any other children. How is it that the same concern was not given to a school that is likely structurally to collapse? I refer to the Minister's visit to Bo'ness academy in my constituency. As a result of the cement that was used in construction, the school is falling down. We are told that it will have to be replaced within a decade. In other words, it will not be used after that. Why did the Minister not come forward with any further funding for the school? Why has he left the local authority with the problem of a collapsing school, with no help from an uncaring Government?

Mr. Robertson: It is truly unfortunate for the hon. Gentleman's constituents that he feels that he cannot adopt the responsible attitude that has been taken by the headmaster and the local authority. The hon. Gentleman knows that I visited the school with him on 26 February. He knows also that the consulting engineers' report made it clear that there was no immediate concern about the continued occupancy of the building, subject to the results of continuing monitoring. The new Falkirk council has time to consider the options for the building in the light of the information that it now has.

During my visit, as the hon. Gentleman knows, I encouraged the council to think further about the private finance initiative and work on the school building. On 9 April, PFI officials from the Scottish Office met Falkirk council and offered its representatives every assistance. I have asked to be kept in close touch with developments on that front.

Income Tax

13. Mr. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the additional revenue which would be raised from an extra penny on income tax in Scotland. [26065]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest Treasury estimate is that each penny raised in tartan tax would raise £130 million.

Mr. Brooke: Given what that sum would achieve if expended throughout Scotland, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be much better if it were allowed to remain and fructify in the pockets of the people?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my right hon. Friend's words, which I think were originally put forward by Gladstone, whose legacy has been betrayed by the Liberals, who are too keen now to raise the tartan tax in Scotland. I agree that it would be unjust for people in Scotland to have less in their pay packets for the same wage as others elsewhere as a result of implementation of the proposal to have a tax-raising parliament.

Mr. David Marshall: Does the Secretary of State agree that Scotland is colder than the rest of the United Kingdom and that Scots pay more value added tax on fuel than any other part of the UK? Does he not realise that VAT on fuel is a hated and iniquitous Tory tartan tax on Scotland's people?

Mr. Forsyth: If we had listened to Labour Members, we would have much higher VAT rates, because, until recently, their period in opposition has been geared towards arguing for more expenditure. If the hon. Gentleman is interested in taxes that place an unfair burden on Scotland, he might have a word with the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who wishes to remove child benefit for children over the age of 16. That was originally a tax allowance. Removing it is a tax on education and on students. With more people staying on after the age of 16 in Scotland than in any other part of the UK, Scotland would be hit hardest by that Labour proposal to tax education.

Mr. Gallie: Does my right hon. Friend agree that additional revenue raised by Government means lower take-home pay for individuals? What effect would that have on business, on high streets in Scotland and on people attempting to create wealth?

Mr. Forsyth: If we have to pay higher taxes for Labour's Scottish Parliament in Scotland, there will be one result: fewer jobs, less take-home pay, less investment and less opportunity for us to have a say at the top table in the European Community, at Westminster and in the world's councils. That deal suits no one except the socialists.

Mr. Maclennan: I welcome the Secretary of State's recognition of Mr. Gladstone's fiscal prudence, which is, of course, a typically Liberal characteristic, and I draw the Secretary of State's attention to Mr. Gladstone's favouring of devolution all round. Instead of speculating about taxation in future, will the right hon. Gentleman give a factual account of how much increased revenue he and his Government have raised in Scotland as a result of taxation increases since the last general election?

Mr. Forsyth: May I respectfully point out to the hon. Gentleman that the best traditions of 19th-century Liberalism are found on the Conservative Benches? On the subject of his party's commitment to home rule in the 19th century, perhaps the Labour party might learn a lesson there, because that commitment destroyed the Liberal party and condemned it to being out of government for a generation and more.

Mr. George Robertson: Given the Government's deplorable record in breaking practically every one of their tax promises made at the last general election, the Secretary of State has a cheek to raise in any way the subject of tax. When will he realise that the Scottish people are not impressed by scare stories and exaggerations about a power for the Scottish Parliament, which will probably never be a tax burden, but they are impressed—and, indeed, disgusted and angered—by the fact that, since 1992, they have had to pay 22 extra tax increases imposed by the Government, they have had a real tartan tax in VAT on fuel and they are now getting the Forsyth tax and council tax bills through every letterbox in the land?

I read that the Secretary of State was claiming that the Scottish Tory party has "no divisions and no factionalism", and that he wants it to be seen as a model for the Tory party nationally. If that model is going to reduce the national Tory party to 13 per cent. in the opinion polls, I endorse his call.

Mr. Forsyth: I hope that the whole of Scotland will recognise the hon. Gentleman's smugness in assuming that, because he happens to have a bit of a lead in the polls at present, he has a mandate to make the Scottish people pay more in income tax than any other part of the UK.

The hon Gentleman is a reasonable man. If he is sincere in his hints that he will never use the power that he says he will seek in order to raise a tartan tax, why does he not just drop his commitment to the tartan tax and end the uncertainty that is disadvantaging Scotland in competing for jobs and inward investment? Why not remove that from the scene altogether? It would be easy to do.

The hon. Gentleman should also say how he will fund the promises made by his hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East, involving about £390 million extra for local government. That represents the whole of the 3p of tartan tax. Where is the money to come from and what is going on in the Labour party? This morning on the radio, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who speaks for the Labour party on local government, said, "There will be no more extra money for local government." But north of the border Labour is saying that there will be more money for local government. Where will it come from if not from the tartan tax?

Lady Olga Maitland: In addition to the punitive tartan tax, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the sixth form tax that has been proposed by Labour would punish people to the tune of £1,000 per child for children trying to follow a sixth form course? [Interruption.] Is that not cheating children, denying them the chance of fulfilling their education?

Mr. Forsyth: These questions are broadcast, and I hope that every parent in Scotland with teenage children who is struggling to keep them at school or send them to further education colleges will note how Opposition Members laughed, jeered and sneered when my hon. Friend spoke about the importance of child benefit and what it means. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) might like to note that the removal of that benefit is equivalent to an additional tax. It is far more than the tartan tax, and it has been proposed by the Labour party, which should be ashamed of putting it forward.

Fire Service

14. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the funding of the fire service. [26066]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Revenue funding of the fire service is the responsibility of the fire authorities. It is for those authorities to ensure that the budgets which they set are sufficient to enable them to comply with their statutory obligations.

Sir Russell Johnston: The Minister knows that the highland region considers that the allocation of funds for the fire service in the highlands is quite inadequate and does not take proper account of that spread-out rural area. In view of the Ministers well-known belief in open government, does he agree that it would be good if the structure and funding of the fire service were looked at by the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is obviously up to the Select Committee what subjects it looks at. Grant-aided expenditure has been increased by 20 per cent. for the current year. None the less, the new fire board has substantially reduced its budget. That represents an abrupt change of policy which I deplore.

I also make it quite clear that, if the fire board does not like the formula that has been laid down by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities finance working group, it should submit its proposals and disagreements to COSLA. However, I understand that so far it has not done so. If it tries to close fire stations, putting people under threat and at risk, its proposals will have to have the clearance of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who has made it clear that he will not allow any deterioration of service. There will be no support for unacceptable proposals.

Mr. Macdonald: On that point, will the Minister assure us that he will also veto any proposed redundancies that are suggested purely on cost grounds in this financial year, in the way he has said that he will veto fire station closures in this financial year?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that a reduction in the number of firefighters, fire appliances or fire stations would definitely require my right hon. Friend's approval, and he has made it clear that he will not approve closures or reductions that would prejudice public safety. I repeat that we have increased grant-aided expenditure by 20 per cent., so there is no need whatever for such moves.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

15. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to meet Greater Glasgow health board to discuss NHS funding. [26067]

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has had no request for such a meeting.

Mr. Watson: The Minister knows that one of the acute hospitals covered by Greater Glasgow health board is the Victoria infirmary, which is suffering a severe funding crisis. Partly as a result of that, it is indulging in a competitive tendering process for support services, about which I have written to him.

Will he address the concerns of trade unions, staff and, to some extent, management about the activities of a company called Capita and an individual called Norman Foster, who was previously employed by the hospital? He seems to be giving the company an inside track in the tendering process while an in-house tender bid has been blocked. Those are important issues of public interest that must be investigated. Will the Minister undertake to do so?

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I am happy to look into the case. My understanding is that the NHS trust has already done so and considers that there is not a conflict of interest and that the correct procedures have been followed. I agree that there is a potential conflict of interest. I will look into the matter and write to the hon. Gentleman. I stress that Greater Glasgow health board has been allocated more than £589 million for revenue expenditure, which is a substantial sum for choosing the priorities for its health care.

BSE (Agriculture Council)

3.30 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Douglas Hogg): With permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the meeting of the Agriculture Council which finished yesterday evening. I represented the United Kingdom, assisted by my noble Friends the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones).

The Council discussed the reform of the Community fruit and vegetables regime and the Commission's proposals for this year's farm price fixing. Both are important matters, and I set out the United Kingdom position on the lines that I have explained to the House on many occasions.

The Council also discussed bovine spongiform encephalopathy. I put before it a dossier of information setting out the measures that the UK has taken. I shall place a copy of that dossier in the Library. My first objective at the Council was naturally to achieve action on the export ban. Progress was made on this, and the conclusions of the Council explicitly recognise that the ban is temporary. They also recognise that the measures already put in place and foreseen form "part of a process which should allow the export ban to be progressively lifted on a step by step basis."

In addition, the Council has recognised that the lifting of the ban in respect of tallow, gelatine and semen should be addressed in the Standing Veterinary Committee shortly. As the House knows, the relevant decisions are taken by qualified majority vote in the Standing Veterinary Committee, not in the Council. The next meeting of the Standing Veterinary Committee takes place next week.

Nevertheless, this welcome progress should not obscure the fact that the ban is disproportionate and unjustified. Accordingly, I made it clear to the Council, and recorded in a formal UK statement, that, on the basis of the scientific evidence available, there should be an early and complete lifting of the ban. Accordingly, we are proceeding with our application to have the ban set aside by the European Court of Justice under article 173 of the treaty. Our application is in an advanced stage of preparation, and will be lodged shortly.

The House will also know that the National Farmers Union has been granted leave to seek judicial review of the export ban, and I understand that the matter is expected to be referred to the European Court of Justice on 3 May.

I turn now to the concept of the selective cull. The Council accepted that the proposals that I have made involving the culling by farm of birth of age cohorts born after September 1990 in which there have been cases of BSE were very much in the right direction. It was also agreed that it would be helpful to investigate whether additional measures targeted on herds where there had been many cases of BSE would be justified.

This is a point which is obviously worth careful consideration, and my officials will be entering into technical discussions on this shortly. It is, however, already clear that, should we proceed with the cull, the scheme that we have put forward will form the major component of any such policy, and that the scale of any measure finally put in place will be very much along the lines that I have already indicated to the House.

I turn to the link between a lifting of the ban and the selective cull. The Government's position remains as it has always been: the two must proceed in parallel.

I am glad to say that the partial recovery in the beef market has continued. Consumption is now at about 80 per cent. of pre-crisis levels for good-quality cuts, and average market prices are 109p a kilogram, compared with 120p a kilogram before the crisis.

The scheme for the slaughter of male calves has been operational from 22 April and the scheme for the disposal of cattle of more than 30 months old, at the end of their working lives, will start operation tomorrow. That follows a decision of the management committee on 26 April, when, on our proposal, specific provision was made for payments to be made on a dead weight as well as live weight basis. That follows strong representation from the farming unions.

I know that many hon. Members and their constituents are concerned about how the scheme—I shall call it the 30-month slaughter scheme—will work in practice. The first point is that the scheme is now launched. The first cattle are likely to be processed tomorrow. More than 60 abattoirs and 80 markets across the United Kingdom will act as collection centres. Farmers will be anxious to have the finalised details. We shall be sending direct to farmers a note setting out all they need to know about the new arrangements.

I would summarise the position thus: in our view, the ban that has been imposed by the European Union is unjustified and should be removed. The conclusions arrived at yesterday have established a process that could achieve that. I very much hope that the Commission and all member states will play a full and active part in resolving this grave and urgent problem.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I advise the Minister again that we fully share his commitment to securing an early lifting of the ban on the export of UK beef and beef products, and it is very disappointing that he has so little progress to report to the House. He said that the European Union Standing Veterinary Committee is likely to consider lifting the ban on tallow, gelatine and semen. Although any alleviation of the ban is to be welcomed, he will recognise that the number of jobs involved is small relative to the total number at stake.

Is the Minister aware of the great anxiety across the industry at his failure to put in place the programme for the destruction of the carcases of the cattle over 30 months old? There is huge uncertainty about which cattle will go first, to which livestock market, and to which abattoirs.

Does the Minister feel that his failure to put that programme in place, as he agreed to do, undermined his position at the council meeting? Does he agree that it is absolutely vital to the financial position of farmers and the welfare of animals that he brings that programme into full operation as soon as he possibly can? The measure should be up and running now, and while we continue without it fully in operation, many animals are on farms that are running out of feed, where serious welfare problems could develop.

Will the Minister also give very careful consideration to the levels of dead weight compensation and live weight compensation for the animals that are to be destroyed, taking into account the needs to give a fair return to farmers and to avoid further disruption to the beef market?

How are the slaughterhouses expected to deal with animals that are ineligible for human consumption? There is unease in many quarters that animals that are to go into our food may be slaughtered in slaughterhouses that are also dealing with animals that are ineligible for human consumption. Is it the Government's intention that the whole carcases of all the animals ineligible for human consumption are to be incinerated?

Two weeks ago, the Minister spoke about the need for an urgent look at exemptions to the 30-month ban. What progress has he made on that? With regard to the additional selective slaughter programme, can he confirm that the agreement that he reached last night was on the basis of a strengthening of the proposed additional slaughter programme? Does that mean killing even more cows?

Is it not now clear that the Council of Agriculture Ministers was not satisfied with our identification arrangements? Had the Government implemented the tagging policy that we advocated six years ago—which is now in place in Northern Ireland—the Minister might have been in a slightly stronger position in the Council this week. If we are to embark on an additional selective slaughter programme, this must be arranged quickly—not least because of concerns that farmers who have BSE cohort animals may be tempted to sell them on.

The eradication of BSE is a desirable objective. The Minister will have read the letter that I sent to him on Monday, calling for an investigation into the flouting of the ruminant feed ban, and into the high percentage of new cases of animals born after the feed ban was introduced in 1988. Such an inquiry could have been completed within two or three months, and it is necessary if we are to eradicate BSE from our cattle.

Surely the determination—[Interruption.] I can assure Conservative Members that we intend to pursue this issue, which is the major issue facing the Government—the Prime Minister himself has said so. Surely the determination to resolve the issue and tackle the question of eradicating BSE completely from our cattle is vital. The quicker we go down that road, the quicker the ban on exports will be lifted.

Does the Minister recognise that this BSE/Creutzfeldt-Jakob crisis throws a new light on the importance of the research establishments that are carrying out work on BSE and CJD? The Minister will advise the House that the Government have increased expenditure on BSE research since it was discovered in 1986—it would be hard not to have done so—but that increase was against the background of massive cuts in food and agricultural research. Has it occurred to him that the Government's policy of short-term contracts in research establishments is not helpful to the long-term research that is required on BSE and CJD?

Finally, I appeal to the Minister and to the Government to withdraw the prior options review plan to sell off the Government establishments that are carrying out research into BSE and CJD. Surely he must recognise that selling these establishments and privatising the staff is not in the interests of our scientists. [Interruption.] He must understand that BSE and CJD will be with us for some years to come, and that long-term research must be done by scientists in Government establishments who do not spend their time looking around for their next job. [Interruption.]

Mr. Hogg: The reception that the House gave to the hon. Gentleman's last points might suggest to him that he was not holding the House on those particular points.

First, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. Secondly, as regards movement on gelatine, tallow and semen, clearly if we get it, it is modest; we would like more—we must have more—but it is welcome none the less.

As regards the 30-month rule, the scheme will become operational tomorrow. I always said that it would start during the week beginning 29 April. We will put out to all farmers an information note, and the hon. Gentleman will have seen an extensive advertisement dealing with that in at least three of the farming newspapers last week.

The hon. Gentleman will know that we have persuaded the beef management committee to agree to a live weight of 1 ecu a kilo and a dead weight of 2 ecu a kilo. That was secured last Friday.

The carcases of animals slaughtered under the scheme will go to rendering. They will be kept separate in distinct lines, and may be dealt with on separate days.

The exemptions are important. I spoke to Commissioner Fischler about that last week, and again frequently in the Council. I think that we will be able to make progress with the Commission on that point, and I shall go out to consultation, because it is important.

With regard to the selective cull, we clearly should consider reactions to our consultation process, both within the United Kingdom and from Community and Commission vets. The Commission vets made it plain to the Council and to everybody else that they endorsed the scheme that we brought forward and that they could not identify a scheme which they would commend in preference to our own.

Yes, identification needs to be improved, and we hope to have a much improved scheme in place by 1 June.

With regard to cattle born after the ban, if the hon. Gentleman would care to look at the dossier that I am putting into the Library, he will see a number of documents under the heading "A" which show an encouraging decline in the number of cattle born after the ban. Our concern over that question is one reason why we changed the feed regulations in the way we did.

Finally, of course it is desirable to accelerate the reduction in the rate of BSE. It is that thought which is, at least in part, behind the thinking that underpins the concept of a selective cull.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. The entire House seems to be rising. It is unlikely that everyone will be called and it is extremely unlikely that Members will be called if there are long exchanges, so it is entirely up to the House how many Members are called. I want brisk exchanges, please.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that many of us are most grateful to him and his colleagues for the efforts they have made to resolve the problem? But will he also accept that it is now urgent that farms should get the 30-month-old cattle away and compensation paid, and that consideration should be given to the slow-maturing cattle? Will he do rather more than was apparent this morning to explain to the auctioneers and to the farmers what is to happen, when the beasts will be taken to the market, and all the details they so urgently require?

[Sir Hector Monro]

Mr. Hogg: My right hon. Friend is entirely right. At the end of last week, the farming press carried details of the 30-month scheme. I shall be sending a note to farmers and others with the relevant information. It is important now that the scheme opens tomorrow and that there is rapid progress through the collection points, and thereafter through the abattoirs, followed by early payment.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Does the Minister recognise that we share his objective of seeking to raise the export ban as quickly as possible? May I go further and commiserate with him most sincerely over the very difficult situation in which he has been put by two avoidable factors, the first being, of course—as Sir David Naish of the National Farmers Union made clear—the ultimatums, threats and sabre rattling of the Euro-sceptics in the Conservative party? As the Minister was not in the Chamber to hear it, perhaps I should draw his attention to the remarks of the Secretary of State for Scotland, who repeated precisely those accusations an hour ago, and said that they were making his task that much more difficult.

Is it true—as is apparent from everything that the Commission told me and my colleagues when we were in Brussels in the past 10 days, and from everything that it has told many Conservative Members—that, had the Minister presented his package of proposals weeks ago for informal consultation, by now we would be well on the way to removing entirely the ban on exports?

I shall put a specific question to the Minister, which obviously will require a specific answer. Yesterday, his colleagues in the Scottish Office Agriculture, Environment and Fisheries Department, in part 6 of a briefing paper, said:

"It has been suggested that we should cull whole herds, but that approach implies that BSE is transmitted from animal to animal, whereas on the available evidence that is not happening or not at any significant"—

Madam Speaker: Order. I have asked the House for brisk questions. It is totally unfair for hon. Members, when they see so many other hon. Members rising, to take up so much time with long quotations. Hon. Members know full well that the Minister is making a statement. They should come into the Chamber with their questions prepared and not have to sort through a great deal of paper to find a relevant section.

Mr. Tyler: I simply ask the Minister whether he endorses the Scottish Office's view that this disease can be transmitted from animal to animal. If he does, it blows the whole of his cull policy out of the water.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman's support was a bit double-edged—none the less, I am grateful to him for the favourable aspects of it. Yes, of course speedy movement is important. To get it, we must have political good will among member states. We have had considerable assistance from the Commission, for which I am grateful, but we now must have good will from member states. That is what I say to my colleagues around the Council table.

Mr. Paul Marland (West Gloucestershire): In the light of the Europeans' blatant disregard of the best scientific advice available, does my right hon. Friend think that they have a hidden agenda, especially since the Irish have been saying that this ban is likely still to be in place by the autumn? Furthermore, is it time for us to start insisting that we will not accept meat into this country that has not passed through slaughterhouses with the same standards as we have in the United Kingdom? We know that there is BSE in Europe, and we also know that specified offal is not removed in slaughterhouses in Ireland, Germany, Spain or—most interestingly for McDonald's—in Holland.

Mr. Hogg: Many hon. Members will share the concern expressed by my hon. Friend at the end of his observations. As for his first question, there is no good scientific basis or other legitimate justification in law or in logic for the ban. We are facing a very deep concern among member states about the perception of consumers in their respective states, which is getting in the way of a rational, considered view of the evidence.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): What plans does the right hon. Gentleman have to set up a profound examination not only into the dangers of cannibalisation of feed but into the much more disturbing and profound problem of transgenic experimentation?

Mr. Hogg: It is clearly important to have a view about the risk that feed has posed to the health of the national herd. We have a clear view on that, and it was our concern which led to the ban on the incorporation of feedstuffs, in the first instance of ruminant protein, and thereafter of all mammalian protein.

I will tread a little cautiously on the second point, because I am not sure exactly what the hon. Gentleman had in mind. Research on transgenic mice has been important in determining whether BSE is transmissible. I hope that the hon. Gentleman would support that.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Over the past six weeks, my right hon. and learned Friend has shown extraordinary patience with our European partners, but he must be aware that that process has sorely tested the patience of many in the farming and beef industries, who are crying out for clear and detailed decisions regarding a resolution of the matter. Bearing in mind the remarks made a moment ago by my hon. Friend the Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Marland), will he consult and take decisions with his Cabinet colleagues about how much further we can go from the very selective slaughter policy that he has proposed, because I do not think that Conservative Members would back such progress, and what other measures we need to take to safeguard our national position?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend said that the crisis and the reaction to it have sorely tested the patience of the industry. He is quite right. I am also conscious of the fact that it has sorely tested the patience of right hon. and hon. Members. I have explained to my colleagues around the Council table the huge importance, expressed in political terms, of making early progress. I have explained that with reference to such considerations as I know are in the mind of my hon. Friend. I entirely endorse his sense of exasperation and frustration that progress has been so slow.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Has it not crossed the mind of Ministers of this pathetic Government that, during the 23 years since we became a member of the Common Market, the only way to resolve matters has been to go in there and let the other Ministers know that you mean business? For a few fleeting moments last week, somebody in the Tory Government was going to bang a big drum, but then they backed off. It was the only time that the Government looked as if they were going to do something positive.

It is high time that the Government understood that they are involved in a political issue—it is not technical or academic. When they realise that, they will be doing something for the farmers and all the others who have got the sack in Britain. It is high time that there was a cull—a cull of the Cabinet and the Government. Let us have a general election and cull the lot of them.

Mr. Hogg: One should not always be kind to the hon. Gentleman, but there is a grain of truth in what he said—perhaps more than a grain of truth—to the extent that he has emphasised the grave consequences of the ban for the industry, for people across the rural community and in other parts of the economy. That is true.

Because this is so serious, we cannot indulge ourselves in the sort of idle rant that we have just heard from the hon. Gentleman. We must ask ourselves what policies are most likely to lead to an early lifting of the ban. I have advocated, do advocate and have pursued the policies of persuasion and negotiation, because I think that those are most likely to achieve the essential end.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that those of us who represent beef and dairy constituencies are running out of patience? We will not accept an increased cull unless it is justified by scientific advice. Will he understand that decisions have to be reached within hours, not weeks? Will he give me an assurance that the Chelford market and agriculture centre in my constituency will be nominated as one of the collection points? He knows that the European Community is out to destroy our sale and distribution system, and the only way to retain it is to ensure that all the cattle markets share in whatever funds are going.

Mr. Hogg: I understand that most right hon. and hon. Members and the agricultural community are losing patience. I understand my hon. Friend's reservations about the concept of a selective cull, and we have tried to address those reservations in our consultations. I am conscious that we could not pursue a selective cull policy unless it was a policy that the House was ready to acquiesce in. That is the most important reassurance that I can give my hon. Friend.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Why are the Government still completely isolated in Europe? Either the other Governments are complete villains and will not listen to reason and argument, or the Government are entirely inept in the way that they are putting forward their argument. Which is it?

Mr. Hogg: That is not the correct analysis. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is enormous resistance to lifting the ban—that is true. However, when one listens to the arguments advanced across the Council table or among the vets, one sees that that resistance is not justified in scientific terms, and rarely in any other terms of considered argument. It is articulated in terms of consumer concern. I believe that a real fear is stemming from the market reactions in countries in Europe, and that that has caused them to fix on this matter as a way of restoring market confidence in their own countries. That is not a proper approach, and it is not one that I would commend to the House.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Will my right hon. and learned Friend say very firmly to our European colleagues that there is nothing more destructive of public confidence—about which they are protesting so much—than their constant refusal to accept scientific advice?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is wholly right, and I have said this to my colleagues in the Council many times—sometimes in even more robust language than that of my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): In relation to the slaughter scheme, I press the Minister, in particular, on collection centres and designated abattoirs. The farmers in my constituency do not know what is happening. We need to know whether there will be local provision on some of the islands and Kintyre. I am glad that the Secretary of State for Scotland is in the Chamber.

If there is no local provision, and if there is restriction on these centres, will not animals be ferried and trucked for many hundreds of miles to a collection centre and then back again? That will result in a loss of weight and a loss of value in the animal. The farmers in my constituency are deeply frustrated. A logjam is building up, and there are cash flow problems. There is an increasing feeling of hopelessness, because farmers do not know what will happen.

Mr. Hogg: As the hon. Lady can see, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is sitting on the Front Bench, and he has heard what she has said about information. He is sending information to the Scottish farming community. I know that he has paid careful attention to what the hon. Lady has said. The farming community and the Government are worried about a logjam in the early stages of the 30-month-plus cull. We are seeing whether there are any ways in which we can free up that logjam.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that most people believe that he is doing all that is possible to fight for the agricultural industry? None the less, we know that the Opposition are political and commercial, to the benefit of the French, German and Dutch farmers.

[Sir Peter Emery]

Irrespective of that, does my right hon. and learned Friend understand that there is great concern in the south-west? Farmers do not know where they are—they do not know what is happening and what they should do. Will he try to ensure that communication between his Department and not the NFU but farmers individually, is considered and greatly improved? Farmers are desperate to know how to act and what to do.

Mr. Hogg: My right hon. Friend has a very important point when he suggests that the opposition to our position is not based on science; I agree with that view. He is also right when he emphasises the importance of communicating the schemes and the details to the farming community. We did place material in the farming press last week. We have given much material and information to the NFU—I take my right hon. Friend's strictures—and he may have heard that I shall be sending a note to all farmers very shortly.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman understand that we welcome the fact that payment on a dead weight basis as well as a live weight basis will now be the norm? Will he confirm that the sum of 109p per kilo is on a live weight basis?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recall that he commended the Northern Ireland system of tracing and identifying cattle? Given that this subject, as he said today, is a matter of consumer concern and consumer perception, would it not be wise to use the traceability methods that exist in Northern Ireland, and in some other parts of the United Kingdom, as a lever to open the European export door? Every beast exported from anywhere in the United Kingdom is one headache fewer for him and for the Treasury.

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman also consider, in the light of the interest displayed in his statement today, that we are overdue for another full debate on that subject?

Mr. Hogg: A full debate is a matter for the usual channels. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support for both a live weight and dead weight valuation for compensation.

On identification, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that the Northern Ireland arrangements are better than those in any other part of the United Kingdom; that is wholly correct. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are considering the concept of an exemption from the 30-months scheme. It is possible that that might also be used as a justification for a partial lifting of the ban in respect of those herds that are so defined. We are working energetically on that. That would, I think, be of enormous value to the Province.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South–West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, if he were to introduce a scheme of compulsory killing of healthy cattle to reassure European consumers, he would need fresh primary legislation in this Parliament? Does he agree that, judging by the views of the House this afternoon, it would be very unlikely that such a Bill would pass the House?

Mr. Hogg: Clearly, any scheme that was brought forward would have to have proper statutory authority. As my hon. Friend well knows, that could be primary legislation or it could be secondary legislation under existing law. I further agree with my hon. Friend that a scheme could not be brought forward, whether under primary or secondary legislation, unless it was such as commended itself to the House.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Will the Minister remind his hon. Friends that the western European countries—indeed, any country—could impose a ban, and that, in the present situation, political skill and adequate initiative might lift that ban earlier than would be the case if we did not have an economic union?

Does the Minister understand that there is deep anxiety on this subject? I listened, and he may have listened, to farmers expressing on television their concern that they have heard nothing from the Ministry of Agriculture in recent weeks. They pointed out that we have not even had replies to questions of the sort that I asked the Minister two or three weeks ago—will animals be killed that have never been fed infected mammalian protein, in farms where there has been no death or case of BSE from animals that have never been fed that protein? A large number of dairy farms in this country are in that position, and the farmers have wrestled with acute anxiety for far too long.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is right to imply that the European ban is not the only problem we face. There are a number of national bans across the world—including those erected by Commonwealth countries—which need to be addressed.

I accept that farmers need yet more information. We have placed a whole lot of stuff in the farming press, we have been in continuous and virtual daily contact with the farming unions, and I shall be sending written material to all farmers.

On the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question, his description of farms in his constituency explains why we are pushing for an exemption scheme to enable established herds of the sort that he described—but more than 30 months old and beef—to be allowed into the human food chain.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that, when he and I first came into politics, the European Union was known as the Common Market—a mutual trading organisation? By what right does that organisation now say, on no scientific grounds, not only that our beef cannot be sold in Europe, but that it cannot be sold anywhere else, either?

Mr. Hogg: I share my hon. Friend's view that extending the prohibition—whether wholly or in part—to third countries, goes beyond the competence of the Union.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): While it is right that the emphasis should be on the state of the beef market, what consideration has the Minister given to the impact of the proposed slaughter policy on the dairy industry? Is it likely to force up the doorstep price of a pint?

Mr. Hogg: I believe not.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that any case that he brings to the European Court of Justice will no doubt please my farmers, but could take as long as two years to reach a conclusion? Will he ensure that any application for interim relief is launched as speedily as possible?

Mr. Hogg: That is obviously an important consideration.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I declare an interest in public health. Public confidence has been badly affected by this debacle, and many people do not want to eat beef or feed it to their children. Is it not therefore important that the weaknesses in the current food labelling laws should be urgently addressed? Manufacturers are not required to identify the species origin of the meat used in their products. What plans does the Minister have to tackle that problem and to allay people's fears?

Mr. Hogg: The essential question to ask is whether British beef is safe—to which the answer is yes. I do not honestly think that labelling has the slightest bearing on that issue.

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): Have not my right hon. and learned Friend and his predecessors consulted the EU since 1987 on every step of BSE? Have not the veterinary committees and other committees in the Union been appraised of what we were doing, and have they not agreed with what we were doing? Does not the current hysteria point to commercial and political considerations, not scientific ones?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend has an extremely distinguished record in the field, having been a distinguished Minister in my Department, and what he has said has considerable force. There has been an endless dialogue between officials from the United Kingdom and those in the European Union. My hon. Friend is right to assert that most of the opposition we have been encountering has no justification, either in science or in logic.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Is not the truth that, in spite of all the Minister's huffing and puffing and his dossier, in six weeks he has achieved nothing in terms of lifting any of the bans, including those imposed unilaterally by Commonwealth countries that have nothing to do with the European Union, while many of my constituents are continuing to lose their jobs? How long can the Minister continue in his job if he gets nowhere and still retain any degree of respect in the House?

Mr. Hogg: As to respect in the House, that is for the House to decide. At Luxembourg, we put in place a process that is capable of leading to the lifting of the ban. The essential question we must face is whether member states will play a full and active part in response to Commission proposals that will enable that to occur. I express the earnest and profound hope that they will.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that an uncharitable assessment of the position is that all he can do in the present position is to ask, plead, beg and to cajole, but compel nothing? Does he agree that, if he and his right hon. Friends are reduced to such a position under the present rules, the time has come to learn the real lesson of this miserable business and to ask: on what terms should we remain in the Community for the next 25 years?

Mr. Hogg: This is a very grave matter. Therefore, it is incumbent on all who have policy responsibilities to ask ourselves what kinds of policies are most likely to result in a lifting of the ban. I have been pursuing a policy of persuasion and negotiation, and I believe that that is the right approach.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): Does the Minister accept that the understandable frustration felt by farmers could now turn very easily into anger and despair at the delay in lifting the ban and lack of information about the slaughter policy? Will he do two things immediately? First, will he confirm that under no circumstances will the Government agree to the ban remaining in place until autumn this year? Secondly, will he confirm when the farmers will receive letters informing them about the collection points and the licensed abattoirs?

Mr. Hogg: On the matter of information, the hon. Gentleman will know that, last week, three farming publications carried extensive information about the issue. In a few days, the Ministry will write to all farmers enclosing a very detailed information pack.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there is great disappointment in my constituency at his inability to announce the lifting of the ban? Our fishing industry has been savaged by the European fishing policy, and now the European Union has started on our dairy and beef industries. My right hon. and learned Friend has admitted that the ban is illegal, unjustified and unwarranted. Therefore, will he apply a time limit and tell our friends overseas that, if the ban is not lifted within three to four weeks, we shall take retaliatory action?

Mr. Hogg: This is indeed a very serious matter, but we are all under an obligation to ask ourselves and one another what policies are most likely to bring about a speedy removal of the ban. The policies that I have outlined are those which I believe are most calculated to achieve that objective.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Could we return to the desperately important question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) about the United Kingdom's scientific infrastructure? What is happening with the central veterinary laboratory, the central science laboratory and the neuropathogens laboratory in Edinburgh and the cuts in work that may be vital in identifying the root cause of the problem? The last time that he was at the Dispatch Box, the Minister said very courteously that he would look at the experiments conducted in Ames, Iowa, involving proteins 130 and 131, and the question of prions in sub-heated food.

Mr. Hogg: Of course scientific research is important. I have discussed it on a number of occasions with Professor Pattison, the chairman of the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee, to ascertain whether he considered there to be a shortage of resources that could be addressed in those areas for which I have responsibility. I hope that I am not misquoting Professor Pattison, but I think that he was content with the present level of research. If he were not, he would express further concerns, and I would certainly do my best to address them. In the current year, we have increased MAFF spending on research by £1 million.

[Mr. Hogg]

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the concern that, if there are too few collection points for cull cows, many calves and other animals will go to those collection points, and other markets will lose business and may well be threatened? Will my right hon. and learned Friend look carefully at that issue, and consider licensing other collection points?

Mr. Hogg: On the general point, of course it is important there should be a sufficient number of collection points. When we see the system in operation, we shall certainly reflect on whether the number is adequate. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me—as will my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton)—if I do not accede to specific applications on the Floor of the House, as that is not an orderly way to conduct business.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): As the Irish Agriculture Minister believes that the blanket ban will still be in place in the autumn and the science involved takes time, will the Minister take note of the early-day motion calling for a zonal or regional approach to breaching the blanket ban? It was supported by 86 hon. Members from all parties and by several European Ministers. Surely a step-by-step approach should start with a breach of that blanket ban. Gelatine is one thing, but it does not compare with beef. The Minister's present policy is a waste of beef, and a waste of time.

Mr. Hogg: The slaughter of all the cattle involved in the 30-month-plus scheme, for example, is a dreadful waste of beef and money. I have the highest regard for the judgment of Mr. Ivan Yates, the Irish Agriculture Minister. I know him well, and I like working with him. He will be the next president of the Agricultural Council, and I hope to persuade him that it is not in his interests that the ban should be in place for that length of time.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On fruit and vegetables, which we discussed earlier, did the Minister offer his congratulations to his colleagues in the European Union on the fact that the food destruction programme, which last year reached 2.5 million tonnes and was designed purely to keep prices artificially high, appears to have broken all previous records? Will he tell the House straight—as I am sure he will—the cost to the taxpayer of the 30,000 cull that he is proposing, or the larger one that the Labour party supports? May we have some figures as to how much the taxpayer will pay?

Mr. Hogg: In the end, it all depends on the numbers that are brought within the selective cull scheme and the extent to which we can get Europe to contribute to the costs. Therefore, although I could provide figures, they would be speculative, and not of the solid variety that I know my hon. Friend likes.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): The Minister has done his best, but I am afraid that it is not good enough. The simple reason is that it is not in the interests of any other member of the European Union to concede that the blanket ban should be lifted. In order to provide assurance, he should have implemented throughout the United Kingdom the provision that exists in Northern Ireland for identifying our cattle herds.

As he says that there must be progressive lifting of the ban, will he seize the opportunity—where there is a measure of consent in the European Union—to adopt a regional approach? That is the only way to overcome the prejudice that exists, no matter how often we seek to confirm from scientific evidence that all British beef is safe. It is more important to get British beef moving, and I appeal to the Minister to help us—especially in Northern Ireland and Scotland, where we can meet the conditions that are being sought.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful for the remarks with which the hon. Gentleman began his question. It is perfectly true that Northern Ireland has a traceability and identification scheme from which the rest of the United Kingdom has a great deal to learn. We will have a good scheme in place by 1 June, although it will not be in every respect identical to the one in Northern Ireland.

It is certainly true that the Northern Ireland herds have very low levels of confirmed BSE. However, I have a preference for proceeding collectively, so that the policy that we pursue applies throughout the United Kingdom. The exemption policy that we are pursuing will be of particular benefit to Northern Ireland producers because of the character of the herds in the Province.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Somerton and Frome): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's assurance that the cull scheme will start tomorrow. May I urge him to ensure that abattoirs are given the details of the scheme? As of this morning, a major abattoir in my constituency could get no details whatever from MAFF.

Mr. Hogg: My understanding is that all abattoirs have the details; I am sorry that my hon. Friend knows of a case which apparently does not. If he will be good enough to talk to me or a colleague afterwards, we can perhaps make sure that the details are faxed this afternoon.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his brave attempts at the Agriculture Council; but I must tell him plainly that every man and woman in this country can now see that we in this House are not the masters of our own destiny; and that the European Union has nothing to do with fairness or scientific fact and everything to do with politics—as the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said—and protecting markets. Every cattle market in this country has been adversely affected by the BSE crisis. Why are there to be only 80 collection points? Every cattle market should be a collecting point, and I want the Congleton cattle market among them.

Mr. Hogg: It seems to me that the Winterton family is, collectively, a powerful advocate of certain causes. I shall certainly take my hon. Friend's point into account—although without commitment, because I must look at each application on its merits.

I am grateful for my hon. Friend's congratulations. I was right to suspect, however, that they would not be undiluted. I repeat what I have told many hon. Friends today: we have been pursuing the policies that we judge the most likely and the most effective to lift the ban.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Has my right hon. and learned Friend told his European colleagues that most people in this country think that, if we can be treated like this by our European friends, our membership of the Union is not working well? Has he told them, furthermore, that, as it is unlawful for them to ban our exports, we might consider unlawfully banning their imports? One way we can boost our beef industry is to redirect our exports to our domestic market. If that means banning imports of German, French or any other European beef, so be it.

Mr. Hogg: I have certainly told fellow Ministers in the Agriculture Council and others that a failure to solve this problem would seriously damage relations between the UK and the European Union, and between the UK and member states. I have tried to spell out to my colleagues the serious political consequences in this country of a failure to move on this matter. They know that—I have told them so many times.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, if we were not a member of the European Union but still faced a worldwide ban on our beef exports imposed by individual countries, we would have to negotiate at the World Trade Organisation just as we are negotiating now with the EU? Would that not be infinitely more complicated?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend makes a serious and important point. Of course, we have focused a great deal of effort and attention on the EU ban—the House knows why—but a large number of national bans have been imposed by countries outside the EU. They too need to be dealt with. I believe that removing the EU ban would be an important element in getting at least some of the national bans removed.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): Bearing in mind the fact that the EU's ban on the worldwide sales of British beef is unacceptable and perverse, is it not time that the Government, rather than awaiting further good will from our European partners, took active steps to promote the sale of British beef in countries outside the EU, and also took steps to ensure that the bans in some of those countries are lifted? It is action that British farmers and meat traders require.

Mr. Hogg: We have focused on a number of priorities, of which the most important is, I think, to try to bring urgent assistance to the UK farming community, and that we have done in great measure. We have placed great importance on getting the EU ban lifted. There are national bans too that need to be addressed, and we shall address them.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): My right hon. and learned Friend has done as well as anyone could have done, given the stubborn intransigence of the rest of the EU at the Council meeting. Does he agree that, given all the calls today for direct action, perhaps it is right not to go down the road of a tit-for-tat trade war? It is certainly right, however, to use what powers my right hon. and learned Friend has to ensure that our farmers and agriculture industry have a future.

We need more collection points. We need also a scheme for heifers under 30 months of age. In addition, we need unilaterally to say that we shall have exemptions for cattle over 30 months of age. It would be a grotesque obscenity to see perfectly healthy animals, many bred on grass, being destroyed.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend knows a great deal about this subject, bearing in mind his constituency. I, too, attach considerable importance to what we have been loosely referring to as the exemption policy in respect of 30-month-plus cattle. I would prefer to agree that approach with the EU.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): My right hon. and learned Friend will not be surprised that many people are saying that the EU is not working, and that it desperately needs reforming. To turn to matters that are under the control of my right hon. and learned Friend in the culling programme, will he confirm that live weight and dead weight will not give a financial advantage to any one sector? If he were to find that there was a financial advantage and the cost to the taxpayer was being increased, would adjustments be made?

Mr. Hogg: The live weight/dead weight ratio is contained in the conclusions of early April. We secured an agreement at the management committee last Friday that we should have a dead weight option as well on the basis of previous conclusions. In doing that, I was responding to strenuous representations from farming unions.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will my right hon. and learned Friend, who continually refers to persuasion and negotiation, appreciate that there is deep anxiety in my constituency and in all the other agricultural constituencies of the land? Will he bear in mind the fact that, when he refers to urgent assistance, there are some legal remedies that he could employ, or recommend to the Cabinet, including the suspension of payments, which would deal with the Community's cash flow? It would not be a tit-for-tat arrangement, but it would bring to bear on the minds of those representing other member states the realisation that they need our money too.

Mr. Hogg: Of course I am aware, as is my hon. Friend, of the deep anxieties that are felt in rural constituencies, as elsewhere. I have represented a rural constituency since 1979. Indeed, it is one of the most rural of English constituencies. I am anxious to pursue those policies that I deem most likely to bring about a rapid lifting of the ban. I think that I have been doing that. I shall consider any suggestion that is proper, lawful and likely to be effective, but we must consider the consequence of any particular policy.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): While my right hon. and learned Friend is undoubtedly right to pursue a policy of persuasion and negotiation, does he not agree that the lesson of Luxembourg is that, unfortunately, it looks as if such a policy will take a significant time to achieve the right result, and that, as the negotiations continue, we shall be pushed ever further in the direction of following a slaughtering policy for which there can be no scientific justification? Therefore, will he actively pursue other means that are open to him, especially the legal challenge—bringing, I hope, a case in the European Court for interim measures? That would be a test case, perhaps in more senses than one.

[Mr. David Harris]

Mr. Hogg: I shall of course pay considerable attention to what my hon. Friend says about the legal challenge. That is an important point. On selective culling, I return to two points that I have made on a number of occasions. First, we could properly pursue only a policy that was proportionate in terms of slaughter, and that was targeted. Secondly, any policy must be one to which the agricultural community and the House will give their broad assent.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): On collection points, assuming that a selective cull is necessary, is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the great concern of farmers in my constituency—indeed in the whole of Worcestershire—that neither Kidderminster cattle market nor any cattle market in Worcestershire has been designated as a collection point? Is he not aware that the already great difficulties caused for farmers as a result of the crisis may be exacerbated by the long-term decline of Kidderminster market if it is not designated as a collection point at this time?

Mr. Hogg: Obviously I am concerned that we should have adequate coverage by way of collection centres. During this afternoon's exchange, four centres have been suggested, and I have a feeling that many others would have been, had you, Madam Speaker, called other hon. Members, so I will not give any commitment in respect of particular markets; but, of course, I take account of what my hon. Friend has so eloquently said.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The Minister has conceded that there are potential welfare problems and that there is a need to ensure the speedy implementation of the measures, which will of course have to be enforced. Given all those factors, is this the right time to make cuts in the state veterinary service's budget? Will he think again about that?

Mr. Hogg: We have made adequate provision to deal with the sort of concerns that are troubling the hon. Gentleman.

Local Authorities (Trading and Competition Powers)

4.37 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to allow local authorities to trade and compete with private sector providers.

Such a Bill is long overdue. It is needed to clarify beyond doubt the powers that local authorities have to supply services or goods to other organisations. In this vital sector, the law is opaque.

I have always wanted to give local authorities a power of general competence that would allow them to do anything that is not specifically prohibited by Act of Parliament. At present, the position is precisely the reverse. Councils can lawfully act only if the powers have been given to them by Parliament. However, a power of general competence along those lines does not feature in the Bill. It is much more narrowly focused. I therefore hope that it will receive all-party support.

The form of the Bill has emerged after discussions with the Association of Direct Labour Organisations, its director John Roberts, and others. ADLO has a membership of more than 200 councils nationwide, and they are all crying out for clarification of the law. They tell me that they have to negotiate a legal minefield before they can respond positively to requests from local companies or local people who wish to buy their services. Sometimes it is possible, but, more often than not, it is unlawful, and the council must turn down the chance of earning money that could only benefit council tax payers.

Railtrack, whose prospectus is published today, is a case in point. It wanted to contract with councils to cut grass and to remove litter on railway land, but that was outside the powers of local authorities, and the proposal was spiked.

The Bill would allow councils to provide goods and services that are connected with their functions. It would not allow them to set up car companies, for example, in competition with Nissan, or factories to manufacture television sets. However, the Bill would allow councils to acquire premises, appoint staff, and form companies. They would be able to charge for the goods and services they supply, and that has always been a grey area.

These important new powers would be circumscribed by regulations that the Government of the day may consider necessary. The regulations could exclude certain goods or services, or restrict the geographical area within which a local authority may provide goods or services, or may in some way restrict the terms or conditions of any agreement that councils may enter into. I say that for the benefit of Conservatives, who may fear that the new powers would give councils an unfair advantage over other organisations or individuals. The Bill contains plenty of safeguards.

Currently, councils have a restricted range of services in which they can engage in head-to-head competition with the private sector. A council car park is one example. Round the corner from it there may be an NCP car park which is competing head to head for the same trade. However, that is the exception rather than the rule.

Thamesdown Contractors is the trading arm of Thamesdown borough council, and its experience is more typical. It manufactures and supplies PVC window fames, and can install them in council houses. But if someone exercises his right to buy his council house and wants the council to put in a new set of windows, the council cannot do it, because it would be against the law. That is clearly absurd. There are many other such examples.

Many councils employ arboriculturists to deal with trees that overhang highways or are in public parks. Out of the goodness of their hearts, they often offer advice to individuals on the care and preservation of trees and so on. Sometimes they advise on the design of new developments, but on the strict application of the law, they are unable to respond to requests from local people who want their services and would be prepared to pay for them.

Motor vehicle services are also important. Virtually every council has a fleet of vehicles that needs to be looked after. Why is it not possible for that service to be offered more widely? Councils are well placed to undertake the maintenance of private gardens and sports pitches, but it is legally impossible. The surfacing of private car parks or drives in conjunction with highway work on an adjoining site is possible. It is absurd that a council laying tarmac cannot run it up a private drive whose owner is prepared to pay for it. That is an eminently sensible idea, but it is unlawful.

Many councils grow plants, and the cost to the parks departments of putting in a few extra plants is minimal. Although all the gardeners out there would like to buy plants from local authorities, it is impossible. There are many areas in which people would freely choose to buy services, but the law prevents them from doing so.

I mentioned safeguards. No one wants to see florists, glaziers or local garages put out of business by local authorities, and anyone who suggests that that would happen is misrepresenting the Bill. The councils want the famous level playing field, no more and no less. They do not want unfair advantages. As I have said, the law is opaque. The power to trade is severely circumscribed, and is permitted only by the Local Authorities (Goods and Services) Act 1970, which sets out the limited room for manoeuvre that is open to councils.

The Audit Commission has taken a narrow view of council powers. According to the Municipal Journal, its advice to district auditors has been the kiss of death to direct service organisations. That is true. There are people who take a much less restrictive view, arguing that it is permissible, lawful and sensible for councils to contract to provide services and employ staff to carry out the agreement. Tragically, that has never been tested in the courts. Local authorities have always erred on the side of caution, fearful that they might be visited by the district auditor, who would exact terrible retribution if the council spent money when it had no lawful authority to do so.

The Department of the Environment has confused things even more in a letter that was sent to the local authority associations on 7 December last year. It apparently gives the green light to local authority trading, stating:

> "It is the Department's view that local authorities have powers to trade for profit and to take on staff for the purposes of those trading activities."

No one knows whether that is a correct statement of the law, but coming from the Department, it has a certain authority. All is confusion.

The Audit Commission is apparently revising its earlier guidance in the light of the Department's letter, although we have yet to see the new guidance. It is all haphazard and unsatisfactory. That is why legislation is needed to clarify the law. Councils up and down the land are hungry for new work and opportunities. They have embraced the contract culture, which will please Conservative Members, and demonstrated that they can deliver top-quality services that people value. My Bill will give powers to local authorities to do just that.

4.46 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): The hon. Gentleman called for all-party support. I am on my feet to disappoint him. He went to great lengths to reassure us about how restricted the Bill's scope is but Conservative Members know that if Labour councillors are given new powers, they will abuse them. Labour councils have foreign policies and increased or newly invented allowances for Labour councillors. They run political campaigns on taxpayers' money. Council after council uses double accounting in respect of council nursing homes. It costs more to run, but they are able to put in their books that they charge less for those places.

Of course Labour councillors would welcome the Bill, as they would any extension of their powers. Consider their record. They have failed to spend money wisely; they cannot control expenditure; they cannot collect their council tax; they will not collect their rents; they charge as much council tax as they can get away with; they saddle their communities with debt; and they run measurably worse services. No wonder the hon. Gentleman attacks the Audit Commission, which is what measures how badly Labour councils perform. Now they and the hon. Gentleman want more freedom to wreck their communities.

Labour has always dreamed of councils with the power to do everything, provide any service, and ride roughshod over private providers. Labour simply cannot understand that it is fundamentally wrong for council tax payers to subsidise speculative commercial activities. It would not be the councillors who took the risk, but the council tax payers. When such activities go wrong, as they clearly would, those working in the businesses that the council has done its best to destroy will pick up the bill, having already faced unfair competition, as council tax payers are the lender of last resort.

What is Labour's track record that leads to the Bill's introduction? What would be in its prospectus? Would it be Bradford, where the direct labour organisation paid people who were not even on the payroll? They worked for free for the managers' favourite rugby league side. Presumably to keep everybody quiet, the senior managers were the highest paid in any metropolitan council.

Would it be Darlington, where Labour built a model train with enough bricks to build 44 large houses? Would it be in Goole, where the clerk of a small town council with a budget of little more than £1 million was paid more than a Cabinet Minister? Or would it be Kirklees, which has refined its time for recruiting housing officers to six months, of which I am sure it is proud. Or would it be Lancashire, where sick leave cost £12 million last year alone? Instead of spending money on poorer people, it spent £100,000 on a so-called anti-poverty unit. That money would have paid for more than 16,000 hours of home help. What people in Lancashire will get is hot air rather than home helps.

[Mr. Robert G. Hughes]

In Birmingham, even a Labour councillor has been forced to admit that the council's budget

"is operating in many ways like a slush fund."

That is real Labour in power—real power, real abuse.

The hon. Member for Pendle has, if I may say so, a special place in local government. Before he went to Lancashire, he was in London, where, as leader of Hammersmith and Fulham council, he invented the crazy notion of using debt swaps to expand trading. The point is not that debt swaps were not used before, but the way in which the hon. Gentleman and his council used them—trying to fund extra spending with junk bonds.

Of course, it all went wrong, and probably cost Hammersmith and Fulham council tax payers £97 million. The hon. Gentleman clearly does not like to keep good ideas to himself, as he has shown today. As a Labour party employee, he so enthused other councils with the idea that the total loss in the country probably exceeded £500 million. What a marvellous record for one person.

Before we take the proposal of the hon. Member seriously, we should look at where his previous good ideas have taken us. The Bill is so silly an idea. The House has better things to do, so we should simply let him carry on with it and just ignore him.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gordon Prentice, Mr. Peter L. Pike, Ms Joan Walley, Mr. Thomas McAvoy, Mr. Neil Gerrard, Mr. Roy Beggs, Mr. David Rendel, Mr. Eric Illsley, Mr. James Wallace, Mrs. Helen Jackson and Mr. Calum Macdonald.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (TRADING AND COMPETITION POWERS)

Mr. Gordon Prentice accordingly presented a Bill to allow local authorities to trade and compete with private sector providers: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 10 May and to be printed. [Bill 119.]

Orders of the Day

National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New clause 2

LIMITATION OF ANNUAL EFFECT ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURE

'.—(1) In exercising his duty under section 1 and section 2 the Secretary of State shall seek, so far as is practicable, so to manage the transfer of any residual liabilities as to secure that the total of any resulting charges on the Consolidated Fund or on moneys provided by Parliament does not in any one financial year exceed such sum as the Treasury shall by order specify.

(2) The Treasury may from time to time by order vary the sum contained in any order for the time being in force under subsection(1) above.

(3) The power to make an order under subsection (1) or (2) above shall be exercisable by statutory instrument, but no such order shall be made unless a draft thereof has been approved by the Commons House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Galbraith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.51 pm

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to discuss new clause 3—Annual report on effects on public expenditure—

'The Secretary of State shall prepare and lay before the House of Commons a report, in respect of each financial year or part thereof, on the exercise of his duty under section 1 and section 2, with particular reference to any resulting charges on the Consolidated Fund or on moneys provided by Parliament.'.

Mr. Galbraith: The more I consider the Bill, the more I am worried, not only about its operation but about its consequences. My new clause would involve the Treasury right from the start of the process. Important consequences for the national finances are hidden in the Bill. The private finance initiative is basically all about Government bodies borrowing money, but not having it set against the public sector borrowing requirement. That position is untenable and my new clause would reverse it.

When the Bill was first proposed, the Secretary of State for Health tried to maintain that it was merely a technical measure, which he would never have to use. That is a slightly odd position to adopt, because he was in part forced to introduce the Bill. Those who wanted to become involved in the PFI thought that there was a possibility of failure in hospital trusts and other health service facilities, so they wanted a guarantee.

Although the Secretary of State felt that the power might never be used, that was not the view of the financial institutions, construction companies and other private firms involved. Indeed, the more I considered the matter, the more I realised that there were risks of failure in NHS-run projects. It may not be a large district hospital that is affected, although that could happen. It is more likely to be a smaller institution, a facility for caring for the elderly, a laboratory or a piece of capital equipment. The question then is: on whom does that liability fall? That is not yet clear in my mind.

Part of the reason for the difficulty is that the PFI involves a large number of differing projects with different relationships. We have trouble sorting them out, because the initiatives and contracts involved are secret. None of us knows what they are or who is liable. For that reason, the Treasury must be consulted and must consider laying the liability against the national finances.

If the PFI—which was first developed by the National Economic Development Council in the early 1980s—was about anything, it was to ensure that the private sector adopted all the risk. The cheapest option had to be chosen, and the private sector alone accepted the full risk. That clearly was not acceptable, and the Ryrie rules were changed and were eventually dropped completely. In 1992, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), reintroduced the concept of the PFI which, under the Ryrie rules, originally dealt with nationalised industry. The right hon. Gentleman reintroduced the concept for other Departments, but again on the basis of some risk being accepted by the private companies.

The right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames said at the time that the PFI

"would remove the unnecessary obstacles to private sector investment in Britain's infrastructure."

But he reiterated that the private sector must generally assume some risk. That again proved to be unworkable, and the position was gradually changed. Today, the private sector will get involved in the PFI within the health service only if it carries no real risk. If it carries no real risk, the NHS will carry the risk and any capital involved should therefore be set against the public sector borrowing requirement. The basis for my new clause is to ensure that that becomes part of the process.

There are some risks involved for the private sector. For example, those involved claim that they must deliver on time. I must say that anyone in business who does not accept the necessity of delivering on time probably should not be in business in the first place. There is the risk of obsolescence, and that is a real problem. As an example, I shall refer to Takare, the company involved through the PFI in Greater Glasgow health board. The company looks after the care of the elderly, and we are locked into a 15-year lease. Some of that model is now obsolete, but we are stuck with it. We can either break the contract—with the risk then falling on us—or persist. Although there is a risk, once again the health service is carrying it.

There is a risk in terms of volume. In other words, the amount of work contracted for might not be available later. Again, the health service will be faced with the risk, not the private sector. If the hospital that has been built does not have enough work to sustain it, we can either close it down and accept the risk or continue with an obsolescent institution.

There are risks also to the public sector. How great are the capital costs? We do not know the risks, the capital costs involved or who has accepted them, simply because we do not know about the contracts. I shall refer to a case that the Minister of State, Scottish Office, who is in the Chamber, will appreciate—Stonehaven hospital. The building of the hospital, the running of its services and the employment of staff are covered by the private finance initiative. Three bids have been put in for that, yet we are not allowed to see them. The local trust, which also put in a bid, initially intended to make its tender public knowledge, but it has been stopped from doing so by the Scottish Office. All that we as the taxpayers will be allowed from a publicly accountable body is a press release, which we have had, and a little picture of the proposed hospital. That is all the scrutiny that is available to us and to the House.

5 pm

What other financial arrangements are involved in that hospital? What liabilities do we carry? If the companies that are proposing to build it borrow money in order to do so and the companies fall, will we carry the financial liabilities? If we do, we face a serious problem. If such liabilities are not declared in the public sector borrowing requirement, they are being hidden and the PSBR does not reflect the position. We have a financial sleight of hand, a massaging of the figures, as a result of which the increase in the PSBR is not shown and is thus a matter of deceit.

I am more and more of the view that not only will that happen under the private finance initiative, but the Government are already coming round to accepting it. The consultancy for building firms, Beard Dove, in a paper on the prospects of the Scottish construction industry and the Government's private finance initiative of October 1995, says that the Scottish Office should reduce private sector risk in NHS projects. I remind the House that the basis of the private finance initiative is that private financiers accept the risk. But here the consultants are suggesting that the Scottish Office should reduce that risk by developing some formula whereby the capital cost of replacement of material and service elements is reimbursed to the consortia on the actual cost basis.

The consultants, Beard Dove, say:

"it is almost impossible to assess the replacement costs of major elements of mechanical and electrical services in a hospital building some 15 years from now."

I agree with that. That is the difficulty. We do not know what the NHS will be like 15 years down the line. Events in the NHS move quickly; that is one of the problems of financing it. That is part of the challenge of the NHS. Businesses will not want to go into it because of that, but that is the risk that they should have to take. That is one of the risks of obsolescence. In other words, they want us to take on the real risk. They want to have it both ways. They want to make a profit, but if anything goes wrong, the public sector will have to pick up the tab. That cannot be right.

But leaving aside that moral-political argument, it is clear from what the consultants are saying that, within such contracts, we shall take on considerable on-going capital costs about which we do not know and which will not be declared in the annual accounts. For that reason, therefore, this matter, and every private finance initiative, must be considered by the Treasury. The sums involved must be set against the PSBR or, at least, each year a certain amount should be set beyond which one cannot go. I know that the Minister will tell us about the external financing limits, but such sums are not part of the external financing limits. They will not be considered. They will be outside the EFL. We have a new capital borrowing requirement. That being so, it must be set against the

[Mr. Galbraith]

PSBR. This is a sleight of hand to massage the Government's books. We must not tolerate it. We must have transparency.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): New clause 2 seeks, rightly, to limit the residual liability that may fall on the Treasury in any one year. Hon. Members on both sides of the House are well used to the existence of cash limits in the NHS. If there is a cash limit on the resources available for surgeons to provide operations for NHS patients, surely we should have a cash limit on the services that financiers provide to the NHS in terms of capital investment.

New clause 2 is necessary because there is an overall cash limit on the money available in the NHS. Every pound that is spent out of the NHS budget on meeting and underwriting the costs associated with residual liabilities, should a trust close or no longer be able to service its obligations to a private sector investor, is no longer available for treating patients. It is a straight trade-off. Each pound can be spent only once. Therefore, the larger the potential residual liability that the NHS has to meet in one year, the greater will be the effect on the availability of cash for NHS patients.

That is not a theoretical concern. The Minister might come to the Dispatch Box and say that, theoretically, that could happen, but that, of course, more than one trust will not go under in a long period. However, I ask him to think carefully about two considerations. First, at the moment we are in the early days of the private finance initiative, and individual trusts, if they have a PFI scheme, will have only one. But over the years, they could develop so that the liabilities, should a trust fail, could be substantial.

Secondly, the financial health of some NHS trusts is—let me put it this way—far from perfect. In the NHS annual accounts, published a month or so ago, the auditor qualifies his audit in a number of ways. One of the notes of qualification is that 36 NHS trusts in England failed to meet their statutory duty to break even. In some cases, their deficit in the year in question, 1994-95, was relatively minor—in one case it was as low as £25,000—but at the other extreme was a trust with a deficit of £8.4 million.

We face the possibility of trusts in effect going into liquidation and the residual liability obligations put forward by the Government in the Bill being put into practice. The trust with the £8.4 million deficit would probably go under with greater liabilities if it had a number of PFI schemes, but if it went under with its retained deficit for the year as liabilities, £8.4 million would be taken away from other parts of the NHS budget; taken away from patients. That is what the House will have voted for if the Bill is enacted without new clause 2. It will be gambling with the cash available for treating NHS patients.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, Leith): I support new clause 2, perhaps slightly nervously after the contributions of the previous two distinguished speakers, my hon. Friends the Members for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) and for York (Mr. Bayley), a brain surgeon and a health economist respectively. They obviously spoke with great authority and I want to back up what they said.

I can understand why the PFI has immediately been considered attractive in some ways in the health service, as elsewhere. It appears to get round an immediate borrowing problem. The PFI is very attractive if it can make money available for hospital buildings without running up immediate borrowing. But problems are being stored up for the future, and the new clause addresses one of those problems.

It is perhaps no accident that I am the second Scottish Member to speak in the debate. We seem to be at the cutting edge of the PFI—in Edinburgh, where I come from, and most notably, of course, in Stonehaven, which has been part of an experiment in contracting out all the services in a new hospital to the private sector. There are very serious anxieties about that experiment in Scotland.

The first drawback of operating the PFI in health is, of course, that, to make it attractive to the private sector, there is a temptation to give out as many services as possible, because the private sector can then make more money. Opposition Members find it totally unacceptable that clinical services, such as doctors and nurses—in fact, all the clinical services—at Stonehaven are being put out to the private sector.

Our second worry about the PFI is its long-term consequences. The Treasury Select Committee report on this subject raised concerns that were felt by Conservative Members as much as by Labour Members, because, while the PFI solves long-term borrowing problems, it piles up enormous pressure on future revenue budgets.

I recently had a meeting with a chief executive of a trust that is involved in a major PFI deal, and he explained to me how those contracts are working. He said that there is an increasing amount of revenue payments over the period of the contracts, and that if health expenditure remains flat in real terms, as it has done, there will be a very serious problem in meeting payments on those contracts. So problems are being stored up for future revenue budgets, which may of course translate into problems for services. If the revenue budget is under pressure, there may well have to be a higher patient turnover, and money may have to be saved in other unacceptable ways.

The third anxiety is specifically referred to in the new clause. A greater amount of public expenditure might be involved if the contract fails—for example, if the trust cannot meet its expenses because the referral pattern to the trust has changed or for any of a number of other reasons that we cannot foresee, because we are talking about contracts that may be for 25 years or longer.

The Bill's purpose is to ensure that, basically, the Government meet liabilities if a trust cannot meet them as part of its contract. So a series of potential problems with future expenditure arise through operating the PFI in the health service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden mentioned another anxiety that we have in Scotland. All the bids that have been submitted for Stonehaven, and no doubt for other hospitals subsequently, have been secret, so we cannot scrutinise the small print to discover what is involved. That is another serious concern.

We do not think that a blank cheque should be given by the Government to any trust, to enter into any deal or to borrow on its own to any extent that it likes—up to £5 billion for the country overall. We are very concerned about that, and we are surprised that a Government who pride themselves on sound finance should be so keen to enter into such an arrangement. I suppose the reason is that they are so determined to go down that route that they are prepared to pay any price.

The new clause represents at least a certain small element of check on the process, and the Government would be well advised to accept it.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm) is absolutely right to talk about the issue of the private finance initiative and clinical services. I shall return to that matter on the Bill's Third Reading later today, if we get that far. We thought that we would get to Third Reading in the early hours of last Thursday, but the Government's Whips, unfortunately—for some inexplicable reason—decided to withdraw the Bill's remaining stages on that day. Nevertheless, we have come along today hoping to finish the Bill's Report stage and Third Reading.

5.15 pm

Hon. Members will know that my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) is not only a well respected Member of Parliament, but a very well respected member of the medical profession. Many of us therefore believe that not only it is right for the House to listen carefully to what he says, that we should also give due recognition to what he thinks should be contained in health service legislation passing through the House. On that basis, I hope that the Minister will respond fully to the points that he made.

I should like to examine in turn each of the new clauses tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden. New clause 2 is straightforward and logical. My reading of it is that it attempts to consider the Bill's real effects on public finances, which is something that Ministers should have considered and acted on during the Bill's passage. The Government have sprung on Parliament this Bill as a reaction to the need to get the PFI moving somewhere—whether in the city, the Treasury or wherever—or to promises of new hospitals. The Bill has, more or less, been an attempt to liven up the Government's PFI, and is not an attempt to find the best way in which to look after the interests of the public purse.

New clause 2 has two effects. First, it requires that the Secretary of State absorbs as few residual liabilities as practicable. Secondly, it states that the total that the Secretary of State transfers to himself, rather than to other health service bodies, should be limited to a maximum amount, specified by the Treasury. Those provisions are entirely sensible. I must say that I am still unconvinced, as are other Labour Members, that we would have proper scrutiny and statutory control of public expenditure in this sphere only if the amount reaches £5 billion. We find that that is unacceptable. The provisions of clause 2 alone are sufficient. I think that the Minister should seriously consider accepting it.

The clause makes a further provision that enhances its importance, requiring that Parliament approves the limit set by the Treasury on total allowable liabilities absorbed by the Secretary of State in any one year.

We have consistently argued that the PFI process is far too secretive. We have also argued that the Secretary of State is assuming so-called "powers" under this Bill that are not powers at all. He is merely gold-plating risk in the private sector—a risk which, he has told us on numerous occasions in different speeches, is a risk that the private and not the public sector should take. His "power" is merely the power effectively to write blank and undated cheques. Even if he is knowledgeable about the sum involved, Parliament is not so knowledgeable. The power is effectively to write out cheques on behalf of the public purse and to hand them to private sector companies through the PFI.

This new clause will limit the extent to which the public purse will be exposed to such blatant rigging of the PFI process, and Parliament will consider what should be the right amount of risk for the Secretary of State to guarantee. It is important that someone does so, because the Secretary of State is not required under this Bill to consider the amount of risk to which he may be exposing the taxpayer.

New clause 3, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, further requires that the Secretary of State prepares a report to lay before Parliament detailing how much his gold-plating exercise will cost us. Currently, no one may ever find out how much has been spent on risk transfers to the public sector. No one may ever know how much public money is being siphoned off into the private sector at the expense of the NHS. My hon. Friend's new clause corrects that situation and brings back a degree of openness that is entirely lacking in the Secretary of State's dealings with the House on this Bill.

I believe that these clauses should be considered because, importantly, they bring some semblance of balance and responsibility back into the Bill. It is of some concern that Ministers did not consider the need of the House and the country to ensure that proposed legislation is fair and balanced and that we, as Members of Parliament and the protectors of taxpayers' money, have a say in how that money is spent.

Without these clauses, the Bill is diminished. Parliament will have no say in the way in which possibly billions of pounds may be expended. That expenditure, which ultimately taxpayers will have to pay for, may be virtually unlimited.

The Minister must be concerned about the possibilities raised by the Bill. What will happen when the £5 billion ceiling has been reached—the only statutory protection that exists currently? Will the Government be back for more, asking us to increase the target with as little consultation as we had in setting it in the first place? What will the Secretary of State say when Parliament asks what measures he took to limit public expenditure? What will he say when he is asked why he made no effort to monitor effectively the liabilities being incurred? These clauses would give Parliament such responsibilities. Since they appear to be too much for the Minister and his colleagues to handle, why not let Parliament assist in the process?

We believe that the unwarranted extension to the PFI system in the health service, which the Bill proposes, is flawed. There is no effective scrutiny or monitoring. There is no real accountability and there is certainly no openness. The clauses repair some of the damage that the Bill will inflict. Perhaps the Minister will recognise that the Bill is unbalanced and irresponsible and that without provisions such as this it will remain so. I hope that the Minister will look favourably on the new clauses.

[Mr. Kevin Barron]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): As the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) reminded us, his hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) has a distinguished medical career. In view of the nature of the new clause and some of the helpful suggestions that he made in Committee, he might think of a second career in finance should he ever lose his seat in the House.

Mr. Galbraith: Too boring.

Mr. Horam: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I would rather be a doctor than be involved in finance.

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden wanted to ensure that the Treasury was involved at the start. I can assure him, without fear of rebuttal, that the Treasury is involved throughout all the PFI schemes and I would not have it otherwise, because it looks at these things in a firm financial way. That is right and proper.

Mr. Galbraith: My memory of this debate last week is that the Minister maintained that the Treasury could not possibly be involved in all the issues because there were far too many. Is the Minister saying that the position has changed since last week? Has the Treasury scrutinised the Stonehaven project? I believe that there was a suggestion that the Treasury might be involved above a certain limit. Is it involved in all the schemes, some of them, or none of them?

Mr. Horam: The hon. Gentleman is right. There is a de minimis limit whereby the Treasury is not involved in some of the smaller schemes. For the major schemes, which are the purport of the Bill, it is involved. I remind the hon. Gentleman that about 22 smaller schemes have already gone ahead with the benefit of PFI and that some buildings are already being constructed and equipment is being installed. Clearly, for such small schemes, Treasury investigation is not necessary and the problem of liability on a large scale does not occur. It is only with the larger schemes where there is a possibility of the liabilities in some sense not being transferred that the Treasury is involved.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): For clarification, can the Minister tell us where the limit lies?

Mr. Horam: Last Wednesday I told the House that the figure starts at £10 million, but it can be less than that on a sample basis, perhaps down to £4 million. I believe that, roughly, those are the figures. So the Treasury is involved in the bigger and medium schemes.

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden argued that the private sector was carrying no risk. On the contrary, it is carrying a great deal of risk. If a new hospital is being built and it is not completed on time or there are cost overruns, the private sector will bear the risk under the PFI. With a publicly funded hospital such as, for example, the Chelsea and Westminster, the taxpayer bears the cost. There were large overruns running into tens of millions of pounds when that hospital was not completed to the budgeted cost.

If maintenance costs are exceeded after the construction of a building, that will be down to the private sector. If there is a facilities management contract, it will have to be performed properly and, if that is not done, the private sector will carry the risk. It is for that reason that these schemes need not be counted against public sector finance. The private sector is taking the burden of the risk just as the public sector takes other risks, such as political risks. It is right to apportion risk in that way. It would be necessary to canvas against private sector finance if there were no risk for the private sector. I accept the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument, but there is risk for the private sector.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): This is a continuation of the debate that we had in Committee. I believe that the argument is flawed when the risk can be limited by contract and the liability under the contract can fall entirely on the contractor. The Minister needs to explain to the House why, in public sector contracts, the NHS cannot enter into a contract that stipulates that the building company takes the risk. That would contract away the risk that the Minister said would fall on the public sector under the present non-PFI system. That can be dealt with in a normal legal and contractual way.

Mr. Horam: To be honest, I do not fully understand the hon. Gentleman's point. The distinction that I am making is clear. We are saying that private sector finance must bear certain risks. If it does not bear those risks, or if the Treasury deems that the amount of risk is unsatisfactory, it will not agree to the scheme, and it will count as public sector finance.

Mr. Hughes: If we take as an example the Chelsea and Westminster or any other old-style contract, of course there is a risk that costs might expand. However, there is no reason why the trust cannot do a deal with the builder saying, "We will pay an all-in figure of, say, £50 million, and anything above that will be your responsibility and liability." That is normal. There are all sorts of building contracts. It happens to be the job that I did before coming here, so I know a little about it. It is perfectly proper to agree an all-in facilities contract or an all-in construction contract. All the risk of any additional cost can be contracted away. Why is it not possible for that to continue in the NHS in the future as it has legally been possible in the past?

Mr. Horam: The fact is that it has not been done in the past. We are taking a road that should perhaps have been obvious to previous Governments. It is a sensible road to take, because it means that we can take the burden off public sector finance.

The nature of the scheme is rather different. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), remembering the arguments that we had in Committee, is thinking of a construction scheme. We are not talking about "build and forget", which has been the typical method in the past. We are talking about a continuing commitment. The constructor owns the building and provides the facilities to support the clinicians. That is the difference between this sort of scheme and the scheme that the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

Mr. Hughes: There are two types of contracts: there are building contracts and there are management, running or facilities contracts—or whatever the Minister would like to call them. I accept that in the past the NHS has not said, "This is the fixed price, you take the responsibility". I am arguing that it is possible to do that without it being done in the private finance initiative way, which says, "You build it, you run it; we are simply an agent, a tenant or a lessee." That would be possible. There is an advantage if the NHS moves into an agreement for the services as opposed to an agreement for the building. However, it is entirely possible to keep that under a traditional contract. That does not make a strong argument for PFI as opposed to any other form of finance.

Mr. Horam: I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman because it seems to me that what he is proposing is radically different from what has been the traditional pattern of public sector building. We are taking into account not only the construction of the building but also the ownership of the building, the supply of maintenance facilities, et cetera. To some extent, we are comparing apples and pears. The financial arrangements that we are putting forward are consistent with the sorts of risks involved for the private sector.

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden referred to the name of a consultant—I think it was Beard Dove—and he said that private contractors will suggest that the risk be reduced. Indeed, they will say, "We are being asked to bear too much risk in this case"—that is a natural negotiating posture for contractors. The fact is that they have to bear some risk and the amount of risk that they bear cannot go below a certain amount, or it will not be agreed to by the hospital trust or by the Treasury. They may put forward their point of view, but the Government will not necessarily agree to it.

5.30 pm

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Beardsden also talked about the Stonehaven example in Scotland and how much information was made available to the public. The bidders can decide how much knowledge of their bid is made available to the public. The health board has conducted a full public consultation about the types of facilities that should be provided and the facilities, in essence, determine the nature of the contract. Beyond that, the details of the negotiations are a matter for commercial confidentiality and the Government do not want to disadvantage the public sector or private bidders in this situation.

Mr. Spellar: Why?

Mr. Horam: It is a matter for discussion and negotiation, and it is not sensible to go into questions of commercial confidentiality when important issues are at stake. I refer to the comments by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley). I am sure that he appreciates that the Bill translates what is at present a discretion into a duty. As we have always honoured the liabilities that we are talking about in the Bill, there will be no increase in the use of public funds. The practice has been to honour liabilities in the health service and that will not change. The final sentence of the financial memorandum attached to the Bill states:

> "Given that no NHS trust has so far been dissolved without its liabilities being transferred elsewhere, any additional expenditure occasioned by this Bill is likely to be negligible."

Mr. Spellar: How will this affect the concept of risk? When the Minister replied to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), he implied that risk was the danger that the provider of the building and services might fall down on the contract. That is a normal problem; that is not the question of risk that someone may fail to do the job for which they have been contracted. Risk is the danger that the market might collapse or that clients might go bust. By taking away the concept of risk even further, is not the Minister changing this from a PFI contract to an ordinary service contract, which, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey pointed out, has always been capable of being operated—whether the NHS has chosen to do so is another matter. Therefore, this is changing the nature of risk in the contracts.

Mr. Horam: As the hon. Gentleman has pointed out, real risk not only involves going over budget on the contract, but involves taking into account market risks or the ownership of a building in which clinical services are taking place. A contractor or a provider of facilities may commit themselves to a contract that lasts a number of years. What the hon. Gentleman has said is absolutely true: there are many kinds of risk in the market. In this case, the private contractor will be bearing all the normal commercial risks.

Mr. Spellar: As the Bill underwrites and acts as the client of last resort, the Secretary of State has removed that major sector of risk in this project. Someone not doing the job is an entirely different issue. Risk is the danger that clients may not be able to pay their bills. That element of risk has disappeared.

Mr. Horam: That is not so—market risk is still there. For example, in five years' time there may not be the same demand for the clinical services that are provided today by the trust or by contractor. That risk will be borne by the facilities provider. He may find that his revenue is less than he expected it to be because the clinical services are not in as much demand as was originally thought. Market risk is still there. Therefore, we are not removing any risk that is normal.

Mr. Spellar: The Government are underwriting it.

Mr. Horam: No, we are not underwriting it. What we are talking about in the Bill is the normal commercial liability. [Interruption.] No, the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) is quite wrong. Obviously, any organisation honours the liabilities that it properly enters into—that is, it fulfils the contracts that it makes. That is what the NHS has always done. However, it has been discretionary and it is right that we make what is de facto de jure to reassure the people who are involved commercially that there is no political risk. The Bill removes that element of political risk—it does not remove the normal commercial risk. I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that.

[Mr. Horam]

Mr. Spellar: I understand the answer, but I am not entirely satisfied by it. There will be long-term contracts between the hospital trusts and the providers of the services. If, for example, the contract changes between the area health authority and the trust it may lead to the trust experiencing severe difficulties, which may lead the Minister to take action to do something about the trust—to dissolve it or whatever.

Therefore, the Minister is standing behind the contract and saying that the Secretary of State will act as the guarantor of the contract. Because of the size of the contracts—the Minister says more than £10 million—they will be long-term. Therefore, the Secretary of State will be acting as the final guarantor and removing that element of market risk.

Mr. Horam: No, that is not the case—we are not removing the market risk in any way. The Bill says that a contract properly entered into will be honoured by the NHS trust or by the Secretary of State in the final analysis. That is a perfectly normal practice and it means that the NHS will not welsh on its debts. However, the market risk will still remain. I cannot continue repeating this—it is absolutely clear to me.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister further explain what political risk he is underwriting? Is it the possibility that there may be a change of Government in the not too distant future?

Mr. Horam: The hon. Gentleman is not rising to the level of the occasion. Political risk is perfectly plain: under the previous situation, the Secretary of State could walk away from his debts—that is, when a trust ceased to exist or was merged, he could decide not to honour its liabilities. He is simply saying that, in future, he will not be able to do that. That is an honourable and straightforward position. It has always been the case; it would always be the case. We are simply putting it into law.

I described that as political risk. It would be wrong for a commercial organisation to accept that political risk, because a commercial organisation is not the right body to accept that type of risk.

Mr. Galbraith: I am becoming more confused as the debate progresses.

Let us suppose that, 25 years ago, a PFI had been entered into with a health authority or trust to build a tuberculosis hospital, but that the disease was not as prevalent as it used to be and the hospital was no longer needed. Is the Minister saying that, if the hospital had been built—perhaps managed—under a PFI initiative but the trust did not want it, or if it had been agreed with the health authority but the authority did not want it, the Government would be liable to pay the necessary capital and running costs for that hospital for 25 years, even if, after five years, it was no longer needed? If so, we are building lack of flexibility and obsolescence into the system.

Mr. Horam: No, that is not the case. All the Bill does is to make what is de facto de jure, by saying that contracts properly entered into will be honoured by the Secretary of State. It is as simple as that. That is a very simple point, which I am sure that the House agrees with. I do not think that any Opposition Members—

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): He cannot want us to agree.

Mr. Horam: The hon. Lady served on the Committee and sat through three or four sittings. If she does not understand the simple point of the Bill now, I am afraid that I cannot begin to explain further.

Mr. Barron: Let us get away from the issue of political need. It is unprecedented for any Secretary of State not to meet a public sector debt, and contractors and suppliers of the national health service have been content in that knowledge for decades, so why do we have the Bill? Who insisted on it—the Secretary of State for Health or the private sector?

Mr. Horam: The hon. Gentleman knows the answer, because my right hon. Friend gave it to him on Second Reading. The hon. Gentleman has had it once; he does not need to have it repeated. In this specific case, it was unreasonable to expect the private sector to take on risk that it was not equipped to adopt. That is the simple position, and this is an extremely simple Bill, which does precisely that.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I want to clarify two last things. The Minister says that the simple and single purpose of the Bill is to prevent an agency—a part of the Department of Health—from walking away from its financial liability by dissolving itself, and that therefore the Bill will provide a guarantee that the Department of Health will pick up the tab.

How many times in the past has the Department of Health or an area health authority, regional health authority or NHS trust not paid its bills? Has it ever happened in the history of the Department of Health, since the creation of the NHS?

Mr. Horam: I am afraid that my memory does not go back quite as far as that, but, off the cuff, subject to the usual reservations, the answer is no—there has never been a case where properly entered into liabilities have not been honoured.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm) was worried about the Stonehaven example, but he should recall that, at the moment, that is still only a proposal. There are three bidders for the contract, one of which is the NHS trust. Indeed, in a sense there is no likelihood that clinical services will be privatised, because all the medical services—the core services and the wider group—will be provided in the usual NHS way. That is not yet an example of privatisation, and it may never be an example of privatisation in the way the hon. Gentleman means.

Finally, I shall reply to the points made by the hon. Member for Rother Valley and make some comments about the new clauses tabled by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden.

On scrutiny and control by Parliament of the private finance initiative and the public sector, I emphasise that there are already mechanisms for giving regular information on expenditure and liabilities to the public and Parliament. The annual estimates and appropriation accounts procedures set out clearly the way in which moneys provided by Parliament are used. The annual departmental report gives more detail to Parliament about that. Among other things, it specifies contingent liabilities, as defined in the terms of the agreements between the Government and the Public Accounts Committee.

5.45 pm

Auditors of trusts are required to confirm that the accounts give a true and fair view of the state of the trust. All borrowing within a year and loans outstanding at the end of the year are disclosed in accounts.

The Comptroller and Auditor General scrutinises and summarises the accounts of the trust sector as a whole, and lays them, with his report on them, before both Houses of Parliament. That is the conventional accounting system between Parliament and Government.

The Treasury Select Committee recently recommended, in the context of the PFI especially, that an annual report shall be prepared by the private finance panel, reporting on projects undertaken. The Committee also asked for details of the process that the Treasury plans to set up to monitor the revenue commitments of the PFI. Those two things came out of the Treasury Select Committee. I am glad to say that the Treasury has already said that it will set up a monitoring system; no doubt it will cover that in its formal response to the Treasury Select Committee.

The National Audit Office plans to conduct value for money investigations into PFI schemes. As I was a member of the Public Accounts Committee for three years, I know how searching such investigations can be; if there are any problems with the PFI, they will certainly be thrown up by those investigations.

I agree with the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden that this is a proper matter for Parliament. It is appropriate that he, as a Back Bencher, should make that proposal, because the scrutiny and control of expenditure in this way is a matter that it is certainly legitimate for Parliament to consider.

As I have shown by citing those examples, the hon. Gentleman is pushing at an open door. In future, not only will there be the traditional methods of considering Government expenditure but, as a result of the Treasury Select Committee's recommendations and what was said by the National Audit Office, new methods will be used to add to that stringent scrutiny. In those circumstances, I hope that he will agree that Parliament is moving sensibly to scrutinise and control that expenditure. I therefore believe that the hon. Gentleman's new clauses, although well-meaning, are unnecessary.

Mr. Galbraith: Having heard the Minister, I am convinced that the public finance initiative is a shambles. The more I hear about it, the more confused I become and the more I realise that I am not the only one who is confused. The Government will regret the monster that they have set running, especially in the national health service.

I return to my example of the privately funded tuberculosis hospital. I only take that as an example—obviously it is obsolete nowadays.

If a private finance initiative were to set up a hospital, in my view it would provide that hospital—the Minister also envisages that it must run the services and manage it as well because that is how it makes its money. In my view, the private company should set up the hospital and run it and say, "There you are, we will run this for you and the cost will be so much per year"—the normal yearly contracts.

However, because that would involve an element of risk for the company, it requires us to remove that risk absolutely and locks us into a contract for 25 years, to which we are committed and for which the Government will now pick up the tab irrespective of what happens. We are now locked into a contract that ensures that the private company has no risk. The wee bit of risk associated with it—never mind the delivery risk, which I did discuss—should be a usual part of business anyway. Instead, it will lock us into a contract involving no private risk.

If the company were to have risk, it would be a year-on-year contract, because that is the nature of medicine. That would be the correct thing for the health service to determine. Medicine moves swiftly. Diseases become obsolete; diseases move off. For a long time, cardiac surgery fell away because rheumatic heart disease had fallen; the complications of valvular disease were no longer around. We did not need cardiac surgery, and a number of units were closed, but then the incidence of coronary heart disease increased again—variations occur. Through the PFI, the Government have prevented us from being able to move with the variations; we are locked into a contract for a hospital that we have guaranteed and we have removed all the risks from the private sector. The Government have also shifted capital moneys into revenue account—that is how it will appear. With finesse, they have massaged the figures once again.

The Government will come to regret the provision and the comments that they have made today; their persistence will return to haunt them in future years. However, having said that, I have no wish to pursue the matter further or to divide the House. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2

TRANSFER OF RESIDUAL LIABILITIES: SCOTLAND

Mr. Barron: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 6, leave out 'ceases to exist' and insert

'is dissolved or abolished by the Secretary of State'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 16, leave out 'ceases to exist' and insert

'is dissolved or abolished by the Secretary of State'.

Mr. Barron: I do not intend to keep the House too long as the purpose of the amendment is plain. We are concerned about the meaning of the phrase "ceases to exist". In Committee, we probed the issue at some length. The Under-Secretary said then that our amendment was defective and his answers were unsatisfactory. In the light of his comments, we have reworded the amendment.

The nub of the problem is that the phrase "ceases to exist" is vague and open to misinterpretation. We are concerned that the phrase has been placed in the Bill to cover eventualities of which the House would take a dim view were they to happen. We wish to be assured about one matter in particular. If a trust could go bankrupt, or into receivership, without or before action having been taken by the Secretary of State, the House should be told about that now. If the phrase "ceases to exist" means anything other than the dissolution or the abolition of the organisations covered by the Bill, the House should be told now.

[Mr. Barron]

We recognise that the original National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, to which the Bill adds, made it appear unlikely that a health service body could cease to exist without specific action by the Secretary of State for Health. We are concerned that the organisations covered by the Bill are being treated to different phraseology from that in the originating Act. Dissolution and abolition by the Secretary of State are the ways in which trusts and health bodies cease to exist. The Bill appears to open the door to other ways in which those bodies may come to an end. The clear implication of the wording is that the health service bodies covered by the Bill may come to some sort of sticky end without the Secretary of State's approval, and that such events may not be clearly within his control, as they are under the current Act.

It is an implicit admission by Ministers that they may well lose control of private sector involvement in the health service. Profit-dominated organisations may hold sway over our health care and a private contractor's bottom line may determine the continued provision of certain local health services. If that is not the case, the Minister has plenty of opportunity tonight to give us the correct position.

I have taken legal opinions from various sources on the phrase "ceases to exist", and they have given contradictory views on the interpretation of that phrase. The Minister will recall that my colleagues and I warned him in Committee that the phrase might open the floodgates to legal challenges should the Bill's provisions ever be used. It seems that the differing legal opinions that I have obtained may reinforce that warning.

In Committee, the Minister argued that the phrase "ceases to exist" was an umbrella term, but the umbrella term already exists in law—in part IV of schedule 2 of the National Health Service and Community Care Act. That Act defines the Secretary of State's powers as being exercisable, if considered appropriate,

"in the interests of the health service."

Why, then, has the second term come into being? Perhaps the Minister would like to argue that his phrase puts in plain English the occasions on which the powers granted to the Secretary of State under the Bill may be exercised, but it is surely an extremely unusual definition of plain English that confuses, rather than clarifies, the position.

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 make the position clear. They insert in the Bill the concept that trusts and other bodies can come to an end only after the Secretary of State for Health has exercised a specified, positive powers. Our amendments suggest that "dissolved or abolished" is the term that effectively covers the exercise of those powers. That is real plain English. Both terms are well defined in the legislation and neither is open to misinterpretation by the courts.

There can be no reason to object to the amendments unless the phrase "ceases to exist" is in the Bill for some purpose other than plain English. Will the Minister assist the House by placing it on record that the Bill covers only the following eventualities: first, that a national health service trust is dissolved by the Secretary of State for Health; secondly, that a health authority or a special health authority is dissolved by the Secretary of State? If there are any other ways in which the Bill's provisions can be activated, the House must be told, and the Minister has the opportunity to do so in this debate. He must take this opportunity to assure the House that the continued day-to-day existence of national health service organisations lies with the Secretary of State and the powers invested in him through Parliament, the electorate and the British people.

If the Bill transfers risks from the private sector to the public, rather than the other way round, it already breaks the fundamental principle of the PFI. It already guarantees that the private sector will have an apparently unfettered line of credit from the public purse. Now, there is a further threat to the provision of health care and to the continued existence of the national health service, and it is no slight matter that that uncertainty is intended to be written into law.

The national health service does not need the uncertainty caused by the Bill's existing wording. The amendment helps to re-establish the principles of continuity in health service provision that we all wish to see. Sadly, continuity has not been a major feature of the Government's attitude to health care. The Secretary of State has not been backward in exercising his powers to dissolve, merge and establish trusts and, to some extent, health authorities.

There are frequent revisions to originating capital debt—given levels of interest-bearing loans and public dividend capital—as well as changes to external financing limits and various guarantees from the Secretary of State. Most of that process is designed to prop up the internal market and most of it simply adds resources to the bureaucracy at the expense of front-line patient services. Unless the Bill is amended in the way that we suggest—or by some similar wording, perhaps at a later stage in another place—that tangle of financial directives, limits and guarantees will be balanced all the more delicately against a crash.

The private sector, not the Secretary of State, will have the upper hand in determining whether a health service body crashes or survives. The Secretary of State will be giving away his ability to act positively, by abolition or dissolution, and will be left with no other duty than to pay off the debts and pick up the pieces.

It is a disgrace that the Bill has been introduced in order to prop up the PFI and to avoid answering major questions about the future of the national health service and its bodies. We seek a coherent definition of the circumstances in which the Government envisage using the powers that the Secretary of State proposes to take. The phrase "ceases to exist" does not provide any such clarity or assurance. Our amendments Nos. 1 and 2 are far superior, and I urge the Minister to look upon them favourably.

6 pm

Mr. Horam: I agree with the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on this occasion. I do not think that there is any difference between the two sides about the matter and I can give him the assurance that he seeks.

All NHS bodies covered by the Bill are creatures of statute: they can be established and can cease to exist only by statutory procedure. The existing NHS Acts listed in the notes on clauses to the Bill provide the means by which those bodies can cease to exist. There is no other way, short of an Act of Parliament—which would come before the House—that they can do that.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether an NHS trust could go into receivership. That cannot happen—as a statutory body, insolvency legislation does not apply to an NHS trust. It can cease to exist only by the statutory procedure that involves the House. Therefore, I give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks: there is no other way in which such bodies can cease to exist, and we do not seek to enlarge that process.

I assure him that we mean nothing sinister by using that phraseology. It is a matter of semantics and of using what we believe to be plain English. If the hon. Gentleman's measures were adopted, wherever the phrase "cease to exist" appeared in the Bill, it would be replaced with "dissolved", "abolished" or "revoke the establishment order of". That is quite a mouthful. We are on common ground in talking about simple, straightforward terms that cannot be misinterpreted in law. I repeat that they are statutory bodies that can cease to exist, only by statutory procedure.

Mr. Barron: It is a great pity that the Minister did not provide that explanation when we discussed the amendment in Committee. He did not explain his position as succinctly as that then. I am sure that the House will be reassured by his comments. We will not argue over the Dispatch Box about what constitutes plain English. The Opposition and the people of this country—who dearly love the national health service—want to be clear that major decisions about local health services will be taken by the Secretary of State for Health and not in a banker's office or anywhere else in the City. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

6.2 pm

Mr. Horam: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Treasury Committee's verdict on the private finance initiative is that it is an imaginative and laudable innovation. It will bring forward the rebuilding and re-equipment of our major hospitals on a scale hitherto believed impossible. The last two projects that we announced—Swindon, which would have cost £90 million, and Norwich, which would have cost £170 million—will probably be built five years earlier than anticipated.

Mr. Barron: That is outrageous.

Mr. Horam: No, it is perfectly true, and I shall explain why. Until now, all schemes—however good and in spite of the approval of trusts, health authorities and Ministers—have had to wait in a queue for money. There was one turnstile and the Treasury controlled it. It had a monopoly on the supply of capital funds. Under the PFI, there will be any number of turnstiles and any number of competitive suppliers of finance—there will be no, or certainly shorter, queues. If a scheme is affordable and represents good value for money, it will go ahead. That has not occurred in the past, and clearly more schemes will now come forward.

As the House knows, in the past 10 years only one scheme worth more than £25 million went ahead each year—which is still better than the last Labour Government's record. Now, no fewer than 25 schemes, each worth more than £25 million, will go forward. If even half of those schemes are completed—I suspect that we shall complete more than that—other much desired projects will come forward at a much faster rate.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose—

Mr. Horam: No, I shall not give way. I have given way to the hon. Gentleman several times today.

More hospitals will be built, and they will be built better. It is no longer a matter of build and forget. The private sector will not only build the hospitals but be responsible for their on-going maintenance. That will provide the incentive to build them well and thus minimise maintenance costs—which is a good thing.

As the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) said, hospitals will be built more flexibly. Ownership of hospitals in the private sector will provide the incentive to ensure that they do not become white elephants within 10 years. Hospitals will be built using flexible designs that can be adapted to new uses as clinical measures develop. For example, the new Jimmy's hospital in Leeds is being built in such a way that it can be used for other purposes. There will be better hospital designs. I recently attended a conference of the Royal Institute of British Architects and architects' enthusiasm for the new design culture that we are bringing to the health service was evident. That is very heartening.

There will be less risk for the public sector. As I have said during today's debate, the risk to the private sector will increase because it will bear the burden of commercial risk which is borne by the taxpayer at present. For example, the taxpayer had to meet the cost overruns associated with the building of the Chelsea and Westminster hospital. The public and private sectors will be in partnership, a partnership that we encourage. The Opposition claim that they also support such a partnership—although they do not seem to do so in this case.

The national health service will have the opportunity to concentrate on what it does best: provide clinical services free at the point of use. It will determine its own priorities in its own way. Therefore, the NHS will be able to realise its ambitions for providing better patient care—which is ultimately what it is all about. The Bill helps the PFI to succeed. I recommend it to the House and I urge hon. Members to support it.

6.6 pm

Mr. Barron: The Bill has only one purpose: it is an attempt to breathe life back into the Government's failed private finance initiative in the health service.

[Mr. Barron]

Hon. Members and the general public know that, in its current form, the health service PFI is little more than an attempt at privatising the NHS by the back door. The Bill is an attempt to revive the privatisation of the health service which has been rejected categorically by clinicians, most NHS staff, patients and, increasingly, the private sector.

In general terms, we know that the private finance initiative is being used not as a supplement to, but as a replacement for, public provision. Opposition Members have argued consistently that, if the PFI has a role to play, it is in supplementing the existing Government capital expenditure budget for the national health service. We know that the PFI is a twisted and a distorted attempt to mirror the properly thought-out joint partnerships between the public and private sectors which have been suggested by the Opposition.

In health terms, Ministers have tried desperately to kick-start the PFI as the Government's years of neglect of the national health service have come home to roost. The Bill is the result of that. Ministers know that, in the period before the general election, they need to show the voters that foundations are being dug and bricks are being laid and that alleged new hospital projects are under way. We heard that again from the Minister tonight.

The groundwork has already been done, but only in the minds of Ministers. Successive Ministers have been announcing for years the same so-called new hospitals, yet not a single brick has been laid. In his speech tonight, the Minister had the audacity to mention Norwich and say that the new hospital that is badly needed will be built five years ahead of plans because of the private finance initiative.

Let us look at the truth about Norwich. The former Secretary of State for Health, now the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was first off the starting blocks when he announced the go-ahead for a new £100 million hospital in Norwich. That was in 1990. On 3 April this year, the current Health Secretary announced that he had "given the go-ahead today" for a new hospital in Norwich.

Mr. Henry McLeish (Fife, Central): Perhaps there will be two hospitals.

Mr. Barron: Two hospitals may have been promised, but no bricks have been laid on any of the sites. The second audacious announcement was made when we debated the Bill on Second Reading.

In December 1993, the then Secretary of State announced that he had approved a project to replace the Princess Margaret hospital in Swindon. On 3 April this year, the current Secretary of State issued another press release headed "Approval announced . . . for Swindon hospital". Health Ministers constantly claim to be building hospitals, but those hospitals exist only in their minds. Norwich and Swindon are just two examples of the cynical ploys that Ministers adopt in their efforts to look good on health matters.

Will the Minister tell us whether the latest announcements promising new hospitals will ever materialise? Perhaps he will tell us the difference between his assurances today and, for example, that given by the former Secretary for Health about Norwich, that "construction is expected to start in 1992."

That year might ring a bell with hon. Members, as it was an election year.

Will the Minister and the Secretary of State be promising that the construction of the new hospitals that they have promised will start in the next 12 months—in advance of the next general election? Who does he expect will believe him? Multiple announcements of so-called new hospitals do not treat patients. Press releases are not pain relievers, however much Ministers would like to think otherwise.

The Bill shows that Ministers will go to any lengths in their attempts to persuade the electorate that theirs is a caring Government, but the electorate and the House know that that is not so. The Bill breaks the most basic principles of the PFI. It opens up the possibility of the private sector closing down parts of the health service to further profitability. It denies Parliament a proper role in scrutiny and removes any notion of accountability.

The basic principles of the PFI are unequivocally stated in a NHS executive letter of 20 March 1995, which states:

"A fundamental principle of the PFI is transfer of risk to the private sector."

The Bill does exactly the opposite. It commits the Secretary of State to guaranteeing totally and absolutely all the risks that are supposedly transferred to the private sector. It removes not one risk from central Government, yet it gives central Government virtually no role in assessing the risks that they have assumed.

It is universally acknowledged, even by the Secretary of State, that private sector services cost more than public sector ones. The right hon. Gentleman said that in his speech to the Royal College of Physicians. In the same speech he said:

"I am strongly in favour of testing public and private sector solutions and adopting the approach which offers best values."

I am asking the Minister to consider two identical projects. In each case, the risk falls entirely on Government, but the capital costs of one are more expensive. A normal, right-thinking person would choose the cheaper alternative, but the Bill creates circumstances in which the only possible option will be the more expensive one—the private sector project. Perhaps the Minister will explain the logic that he uses to conclude that that is the best possible future for the health service.

How can there be any justification for spending more money on the PFI alternative when it produces no benefit in terms of reduced risk? Clearly, there is no justification, unless, as we all suspect and Ministers occasionally let slip, PFI is a step on the road to the privatisation of our national health service and the Bill is designed to ease that route.

Already, the road to the NHS privatisation is clear. First, the Government starve a service of funds. The national health service capital programme has been cut by nearly 20 per cent. Secondly, pressure is applied to consider alternatives. All trusts have had to go through the entire process of testing major projects against private sector finance, regardless of the urgency of those projects. Thirdly, the pressure is racked up. In health, the fine line is continually blurred between what may or may not be possible targets for market testing, contracting out and privatisation.

On Second Reading, I complained that the Secretary of State had not responded to my letter of mid-February asking him to identify those services that would be exempt from PFI. I had the opportunity to ask the same question in Committee, as it is important that we are clear about the scope of the PFI. The reason for that is illustrated by what my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) said about the hospital in Scotland where everything is being put out to tender. Although the Minister's defence seemed to be that one of the three bids being considered was from the NHS, we understand that every service is being put out to tender.

The Secretary of State is still reluctant to define clinical services. He knows that he has promised to protect such services from privatisation, but he does not want to do that. He knows that, if he has to list which services are clinical, he will be limiting the scope of privatisation. That would place question marks over the bids for Stonehaven hospital.

When an answer to my letter finally arrived—unfortunately, the day after the Committee stage had ended—it was not particularly helpful. The Secretary of State wrote:

"The requirement to include clinical support services as part of the testing of the PFI options are matters for local determination and cannot be decided without the support of local clinicians."

What can local clinicians hope to make of the Government's attitude? How can they hope to work within boundaries that the Secretary of State has blurred almost beyond distinction?

The Bill is being proposed to smooth the jangling nerves of potential PFI contractors. The Government hope that more of them will propose new PFI projets in the health service. However, about a fortnight ago the Financial Secretary to the Treasury told us on "Newsnight" that the PFI will replace public expenditure.

The blurring of choices means that local clinicians and other health service professionals are faced with a stark choice—private money or no money. One way to guarantee that a clinician will ultimately agree to the PFI is to starve him of funds to improve the services that he wants to give his patients. That is how it is being achieved; it is driven by withholding from clinicians the vital investment that they need to improve health care. It is a pity that the Secretary of State is not here, but I must tell him and the Minister that that is not the way to treat health professionals or issues of public health. I call on the Minister this evening to list all the clinical and clinical support services that he can guarantee will be free from the risk of privatisation.

The Government are driving towards privatising the NHS, and are stepping up the pressure to achieve their aims. The Bill makes matters worse. It is not just this Bill that is adding to the Government's PFI woes. The private sector is getting increasingly annoyed about it, despite all the concessions that the Secretary of State is prepared to offer it. Earlier today, the Minister said that the Treasury was involved in the PFI. John Laing Construction was recently reported in the Financial Times as having described the PFI regime as "farcical and leading to growing frustration among contract bidders".

Laing is one of the leading bidders for health schemes, so its opinion must be taken seriously.

Martin Laing, the company chairman, said that there is "virtually no chance" of PFI targets being met

"unless there is a really big shake-up in the way the Government handles PFI projects".

Another PFI specialist, a City banker, is quoted in the same report as saying that the PFI needs "to overcome the inertia and lack of expertise that reign supreme in most departments".

We already know that the public do not trust the Government on the PFI, and that clinicians and health service staff do not either. It now transpires that even the private sector does not trust the Government on the PFI.

The Secretary of State will have big problems if he intends to put all his NHS eggs in the PFI basket—but that is what he is doing. He is betting everything on the Bill and on its option of guaranteeing liabilities over which he has no control. The Bill solves none of the problems of the PFI and probably creates a whole new set of its own.

Still, I have little doubt that this Secretary of State will eventually get his way and that the Bill will be passed. After it has been railroaded through the House, he will be able to go back to the private sector contractors who demanded the Bill and tell them that it is safely through and that the Secretary of State has underwritten the risks that most people thought went with the contracts. I only hope for the right hon. Gentleman's sake that the contractors do not come back to him with yet another problem to solve. If and when they do, I hope that he will not cave in to them as easily as he did with this Bill.

The House deserves a better explanation of a Bill than the one we were given on Second Reading. It was disgraceful of the Government to talk about technicalities without telling us the public expenditure implications.

The next problem may arise in the context of information technology. The Department is already creating a shambles because of its unwillingness to get a grip on strategic provision. The recent trauma over hospital information support systems was just the latest in a long line of failures. Now we hear that the entire PFI growth area of information technology is under threat from the VAT man. PFI-led IT projects may turn out to be not just more risky and expensive than publicly funded alternatives: they may have an extra 17.5 per cent. VAT dropped on the final invoice too.

Many of the projects that the Minister has said are in train at the moment include small information technology units. Now there is a debate between the Treasury and the Inland Revenue about whether, as they will not be owned by the trusts, they ought to attract VAT. Ludicrously, the Government consistently say that they are in control of the PFI, but as soon as people are ready to sign contracts, all of a sudden 17.5 per cent. VAT is dropped on them. How can anyone have faith that the Government know what they are doing?

Perhaps, as the Secretary of State has already gerrymandered the PFI rules once, there will be another sweetheart deal for the private sector in health. Perhaps he will siphon off more NHS money to pay the contractors' VAT bills. The Opposition will not let this issue go away. It may be deemed the concern of the Treasury, but it affects public health, and we shall ensure that the matter is not dropped. I only hope that the Government will introduce some coherence to what is happening with information technology under the PFI.

[Mr. Barron]

We are witnessing a long slide into confusion—a slide that the Minister cannot control, because the Bill gives him few or no powers, except to accept the consequences. The Minister has started down a slippery slope that may cost taxpayers billions of pounds, and there may be no end to the slope. The Bill represents a fundamental error of judgment. The Minister has been weak when a secure future for the health service required him to be strong. He has pandered to the private sector instead of supporting the best interests of Britain's health care.

The Bill offer gilt-edged returns to the private sector but does nothing for patients, nurses, doctors or health care. It merely bails out the Government's drive to privatise the health service. The Bill offers Parliament no openness, no accountability and no scrutiny. Contracts for up to 70 years will be signed—70 years of private sector risk but no parliamentary say in the matter. Who in his right mind, looking at developments in the NHS of the past decade, would allow that to happen? We are signing up to 70 years of public liability without a debate in the House on the daily innovations in the health service aimed at improving it.

There will be up to £5 billion in liabilities, and no parliamentary say in how or why they are incurred, and no chance to hold the Secretary of State to account for bailing out the private sector and, effectively, privatising the NHS.

The Bill is ill thought out and—I hope that I am wrong—the public purse and the people who need health care may find themselves paying for the Government's folly for many years to come.

6.26 pm

Mr. Galbraith: On Second Reading, I was prepared to give the private finance initiative in the NHS a fair wind and some consideration, but having sat through most of the Bill's stages I am now convinced that it is wrong. What has emerged from my confusion—Conservative Members may be confused as well—is that this is being done for short-term financial reasons while building in long-term liabilities. We are converting capital expenditure to revenue that will be with us for a number of years, and future Governments and generations will have to pick up the tab.

The PFI has other consequences too. Having heard the Minister, I am convinced that what is involved is a distortion of service provision within the NHS. I return to the idea of the hospital in my area becoming obsolete. In order to remove risk from the private sector, long-term contracts will be awarded whether or not the facility is needed. To avoid its becoming a white elephant with unoccupied wards and beds, NHS facilities that may be better prepared and more suited to people's needs will have to be closed so that the hospital built with PFI money can be used. This represents a drift, once again, away from a more effective and efficient NHS towards the private sector—one of the major problems associated with the PFI.

It is also clear from what the Minister said that the PFI will not be involved only in building and leasing buildings. He mentioned maintenance and the provision of services. After all, they are the only way in which money can be made in such ventures. The Skye bridge is a case in point; once it was built, it had to be run and charged for at rates higher than those charged by the ferry. The risks had to be removed from the private sector by locking into a long-term contract to enable it to recover its expenses. The Skye bridge was built only when the Government gave an undertaking that the profitable public sector ferry would cease to run, so as not to be in competition with the bridge. Within the national health service, public sectors will be closed to maintain the PFI project.

It serves no purpose for the Minister to maintain that clinical services will not be affected. It is clear that they will be an integral part of the PFI. Stonehaven is a classic example. We know that everything is up for grabs at Stonehaven. That is part of the Government's philosophy. That is the trend and that is the way in which the Government see the NHS continuing. The cat was let out of the bag by Duncan Nichol.

Mr. Bayley: The position has been made clear by the Secretary of State. On 21 November 1995, he spoke to the Royal College of Physicians. During his address, he said:

"Some Trusts have explored local arrangements for private sector provision of some clinical and clinical support services. That is a matter for local determination."

The right hon. Gentleman is sanctioning precisely what my hon. Friend fears.

Mr. Galbraith: I fully agree with my hon. Friend.

I mentioned Duncan Nichol, the former chief executive, who is responsible for the shambles within the NHS. He now works in the private sector with BUPA. In effect, he says, "It does not matter who provides the service. The issue is what charge is made when the service is delivered." The Government no longer talk about services being free at the time of need; they talk instead of services being free at the time of delivery—in other words, they are saying, "Although you need them you might not get them, except those that we decide to deliver."

The shift towards privatising clinical services and allowing individuals to have those services paid for by others will soon mean that individuals will have to take out private insurance. That will take us fully down the line of a privatised health service. That is part of the purpose behind the Bill. The Bill is not merely a short-term fix to overcome under-investment over the years by shifting moneys from capital to revenue. It is part of a long-term plan, the final aim of which is to have a fully privatised health service in terms of delivery and charges.

The Minister has argued that it will be much quicker under the PFI to have hospitals built. According to Douglas Watson, the head of structured finance at the Clydesdale bank, who wrote in the Scottish Business Insider of March 1995,

"putting together PFI projects is slow and time consuming and far from speeding things up, some projects may actually have been delayed by putting them out under the PFI."

The myth that the Government peddle does not accord with reality.

Another myth is that the PFI will make projects cheaper. That is not so; costs will merely be deferred over a period of years, leaving others to pick up the tab. It is known that the cost to a trust of establishing a PFI to build a hospital is probably increased by 3 to 5 per cent. The Edinburgh royal infirmary project is an example. Expenditure will be increased, because of the PFI, by between £4.2 million and £7 million. That extra expenditure would not have been incurred under the normal arrangements. In addition, there is the high return demanded by venture capital of between 8 and 10 per cent. These are the increased costs that are incurred by use of the PFI.

We shall have a system in which we shall allow private finance to obtain substantial profits from the health service. There will be no risk. There will not even be the normal business risk. We shall build in obsolescence within the health service. We shall distort our clinical services, we shall further delay projects and we shall increase costs. What an indictment on the Government. In addition to the bureaucracy that they have enforced on us over the years, they want to charge us more. It is no wonder that I and, I hope, many of my right hon. and hon. Friends think that the PFI is a shambles. It is inherently wrong politically and financially unsound. We should have nothing to do with it.

6.35 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: Before us is a short Bill and a big subject. No one disagrees fundamentally with the principle that the national health service should not leave others singing for their money. At the same time, no one has subscribed in a democratic way to the principle that we should build capital projects within the NHS in a new way, which effectively means building by the private sector. That is why the Minister has run into a squall and some difficulty.

The Conservative party's manifesto did not refer to capital projects within the NHS being undertaken by the private sector. The Government never stated in a Queen's Speech that they intended to go to the private sector for the building of hospitals. Instead, they have proceeded by stealth. The health service has suddenly discovered, through the Government's actions, little by little, project by project, idea by idea, press release by press release, and guidance of slightly more than a year ago, that it will have to enter into a greater partnership with the private sector, as have other sectors.

The move may be a good idea. There is nothing theologically wrong with the private sector being used to provide buildings or services. However, the case has never been made, and authority has never been given to the Government. My colleagues and I—indeed, Parliament—have never agreed to move from a system whereby the public purse finances NHS buildings and services to one that admits private sector finance. Such a change in system has never come before us as a proposition, and consequently there has never been a majority vote in the House.

The change of system has never been subscribed to even by the Conservative party, let alone on a cross-party basis. We should not change the capital funding of the health service by means of spatchcocked, belated Bills that are put together to close loopholes, without addressing the issues head on.

There is objection because the NHS is less democratic now than at any time since its creation. The Secretary of State is accountable to Parliament, but, as we well know—Ministers make no bones about it—when he answers detailed questions, he almost always says, "I don't know the answer, so ask the local trust." Alternatively, he will say, "I don't know the answer, so ask the local health authority." He may also say, "The figures are not kept centrally."

Trusts and health authorities are less democratic now than ever before. Members of trusts are appointed entirely by Secretaries of State. They meet in secret and make their decisions in secret. They cannot be part of a democratically elected health service. It is not that they want to be secret. I understand that the official policy of the National Association of Health Authorities and Trusts is that the authorities and trusts are happy to meet in public. It is not they who are blocking the system. Instead, the Government are refusing openness.

The management of the health service would have far more credibility if it were democratic, open and accountable. For as long as hospitals are managed, along with all other parts of the health service, behind closed doors by people appointed by the Secretary of State, who decide what they shall be paid in private, there will not be public confidence.

We are therefore even more dubious—not surprisingly—about going down this road if there cannot be any public participation. None of us pretends that the health service's previous structure was wonderfully, democratically accountable—of course it was not—but at least the majority of health authority meetings were open to the public, at least the health authority took the decisions, not just about commissioning, but about the running of services, and at least some democratically elected people sat on health authorities.

All that is out of the window. Regional health authorities have gone. They have been replaced by civil servants. Therefore, there is an undemocratic and unaccountable health service. That is not sustainable. Whether the Minister's party are again in government in the near future, or whether colleagues in the Labour Front-Bench team are in government, the one thing that both parties must do—the Labour party has not done it nearly adequately enough yet—is to ensure that we have a democratic health service structure, in which the public can choose the people who run the service locally and the public can get rid of them when they do not like them. We must see that happening in the open.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I agree with him about secrecy in the management of the national health service generally, but, specifically on the Bill, there will be secrecy in the relation to the PFI contracts that are entered into, some of which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) said, can go on for 70 years and incur NHS and taxpayers' money.

In Committee, the Minister refused to give a commitment that that procedure would be opened out before the contracts were signed, perhaps even with the community health councils being consulted. Does the hon. Member not think that it is appalling that that secrecy in the signing of such contracts could cost the NHS and taxpayers a great deal of money?

Mr. Hughes: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The public might be concerned about all sorts of issues.

[Mr. Hughes]

They might, for example, not want a contract to be placed with a particular private sector contractor because of its investment policy, because it does not have ethical investment, or because it supports a drugs company that has an unsatisfactory record—there are all sorts of reasons. The public are carved out of that.

The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I that, in the public service, the more secretive financial contracts are, the more likely it is that bad practice or corruption will take place and all the rest of it. The same contracts are given to friends and to the people who happen to be part of the service, however well one tries to regulate it. I agree with him that that is a real worry.

That links to my third point. Let us not be naive about this. The reason why the Government are going helter-skelter down the road marked "PFI"—any Government might be in this position—is that the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are saying, "We must cut and hold down public expenditure, so we must look for other ways of financing public projects."

The public's demand for public projects is going up. They are not saying, "We don't want more health services or public education," but, "We do want more health services and public education." The Government are therefore asking how they can find the money without raising taxes. Some of us subscribe to the view that a decent taxation level for people who can afford to pay is a prerequisite of a civilised society, as well as a fair and equitable distribution of wealth.

It will not surprise me if the next election is fought on this issue: should people who can afford to do so pay a decent level of taxes, and should people who earn an enormous amount of money pay an enormous amount of taxes? There appears to be a general, growing timorousness among hon. Members in the two largest parties about asking anyone to pay anything for anything. I am worried about that. That does not meet the public mood.

The public do not want Government and public services to waste their money, but they are willing to pay fair taxes if they know that the money is going towards decent public services. They are willing to pay for the health service and education, so long as the money goes on the health service and education.

If, at the next election, the Tory party says, "We are the tax-cutting party"—although no one believes it about that—and if the Labour party says, "No, we're going to be as good at tax-cutting as the Tory party"—I do not think that people will believe that either—I hope that some of us will go on saying, "You can't have decent public services supported only by cutting taxes."

There are short-term political pressures. I understand them and we should acknowledge them, but the foolishness is that, as the Treasury Select Committee makes clear—this is the fourth point—there is no guarantee that one achieves better value for money through the PFI. On the short section on the PFI in health, the Select Committee, to which the Government have not responded, gives warnings that the PFI may not provide the best value for money. First:

"The concern is that capital spending in health will be cut on the basis of expected PFI investment that has yet to materialise."

By the Chancellor's own admission, such spending is being cut, and we do not yet have a guarantee that the PFI will materialise. Secondly:

"A further criticism of PFI is that in some circumstances it has delayed rather than encouraged investment."

True—that is what we are all being told in our constituencies. Thirdly:

"This raises the concern that the ability of the Trust to plan effectively the provision of its services could be lost as decisions will be determined by the method of funding rather than an objective assessment of need."

That is very worrying. It will be a bit like the decision that led to the Jubilee line extension being built: a particular project will be built because it is the one for which the most funding can be secured rather than the one that patients need most.

Fourthly—this point was made by the hon. Members for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) and for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith)—in the view of the Select Committee and the Department of Health:

"clinical services should not be provided under the PFI."

They are as explicit about that as they can be, yet it is clear that clinical services are being provided under the PFI.

Lastly, the consequence is that

"PFI was forcing it"—

the trust—

"to introduce a false split between 'clinical' and 'non-clinical' services which, hitherto, had been successively provided together, in some cases by the same people."

We know the score: under the PFI, one contracts now, but pays later. The probability is that it will be no cheaper, and it may be more expensive. I will not go to the wall for saying that it will be, but it may be. All I say is that, until the Government—any Government—have the approval of the people and of Parliament to change the basis of the health service's funding, they should not do it.

We understand the logic of this little Bill, but that will be opposed tonight; that is why the Minister had better be careful that his Department does not go down this road so quickly that, throughout the country, it finds itself in a series of muddles, with the public increasingly dissatisfied about contracts that they think should never have been entered into.

6.47 pm

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): I have raised before the question of the Cheviot and Wansbeck NHS trust's Ashington hospital in my constituency. The other week, the trust met in secret to decide on phase two of the hospital, phase one of which has been open only about two or three years. The trust has been trying to get phase two off the ground.

Two weeks after it became a trust, it announced that it was £2 million in debt. We have discussed that on the Floor of the House. This time, however, the trust has decided that, to get phase two off the ground, it will put all non-clinical services out to tender. About 40 per cent. of the hospital will be privatised if it goes down that route. It has not made a final decision, but I understand that it is testing the water with tenders from private entrepreneurs.

It makes no difference what the Government say. I remember that, not long ago, they said that the health service was safe in their hands. I do not know what they meant by that. If they meant that it was safe in their hands because they were going to privatise it, that was fair comment.

There is no doubt that this is a back-door method of privatisation by the Tories, as has been mentioned. I cannot understand why they are doing it, because public opinion does not want it. I expected that they would try to make themselves popular before the elections, but they are making themselves unpopular.

My local newspaper, The Journal, mounted a campaign against non-clinical services being privatised, and against the Bill. It was surprising for that newspaper to have a go at a Tory Government. Coming up to a general election, the Government should want to be popular. One opinion poll after another has shown that people do not want the health service to be privatised; but hospitals are being pushed into corners because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley has said, their money has been savagely cut by the Government, and they are being forced into privatising non-clinical services—40 per cent. in the case of Wansbeck.

It is a disgrace that people do not have a say about privatisation. It is done by the back door, and it is time the Government stopped it. The Cheviot and Wansbeck trust has not yet decided, but it wants to test the water. I say to it, "Don't. Wait until Labour comes to power, and we will sort you out our way. Don't go down the Tory route. Labour will get phase 2 for Wansbeck."

6.50 pm

Ms Hilary Armstrong (North–West Durham): I am grateful for this opportunity to take part in the debate. I shall try to take the Minister back to his previous incarnation in the House, when he represented a constituency that was known as Gateshead, West. At that time, he represented the Labour party. I am sure that he may have tried to wipe out all memory of that. Part of the western boundary of that constituency must have edged on to bits of my constituency, which is large.

Shotley Bridge hospital, which I am sure the Minister knew in those days, certainly services the Derwentside part and some of the area on the northern banks of the Tyne. That hospital is now part of North Durham health trust, and the Government approved the building of a new hospital that would eventually link Dryburn hospital and Shotley Bridge hospital. Against my advice, the chosen site for that is Dryburn, and my constituents were promised that, when Shotley Bridge hospital was closed as a district general hospital, other good hospital functions would move to Shotley Bridge.

I do not want to go into my concerns about the process, but local GPs have come up with a good scheme for the development of Shotley Bridge. All this hinges on promises to my constituents about what would happen to the new hospital at Dryburn. It was approved over two years ago, before the Government had thought of the private finance initiative.

My complaint about the Government is that they have demonstrated time and again that they do not know what they are doing with the PFI. The Minister said that it would mean less risk to the public sector. That may be true in terms of the Government's overrunning and over-borrowing, which have led to the PSBR being much higher than anyone ever imagined, but it will not mean less risk for the public or for my constituents and their health care.

They are suffering enormously because of the Government's dithering, indecision and lack of understanding about what they were entering into when they told the trust that it had to go down the PFI route. That has delayed the new hospital at Dryburn, and, what is worse, it is now threatening any development at Shotley Bridge.

Last weekend, because the trust had overspent in the acute areas, it closed five wards in Shotley Bridge hospital. That is totally counter to all the promises it gave to my constituents and me about the way in which the amalgamation of the two hospitals would proceed.

Staff morale is at rock bottom, and constituents are angry, because they never wanted to lose their hospital, as the Minister will know if he remembers his previous incarnation. Instead of going to Shotley Bridge, people from the top of the Tyne valley and Weardale will have to travel about 30 miles to Dryburn. The accident and emergency service was closed before the commitments were given, and that was out of line with earlier commitments.

Far from the public being reassured, the Government's actions are a betrayal of the people of north-west Durham and of Derwentside. The Bill has been presented because the Government have made such a mess. If the PFI was working, the Bill would not be before us. If there was confidence, if people thought that the Government knew what they were doing, there would be no need for it. The Government try to tell us that the Bill will put into law what has always been happening, but the reality is that nobody knows the practice, because the PFI procedure has not been tried before.

The Government do not know the nature of the contracts, because the people who draw them up are not publicly accountable. The Minister said that we have to respect commercial confidentiality. He is asking us to agree that the services and their nature and delivery for the next 25 years will be secret. How on earth can we justify that in the public sector? By all means we should work with the private sector to get money to support the public sector, but when that is done in a way that betrays and breaks the trust between the public and their health service, it will fail dismally.

I beg the Minister to reassess what is going on. My constituents face the worst of all worlds: every promise made to them by the trust and by previous Ministers will have been broken. It is their health service and their hospital. What we have worked out together, and the GPs' plan for a GP-led community hospital, are now in jeopardy because of the overspending of the acute trust and because of anxiety to get the PFI right. The rest of health care and support is likely to disappear, and that will mean that the acute service will not be able to meet the needs of my constituents.

The other half of my constituency is served by Bishop Auckland hospital. As hon. Members will know, we were promised months ago that the PFI in that hospital would be the first to be announced by the Secretary of State. That did not materialise, and I heard worrying rumours this week about the PFI crumbling in Bishop Auckland. That will leave half my constituents with no hospital, and some of them will have to travel nearly 40 miles to get to one. That is a disgrace.

[Ms Hilary Armstrong]

It is about time the Minister shook himself out of his complacency and recognised that, when we debate people and health, we must discuss the public need for health care, and not his Government's incompetent management of the PSBR.

6.57 pm

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): The Government have presented the Bill because they feared that they could not get PFI schemes off the ground in the health service, as the banks and other private sector organisations would not enter into liabilities which they were not sure would be picked up by trusts that might not exist in 20—or, indeed, 70—years from now.

The Secretary of State for Health told the Select Committee on the Treasury about a lacuna in the legislation. That was his word, not mine, and I was not sure what "lacuna" meant, until I looked it up in the dictionary. The Secretary of State obviously uses the word frequently to describe his problems.

He said that the problem had been around since the 1940s, and that it was everyone's responsibility. That is not true, because in the past, borrowing for the public funding of projects in the health service has meant that trusts and hospital boards have not had any difficulties. The PFI scheme has raised difficulties because of the different way in which such schemes are entered into compared with borrowing through the old mechanisms.

To underline that point, while we finally got it out of Secretary of State in the Treasury Select Committee that trusts are free to borrow, he went on to say that they are not free to pledge assets. That is why there has not been such a problem in that past. By and large, financial organisations have been willing to lend to trusts only if the loans are backed by the security of the property on which they are lending. That security has always depended on the say-so of the Secretary of State. That is the fundamental difference, and the reason for the Bill. It shows that a control mechanism exists for borrowing through the traditional route that is not there for borrowing through the PFI.

While the Government hope that the obstacle will be removed to allow projects to go ahead, in fact the system presents obstacles all over the place to the setting up and construction of new hospitals and additions to hospitals. Much administrative time is spent on comparisons between PFI and public schemes.

Ask the chief executive of Royal Hallamshire hospital, Sheffield about what happens. He got the go-ahead for its Stone Grove project to replace a rundown mother-and-baby and gynaecological service in 1993. Not only has not a single brick been laid—not even an accountant's pen has been put to a contract for the scheme, because it is still being assessed three years after the original project was given the go-ahead.

If the PFI is cheaper, we must ask why. Again, evidence to the Treasury Select Committee showed that interest charges on private borrowing are 2 to 4 per cent. higher. The Government talk about risk transfer, but if the private sector takes on the risk, it will want the public sector to pay for it. That is right. It will want its risks in the project covered.

The Government will not tackle my worry that any savings from private sector projects will be produced in the same way as they have been with compulsory competitive tendering in local government, where 70 per cent. of savings result from cuts in wages and conditions of the lowest paid workers. That is why cleaning, building maintenance and management and other such activities will be part of the projects. The Government can deny that if they want, but that is the evidence from the Audit Commission on CCT in local government. I fear that the same savings will be made and be called efficiency savings, when they are cuts in pay and conditions.

The Government say that, if private sector funding is cheaper, we should go down that route, but there is a question mark over what would happen if public funding were cheaper. Is the public funding there? Royal Hallamshire hospital has asked me what would happen if its assessment showed that the public sector was cheaper.

There is no guarantee—the hospital thought there was, but it is beginning to change its mind—that there will be public sector funding, because the Government cut £2 billion from the budget estimates for capital infrastructure projects in November last year. A large amount of that £2 billion was taken from the health service. Even if the public sector route was cheaper, the hospital may not be built, because there would be no public funding. It is like a football match where the rules allow only one goal for a side to score in. Only one side could win. The Government have not tackled that.

It comes back to the fact that the Government have retreated from their initial position that the PFI means additional rather than substitutional spending. The game was given away by the Financial Secretary, when, in his final muddled words to the Treasury Select Committee, he said that the money was additional at the time that it was spent. In other words, PFI money is additional to the Government's £2 billion cut. Those are weasel words to disguise what they are doing.

From the delays in bureaucracy, it is clear that there are no controls over the system. It was accepted that there is no control system in the Treasury or Departments. There is only voluntary registration by trusts of schemes into which they have entered. That is not an effective control mechanism for money that has been committed for 70 years—or for most schemes, 20 or 30 years—into the future.

The Minister said in an earlier debate that the PFI would be controlled by the external financing limit, but that is not true. It is true for publicly funded projects, because the capital charges are up front in the first year in which they are committed. They are not in PFI schemes, which involve charging for the provision of a service or the design or construction of a building over the years in which the service is delivered.

Often, when the commitment is made to enter into the contract, there is almost no expenditure in the first two or three years. In the years for which there is an EFL agreed by the House and promoted by the Government, there is no commitment. The commitment is made for years when there is no agreed EFL. It does not act as an effective control and monitoring mechanism. I should like the Minister to reply on that. He made that comment in a previous debate, but the controls are not there. We are committing money for years ahead, without democratic control or accountability.

There is a different sort of control over borrowing, in that organisations are usually prepared to lend only where there is a guarantee against a building. Trusts cannot at present pledge assets against borrowing. That control mechanism may not be very effective, but it is better than anything that exists for the PFI projects that the Government promote.

Sir Christopher Bland, the new chairman of the Private Finance Panel, admitted in evidence to the Treasury Select Committee that there was a built-in incentive to use the PFI route precisely because there are no financial control mechanisms in the first two or three years. There is no disincentive to use that route, because there is no control of over-expenditure in those years.

There are delays and lack of controls, and no additional funding is being provided, but in some ways the most serious problem is the impact on the choice of schemes that will go ahead. Because there is no guarantee of public funding to underpin the schemes, and because of the incentive to use the PFI that I have explained, we are effectively transferring the choice about which hospital projects go ahead from a public process done by democratic representatives to one where the private sector picks and chooses the projects that it wants to fund, design and build.

Some projects will not go ahead, not because of a public choice of priorities but because of a private sector choice. That is a complete handover of political responsibility to the private sector. It is disgraceful that a Government who talk about political sovereignty and role of Parliament should be prepared to hand such power to the private sector.

The privatisation goes further. Ministers must accept that, irrespective of what they say about clinical services not being privatised, that is precisely what is happening. It is happening to Royal Hallamshire hospital in Sheffield, according to its chief executive's evidence to the Treasury Select Committee. I do not know whether the Minister read it, but it frightened me. He said that the distinctions that the Government wanted to draw could not be drawn. Housekeeping teams are composed of people with clinical and non-clinical responsibilities. Management cannot be in the public sector for one and in the private sector for the other. That does not work in a hospital context.

Non-clinical people are being trained to do jobs such as taking blood samples. The trust is trying to enrich people's jobs and pass them more responsibility, under proper clinical training. What should be done with those people? Should we take away those responsibilities—or, when their jobs are privatised, is the totality of their work, including the clinical elements, privatised? Those questions have not been answered.

Further, services at Royal Hallamshire hospital, such as pathology and diagnostic images, are being transferred. Why are hospitals going to the private sector to fund such services? The chief executive's evidence to the Treasury Select Committee was clear. He said that it was because there is no longer any public funding to replace such equipment. He said that there was no choice but to privatise them, because clapped-out equipment could not otherwise be replaced. That is privatisation by the back door of clinical and non-clinical services.

The Bill is designed to remove an obstacle to the financing of PFI schemes but in doing so, it creates crucial problems for the NHS because of fundamental problems with the PFI. It will create delays in the construction of buildings and the provision of services. There will be a lack of democratic control. The choice of which projects go ahead will be transferred from political representatives to the private sector. The fact that resources are not available from the public sector to underpin those choices means that some projects simply will not go ahead when the private sector does not want to fund them.

That is all for a scheme that is substitutional, not additional. It brings no extra resources into play in providing health services. According to health professionals, regardless of what Ministers say, the scheme is privatisation of clinical services by the back door. Those are major concerns. If the Government allow the process to go ahead without at least imposing proper political and democratic control over it, it will be a complete dereliction of their duty to the country.

7.9 pm

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North–East): I apologise for being absent for much of the opening speeches. I was attending a meeting of the Treasury Committee. Indeed, I want to refer to evidence that it took on the private finance initiative in the health service. The debate on the Bill has revealed very deep confusion about the funding of the health service, not least on the part of Ministers responsible for it.

The Secretary of State gave evidence to the Treasury Committee on 4 March, to which reference has been made. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) said to the Secretary of State:

"Can you tell me, the trusts have the power to borrow, do they not?"

The Secretary of State said:

"No, that is incorrect."

My hon. Friend then asked:

"The trusts do not have the power to borrow?"

The Secretary of State replied:

"The trusts do not have the power to borrow."

My hon. Friend then read to the Secretary of State the schedule to the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, which confers that power on trusts. The Secretary of State said:

"I am open to correction" and accepted that trusts did indeed have the power to borrow.

In a later exchange at the same meeting, we talked about the extent to which it would be possible for the Government to control trusts' borrowing, given the fact that, under the Bill, the whole strength of the public sector will stand behind the trusts in their activities. The Secretary of State said:

"The trusts' power to borrow will be constrained by their external finance limit in the same way that it is now and it will be constrained for the same reason that it is now, namely in order to control the capacity of the pace at which trusts take on liabilities which the taxpayer stands behind."

He then talked a little more about the external financing limits. I asked him where the power to set those limits was set out in the National Health Service and Community Care Act. He said that he was not sure and that he would send the Committee a memorandum to explain the position.

[Mr. Stephen Timms]

The external financing limits came up again in the debate on the Bill last week, when the Minister said:

"there are the external financing limits, which are agreed at the beginning of the year and monitored . . . quarterly. If anything is going wrong, it will be spotted quickly by the NHS executive. That is the effective managerial control that is in place, and it is backed by statute."—[Official Report, 24 April 1996; Vol. 276, c. 548.]

Today, I re-read the memorandum that the Department of Health sent to the Treasury Committee in response to the Secretary of State's commitment. It refers to guidance in the NHS trusts finance manual, and says that the trusts have three core financial obligations. First, trusts have "to achieve an annual financial target of a real pre-interest return of six percent on their average relevant net assets".

That is fine. Secondly, it says that trusts have "to break even on an Income and Expenditure basis".

That is also fine. The third core obligation is

"to meet, or come within agreed limits of flexibility, the External Financing Limit set by the NHS Executive", to which the Minister and the Secretary of State have referred.

The memorandum goes on to say of those core obligations—the third being the external financing limit—that

"The second of these has statutory force, while the other two do not."

That is the confusion that has arisen in the debate. What exactly is the status of the external financing limit? Is it statutory or not? If, as the memorandum to the Treasury Committee said, it is not, how is the public purse safeguarded when trusts take on the new powers?

The problem is particularly severe because of the way in which the health service has been fragmented in recent years. In my area of east London, there has been a dispute—it has finished in the past few days—between East London and the City health authority and Newham Healthcare NHS trust. Both bodies were established by the Government, and all their members are appointed by the Secretary of State. The dispute was about funding and resulted in my constituents being sent away from Newham general hospital and being told that they could not be given dates for their operations. Given the autonomy of such bodies and the fact that there do not appear to be the necessary statutory controls to monitor their performance, great anxieties arise in the Bill about the risks being taken with the public purse in order to allow those large PFI hospital construction projects to take place.

We can understand the Government's anxiety to get the Bill in place, but the level of risk in what they are doing is very high. They are putting the public purse in jeopardy. I hope that there will be further, long and cool reflection—and indeed amendment—before the Bill passes into law.

7.15 pm

Mr. Horam: I commented during the speech made by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), who I am glad to see back in the Chamber, that if he thought it sensible not to carry on his career as a medical man when he left the House, he might take up a career in finance. I withdraw those remarks in the light of what he said later. His failure to understand the simple principles behind the Bill was fairly stupendous. I overrated what he had to say. The Bill simply makes it necessary for the NHS to honour its debts, whereas at the moment, it need not do so.

Ms Armstrong rose—

Mr. Horam: I shall not give way to the hon. Lady because I am replying to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said, in a rather interesting speech, that the Bill was not theologically wrong and might be a good idea. I am glad to have that rather qualified support. He also said that there was not much accountability in it, but he forgot the role of community health councils, which are important. [Interruption.] They are important. When any major change takes place in local health provision, it has to be referred to the CHC, and, indeed, other representative bodies. The hon. Gentleman cannot therefore ignore all that.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose—

Mr. Horam: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman about five times. What I have said should be taken into account when one considers consultation and accountability.

The hon. Members for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) and for North–West Durham (Ms Armstrong) made very understandable points about their local hospitals, which I shall read when I look at Hansard. In many ways, they were very fair points. They were both in essence saying that they wanted schemes to go ahead—there was no doubt about that—but with public sector cash. The hon. Member for Blyth Valley said precisely that. He hoped that there would be a Labour Government and that schemes would then go ahead with public sector cash.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) will be surprised to know that, in some technical respects, he was actually quite correct, and I agree with him. [Interruption.] They were technical points. I am glad that he agreed with me on the fundamental point about savings being available through things such as compulsory competitive tendering and market testing in the health service. He may well know, since he is a student of those matters, that we have saved more than £1 billion through market testing in the NHS since we introduced it. In objecting to that process, the hon. Gentleman must realise that that gap would have to be filled by public sector cash.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) made the point in his initial speech—at some length—that, in the final analysis, this is about the financing of hospitals and hospital improvements. The Government are bringing in private sector cash not only to build new hospitals, but to deliver better value for money. Labour certainly admits that it wants more hospitals, but if it does not use private sector cash to provide them, its only recourse is to use more public sector cash. That is the fundamental point that Labour must face, but it never faces up to it—it is a tax-and-spend party.

Labour's only alternative to the way in which we are providing funds via the private sector is to bring in public sector funding. It must increase public sector expenditure even more and raise taxes to fund that increase, or it will not be able to build hospitals. That is the fact of the matter. Labour is fundamentally ashamed of its past, and silent about this matter. Its opposition to the Bill is wholly bogus.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill

As amended (in the Special Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

LICENSING CONDITIONS FOR CERTAIN EVENTS

7.22 pm

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 1, line 7, leave out 'section' and insert 'sections'.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendment No. 15, in line 38, at end insert—

'Conditions for existing licences

18B.—(1) This section applies to premises in respect of which a licence has been granted, whether before or after the coming into force of this section, under section 17 of this Act where no conditions have been attached to the licence in pursuance of section 18A of this Act.

(2) Where it appears to a licensing board that an event to which section 18A of this Act applies may be held on premises to which this section applies, the board shall convene a meeting for the purpose of attaching to the licence the conditions specified in subsection (1) of that section.

(3) The clerk to the licensing board shall, not later than 21 days before the date of the meeting to be held under subsection (2) above, serve on the holder of the licence and send to the chief constable a notice of—

(a) the meeting;

(b) where the Secretary of State has prescribed the terms of any prescribed conditions, such terms;

(c) in the case of any other prescribed conditions, the terms proposed by the board; and

(d) where the board proposes to attach any other conditions to the licence, the terms of such conditions.

(4) At the meeting held under subsection (2) above, unless the holder of the licence satisfies the board that no event to which section 18A of this Act applies will be held on the premises, the board shall attach to the licence the prescribed conditions and such other conditions as it considers necessary in the terms determined in accordance with subsection (5) below.

(5) In determining—

(a) whether the board is satisfied as mentioned in subsection (4) above; or

(b) what conditions (other than prescribed conditions) to attach to a licence or the terms (other than such terms as are prescribed) of such conditions,

the board shall have regard to any observations submitted by the chief constable and any other person or body mentioned in section 16(1) of this Act.

(6) Subsections (2) to (4) of section 16 of this Act shall apply in relation to any observations made under subsection (5) above as they apply in relation to any objection made under that section; and for the purposes of such application any reference in the said subsections (2) to (4)—

(a) to an application shall be construed as a reference to conditions proposed to be attached to the licence;

(b) to the applicant shall be construed as a reference to the holder of the licence;

(c) to an objection shall be construed as a reference to an observation;

(d) to the proper address of the applicant shall be construed as a reference to the address at which notice is served on the holder of the licence under subsection (3) above, and cognate expressions shall be construed accordingly.

(7) The terms of conditions to be attached to the licence in pursuance of subsection (4) above are—

(a) in the case of the prescribed conditions—

(i) where the terms of any condition have been prescribed, such terms;

(ii) where the description of any condition has been prescribed, such terms as the board considers appropriate;

(b) in the case of any other condition notified under subsection (3)(d) above, such terms as the board consider appropriate; and

(c) in the case of any condition not so notified, such terms as are agreed with the holder of the licence.

(8) Subsections (4) to (9) of section 18A of this Act shall apply to conditions attached to a licence under subsection (4) above as they apply to conditions attached to a licence under section 18A(1) of this Act.

(9) The clerk to the licensing board shall forthwith intimate to the holder of the licence—

(a) where the board is satisfied that no event to which section 18A of this Act will be held on the premises, that fact; and

(b) where the board attaches conditions to the licence, such conditions by sending to the holder of the licence a copy of the licence with the conditions attached.

(10) In this section "prescribed conditions" has the same meaning as in section 18A of this Act.'.

Amendment (a) to the Government amendment, in subsection (4), after the first 'licence', insert 'or his representative'.

Amendment (b), in subsection (9), leave out 'forthwith' and insert

', no later than fourteen days after the meeting held under subsection (2) above,'.

Government amendments Nos. 11 and 12.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I welcome the all-party support for this Bill and the helpful suggestions made by Opposition Members, many of which are incorporated in the Bill. We wish to consider amendment (a) to Government amendment No. 15 further, because it may give rise to consequential amendments to other legislation. I therefore wish to take away that amendment with a view to considering whether it can be accepted without causing difficulty to other legislation. We are very sympathetic to the aims of the amendment, and we shall do our best to achieve a satisfactory outcome.

Hon. Members who were present will recall that I said in Committee that I intended to bring forward an amendment on Report that would give licensing boards the power to attach conditions to existing licences in the same way as the boards would be able to attach conditions on the grant or renewal of a licence. Licences granted under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 usually last for three years, and it would in no small degree frustrate the object of the Bill if boards had to wait that long before being able to attach conditions to relevant licences, to protect the health and safety of young people.

Amendment No. 15, along with three consequential amendments, will make certain that licensing boards do not have to await the renewal of licences before attaching conditions. The amendment introduces new section 18B into the 1976 Act, which enables a board to attach conditions to an existing licence. Where a board proposes to attach conditions to an existing licence, it must convene a meeting and serve a notice on the licence holder.

We have taken account of the essence of concerns raised by hon. Members about the wording of the earlier version of the amendment. It was suggested that the licensing board might not provide enough information to the licence holder about when and where the meeting was to be held. New section 18B(3)(a) has been drafted in terms already used in the 1976 Act which, I hope, will assuage any concerns that hon. Members may have had about the information to be notified to the licence holder. The holder of a licence has the same rights of appeal to a sheriff in respect of conditions attached to an existing licence as are provided in relation to conditions attached on the grant or renewal of a licence.

I hope that hon. Members will appreciate the good sense of amendment No. 15, and the consequential amendments Nos. 9, 11 and 12, noting that we have taken on board their point mentioned in Committee about the notification of the meeting. I therefore commend them to the House.

While it may not be appropriate for me to refer to Opposition amendments other than the one that I have agreed to take away and consider, I might assist the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) by saying that, although I am sympathetic to the aim of amendment (b), we would seek to cover that matter in guidance. It is not necessary to legislate. I hope that that assists the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): First, I thank the Minister for his co-operation during the evidence sessions on the Bill. It has been a co-operative and a listening exercise, and the Bill has gained from that. The Minister and the Government made considerable concessions after hearing the evidence. I accept that Government amendments Nos. 9, 11 and 12 are consequential, and that Government amendment No. 9 in particular is a paving amendment for amendments (a) and (b).

The reasoning behind the amendments is as follows. A meeting of the licensing board, as defined in new section 18A, will be held for the purpose of putting conditions on the licence. The licensing board will be required to give notification of those conditions and of the meeting date and location. Our amendments cover that, and make more specific the date and location of the meeting.

The amendments further provide for the licence holder or his representative, as laid out in the 1976 Act, to make representations, and deal with the word "forthwith". The Bill contains no qualification of "forthwith", and I was trying to make it more specific by referring to 14 days. But even at this late stage, I am happy for the Minister to take the amendments away and see what can be done.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: On amendment (b), I confirm that the word "forthwith" means as quickly as possible. We shall seek to confirm in guidance that "forthwith" means what it says, and that it should be well within 14 days. We accept the spirit of the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): New section 18B(2), in amendment No. 15, states:

"Where it appears to a licensing board that an event to which section 18A of this Act applies".

The licensing boards are bodies. How does the Minister envisage something appearing to them? Does he envisage a procedure to enable people to make objections to the board or to draw matters to its attention? How will the board come by the knowledge to set this worthwhile procedure in train?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The requirement is that the decision of the licensing board must be intimated to the licence holder forthwith. The hon. Gentleman is raising a different point, which I think we shall come to in discussing another amendment. I might return to the matter then.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McFall: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 1, line 10, leave out 'or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 14, in page 1, line 12, at end insert

'; or

(d) a regular or occasional extension under section 64 of this Act.'.

Mr. McFall: Amendment No. 13 is a paving amendment for amendment No. 14, the effect of which would be to ensure that the provisions of new section 18A of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 applied to all licence extensions. The reason for it is that the provisions of new section 18A apply currently to licences, occasional licences and occasional permissions under the 1976 Act. Regular extensions and occasional extensions are omitted, and there seems no logical reason for that.

Accordingly, the amendment remedies that, because we could find a licensing board giving an occasional extension to premises for a 21st birthday party, and the premises getting that extension for up to one month. There is flexibility in the amendment, and I hope that the Minister will consider it seriously.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: With respect, I do not think that the amendments are strictly necessary and indeed, if introduced, they might cause confusion for the licensing boards, because they would create inconsistency between the new arrangements and existing procedures covered in the 1976 Act. I welcome the opportunity to explain the position.

The types of licence or permission to which the provisions of clause 1 will apply are listed in the new subsection. As the hon. Gentleman mentioned, the purpose of the amendments is to add regular or occasional extensions granted under the provisions in the 1976 Act, which enable alcohol to be sold outwith the statutory core hours, to the list in new subsection (1). That implies that conditions attached to the licence fly off during any occasional or regular extension of permitted hours granted in relation to the licence. I am glad to confirm that that is not the case. A licence holder would be required to observe the conditions attached to his licence, not only during the normal permitted hours, but where he or she has authority to extend the sale of alcohol beyond the normal permitted hours during such extensions.

In view of that explanation, I hope that the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) can agree that the matter is amply provided for and will withdraw the amendment.

7.30 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): The Minister seems properly to have stated the position. The foundation for any regular or occasional extension under section 64 of the 1976 Act arises only once a licence has been granted under section 17. Therefore, if a condition attaches to the original grant of licence, it inevitably follows that the condition must attach to any regular or occasional extension of that licence. Therefore, on this occasion, perhaps much to the Minister's surprise, I find myself in agreement with him. His analysis of the effect of the amendment is entirely correct and I join him in suggesting to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) that it be withdrawn.

Mr. McFall: The forces of the law are closing in on me. I take the advice that has been given to heart and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 16, leave out 'conditions' and insert

'the prescribed conditions and such other conditions as the board considers necessary'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 20, in page 1, line 19, after 'attach', insert

'the prescribed conditions and such other necessary'.

Government amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 4, at end insert

'(3A) The Secretary of State may, by order, prescribe the conditions which are to be attached to a licence or permission under this section, and an order made under this subsection may prescribe—

(a) the terms of any such condition; or

(b) the description of any such condition, the terms of which shall be specified by the licensing board, and such an order shall be made by statutory instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.

Amendment (a) to the Government amendment, in subsection (3A), after 'Secretary of State' leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

Amendment (b), in subsection (3A), after 'subsection' leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

Government amendment No. 3.

Amendment No. 23, in page 2, line 13, at end insert—

'(4A) The conditions referred to in subsection (3A) above shall without prejudice to any other provisions which the Secretary of State may consider necessary include the following—

(a) the number of persons who may attend the event;

(b) the number of stewards who shall attend the event;

(c) the training and qualifications of the stewards who shall attend the event;

(d) the number, training and qualifications of medically qualified persons who shall attend the event;

(e) that the premises should have a soundproofed, ventilated area not used for dancing; or

(f) that the licence holder should provide without charge fresh drinking water to those attending the event.'.

Government amendment No. 5.

Amendment No. 27, in page 2, line 31, after 'music', insert

' "medically qualified person" includes any person qualified as a doctor, nurse or paramedic;'.

Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This group of Government amendments deal with the proposed introduction of a power to enable the Secretary of State to prescribe conditions which licensing boards must attach to licences in relation to premises at which relevant events are to be held. The amendments fulfil undertakings that we gave in Committee to bring forward on Report the changes required to provide for this.

The amendments address concerns raised in debate that boards might not implement the provisions in the Bill with the same consistency or rigour. We are of course committed to issuing guidance on the nature and form of conditions that may be attached to licences.

We cannot guarantee that that guidance will be followed consistently by each board. As hon. Members who were present recognised when we debated this issue in Committee, the health and safety of the young and vulnerable are important enough to require certain minimum standards to be applied across the country as a whole. We therefore agreed that the Secretary of State should have available a power which he can exercise, if required, to prescribe minimum conditions which boards must attach to relevant licences. That will ensure that the basic policy underlying clause 1, which has received support from all sides, will not be undermined through inconsistency of approach.

Amendment No. 2 introduces the necessary order-making power and amendment No. 1 imposes the duty on boards to adhere to the terms of any order made by the Secretary of State under it.

As the intention of the amendments is to ensure that there is, if necessary, a core of minimum conditions to protect young people attending relevant events, amendment No. 5 provides that the attachment of the Secretary of State's prescribed conditions to a licence may not be appealed by the licence holder. However, the terms of the conditions imposed by the board, where the Secretary of State has simply described the type of condition which must be applied, will be subject to an appeal to the sheriff in the same way as any other condition imposed at the board's discretion.

Amendment No. 8 ensures that "prescribed conditions" are defined for the purposes of the Bill. The other amendments, Nos. 3 and 7, are consequential drafting amendments.

I hope that hon Members will welcome the amendments which introduce a mechanism, arising out of representations in Committee, whereby minimum conditions can, if it proves necessary, be set for the whole of Scotland.

I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. McFall: I thank the Minister for that explanation. I accept his arguments on Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

With regard to Government amendment No. 5, the Minister said that the right of appeal to the sheriff cannot apply when the Secretary of State has made his decision. That is why consultation on the Secretary of State's conditions is paramount. The Bill removes the right of appeal on the Secretary of State's conditions. We need the agreement of all parties regarding the tenor of those prescribed conditions. I seek the Minister's further comment on that.

The Opposition's amendment No. 20 takes into account the effect of the Government's amendments. Amendment No. 20 corrects a Government error. The Bill currently refers to:

"The duty of the licensing board under subsection (1)" with regard to the conditions of a licence. The Government's amendment of that in their amendment No. 2 should contain a reference to the prescribed conditions in new subsection 18A(2).

Perhaps the most important Opposition amendment in the group is amendment No. 23, which states that the Secretary of State shall prescribe conditions. We remember back to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 when local authorities were allowed the power to prescribe byelaws. If I am correct, only 44 out of 57 local authorities undertook that. Therefore, it is important that there is an obligation on local authorities to have the conditions. The Minister kindly sent me a copy of the model licence conditions which have gone out to local authorities, but I still feel that there must be an obligatory element.

The Government are not laying down in concrete exactly what will apply in each and every area. They should be setting the outcomes so that there is a consistency of approach throughout Scotland and throughout different local authorities. On Second Reading, a number of right hon. and hon. Members said that such lack of consistency in the original Bill was a matter for concern. I should like the Minister to consider that issue closely.

Amendment No. 23 suggests that the Secretary of State may consider it necessary to include

"the number of persons who may attend the event".

Under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 a number of authorities prescribed conditions at dances and, as we had, raves. I should like to see that adopted throughout Scotland. I think that the authorities were Stirling, in the Secretary of State's constituency, and West Lothian. The number of persons who may attend an event is extremely important. When we look back to the Hangar 13 incident, we find from police statements that the number of young people at the event exceeded the desirable number.

There is also the issue of stewarding. We have had representations from a number of local authorities—for example, in Glasgow—for stewards to be properly qualified. The training and qualifications of stewards who attend such events is extremely important. We have quite a distance to go yet to ensure that we have that standardisation of approach to training and qualifications.

The Opposition have also sought to define a medically qualified person. The Government have attempted that in another area, but it is important specifically to determine a medically qualified person and the number of such people who should be at these events. If individuals or organisations put on the events, they have certain obligations, and it is important to have in the Bill exactly what those obligations are.

I do not think that there is any disagreement, other than perhaps from the Glasgow licensing board, that the holder of the event should provide, without charge, fresh drinking water for those attending the event. That is a commonsense approach to a contemporary situation in which society finds itself. The Opposition have always gone along with the Government on that issue. However, we would like it to be more specific and to be obligatory.

Although the model guidelines issued by the Scottish Office are comprehensive in their approach, without that obligatory element, there could be variation between areas which would defeat the purpose of the Bill for which there has been almost unanimous approval. Will the Minister consider that?

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the way in which he has responded to some of the points made in Committee. I fully endorse the amendments and welcome the fact that he sent to us his suggestions for model licensing conditions. In Committee we used the word "flexibility" a great deal with respect to applications in different parts of the country. The amendments allow for that flexibility.

Having said that, there are one or two words in the model licensing guidelines to which I take great exception. It is unfortunate that the phrase "chill-out areas" has been used, because it is associated with the world of drugs. As we said in Committee, the licensing conditions apply to venues that could be, and hopefully are, drug-free, but there is still a need for quiet areas and cool areas. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will consider that when he puts together the final draft of the guidelines.

Mrs. Irene Adams (Paisley, North): Like the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) I believe that the Minister has incorporated into the guidelines most of the things that we asked for in Committee. I am a little concerned that there are a few loose ends that need to be tied up. There must be some obligation to ensure that the conditions are laid down stringently.

I am concerned particularly about stewarding and the lack of a definition of what constitutes a steward. What sort of person will be employed as a steward? Will it be someone whom the licence holder will draft in for the night or will it be someone who is permanently employed? There does not seem to be any need for accreditation. Training is referred to in the model guidelines, but it is very loose in-house training. I would have preferred to see the stewards checked out and accredited by the police. All too often in the past, some of those doing the stewarding seem to be bigger thugs than those whom they were trying to escort from the premises.

We would not get into a taxi if the driver did not have a licence to carry passengers, but we often put our young people into the hands of stewards who have no expertise and who are just drafted in and paid by the night. We owe it to the young people attending these raves to ensure that the stewards are properly qualified.

We also have to apply that principle to whoever is in charge of providing medical attention. Again, we need to lay down more stringent guidelines. I know that some of the licence holders who came to see us talked about getting in paramedics on a regular basis, but we must tighten that up a little bit.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I should like to reiterate the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) about stewarding and the need to set guidelines. I know that there are some proposals from the CU Jimmy university to offer a degree in bouncing which may be helpful. I believe that one can obtain a degree in most things there. [Interruption.] Caledonian university is known in Tom Shiel's diary as the CU Jimmy university. I think— [Interruption.] The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) just accused me of academic snobbery. That is a shocking accusation since we went to the same university.

We cannot leave this completely unregulated. This is an important method by which we will regulate what goes on. As my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North said, we would not let anyone drive a taxi without some form of licence and we stipulate various regulations for the person offering medical attention. Yet, for the bouncer, there is nothing to be done. The Minister should take that away and look at it.

7.45 pm

Having said that, I welcome the amendment and what it is trying to do. I understand that part of the reason for it is the position taken by the Glasgow licensing board, which said that it would not lay down stipulations, for various reasons. That is wrong. The licensing authorities are not there as our moral guardians—that is a position for us to adopt—but they are there to regulate public order. They must not let their personal views interfere with the conditions necessary for good public order.

It is important to try to maintain some rational debate. I will take this opportunity to support the director of social work in Glasgow, Mary Hartnell, who tried to lay out the facts. We might not agree with some of the conclusions, but we should not dispute the facts. I do not blame those who condemned her because I know what it is like. Representatives from the press phone up and say, "So and so has said this." One gives a short, outraged, how can it possibly be, end-of-the-world-is-nigh response, only to find out that the person did not say anything in the first place.

It is important that there is uniformity across the country. We cannot have conditions in one area which mean that the problems shift elsewhere. In that respect, public opinion and other pressures might, of necessity, force licensing bodies to adopt some sort of uniformity because, if an area is lax, the raves will simply move in. The days of variation in regulations are over.

I remember when Glasgow and other councils had the right to ban certain films. It is preposterous that they should have been allowed to make such moral judgments. I remember that Glasgow banned a couple of films and we trooped down to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North to watch them. That was great business for Paisley, but we cannot have that.

[Mr. Sam Galbraith]

I hope that the Minister will take on board the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), which ensures that there is an obligatory aspect.

There should not be too much variation; absolute conditions should be laid down and rigorously enforced. In particular, I refer to the availability of drinking water and to the cups for drinking it. I can envisage a situation where a rave party takes place in a hangar, hundreds of people attend and the plastic cups run out—I suspect that they may be used for other things. These conditions have to be rigorously enforced. That brings me back to the licensing of stewards. If the conditions are not enforced, the stewards may have their licences withdrawn. With those caveats, I welcome the amendment.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Govan): I support the amendment of the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), particularly with reference to changing "may" to "shall". The House must clearly show that it wants to introduce the model licensing conditions that the Minister has circulated. I am particularly interested in chill-out areas, notwithstanding the argument of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) with whom I agree on this point. I am also interested in the availability of drinking water.

I believe that there will be a financial temptation for people who run these social events to let the water run out and to have no cups available. Young people will then be obliged to buy drinks at exorbitant prices. Quite often, they have only a limited amount of money and they will choose to do without. For medical reasons, it is essential that they continue to take in fluids in considerable quantities.

Clearly question of public safety will operate in direct contradiction to the financial interests of the operators of the centres. In those circumstances, the local authority—which will come under great pressure from the licence holders—should not have the discretion to waive the facilities that we believe should be provided. Therefore, a "shall" rather than a "may" would be a much clearer way of stating the opinion of the House in this matter.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: As I understand the purpose of the amendments moved by the Minister, they are to ensure that a common set of standards apply to events that are held in Scotland and covered by the Bill. With the creation of that common set of standards, the Secretary of State will have the discretion to lay down the standards. It leaves a substantial amount of discretion to the Secretary of State, and I do not normally encourage that, because I think discretion can be abused as easily as it can be properly implemented.

Against that, the amendment of the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) would prescribe certain provisions that the Secretary of State has to incorporate willy-nilly in the guidance that he issues. I am not persuaded that that is the appropriate way to proceed. I believe that leaving this matter to the common sense of the Secretary of State is a much more effective way to realise some of the objectives that hon. Members are anxious to achieve.

I understand the enthusiasm for prescribing the number of persons, the number of stewards and their training and qualifications, the number of medically qualified persons, the soundproof ventilated area not used for dancing—a soundproof ventilated area in the Chamber might be of some assistance to us from time to time—and the fresh drinking water. The latter issue came up when the Bill had its Second Reading in the Scottish Grand Committee. Some hon. Members expressed doubt as to whether a provision of that kind could be introduced by a Bill dealing with safety. We had an interesting debate as to whether health and safety was necessary in order to provide a proper statutory foundation.

All those are highly desirable objectives, and I understand the motives of the hon. Members who wish to have them on the face of the Bill. However, I am not convinced that it is necessary in this case. There is a strong argument for leaving this to the discretion of the Secretary of State. For the second consecutive occasion, I find myself agreeing with the Minister. For the moment, I am not convinced that amendment No. 23 is necessary to bring about the entirely laudable objectives that hon. Members who spoke in support of it clearly wish to achieve.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I agree with the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) that there should be consultation before any order is made. It is important for us to have a consistent policy that is applied throughout Scotland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) raised the issue of the model licensing conditions and mentioned certain drafting improvements that can be made. We shall look at the improvements, as the guidelines have not been finally approved.

We shall look at the guidelines in relation to what the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) said and revise them as appropriate. At this stage, the guidelines merely give an idea of the conditions that may apply—they will not be finalised until we have consulted widely.

The hon. Members for Paisley, North and for Dumbarton raised the issue of stewards and training. The power that licensing boards will be given to set conditions can well accommodate a requirement for adequately trained door stewards. Indeed, we would expect the boards to consider such a condition as one of the minimum requirements, and it will be highlighted as such in the model conditions. A new Scottish vocational qualification in door supervision will soon be available. This has been prepared in partnership with the security industry training organisations. Such training initiatives should have a positive effect in improving the standards and the public image of door stewards.

I am grateful to hon. Members for their comments about the conditions being obligatory. We should try to get the provisions right, and I believe that we have done so. We were concerned—Opposition Members shared our concern—that some licensing boards might not apply the requirement to impose the conditions properly. Therefore, we felt it necessary to put down the Government amendments as a precautionary step. At present, we have reason to believe that licensing boards will act responsibly and implement the policy fully. That is surely the correct basis on which to proceed.

We shall monitor practices closely, and if that does not happen, the Secretary of State can step in. We should not pre-empt the decision making of local licensing boards at this stage, as it would be undesirable to undermine their responsibility. However, if difficulties arise, we shall be in a position to do something about it. In view of the strength of feeling expressed, I am willing to reconsider our attitude on this subject.

I shall give an example of why we have dealt with the matter in that way. I refer to the issue of numbers. We believe that a certain amount of local discretion is appropriate in determining the numbers. It is difficult for the Secretary of State to prescribe an obligation on numbers. We shall review the matter closely in the light of what happens and take further action if necessary. At the moment, we believe that the other amendments are not necessary. The Government amendments are necessary to give the Secretary of State the necessary powers. I am grateful for the support of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. McFall: It was worth waiting to hear about the Government's initiatives in higher education—a certificate in door supervision. I look forward to the Minister presenting the certificates. I refer to the empirical evidence. The City of Glasgow Licensing Board recently wrote to me in relation to training staff and stewards. The letter stated:

"Glasgow Licensing Board considers that it has been at the forefront of promoting the responsible management of licensed entertainment premises by licenceholders within its jurisdiction."

The board's experience has led it to the conclusion that the training of staff and stewards employed in licensed premises is an extremely important factor in providing a well-run and trouble-free environment. The board has already introduced its own initiatives in regard to training. More recently, in a well-publicised move, it introduced a five-point plan intended to eradicate drugs in licensed entertainment venues.

The board states:

"To a large extent . . . these initiatives are supported by the licensed trade", but concludes that

"the licensing of stewards employed in licensed premises is an issue which the Scottish Office should take on board. However, to date the Scottish Office have resisted the Board's repeated requests in that regard."

I hope that the Minister will pay attention to evidence from a licensing board that has had daily experience of the present circumstances.

8 pm

The hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) and my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) mentioned chill-out areas. The Glasgow licensing board has said that it has spoken to the Scottish Drugs Forum about the issue, and that the forum considers the term unfortunate. The concept of a quiet lounge area outwith the discotheque environment, already in place in many establishments, is apparently what was intended by the reference. The Scottish Drugs Forum seems to be content to withdraw the term "chill-out area". I ask the Minister to consider the issues involved.

We speak of model licensing conditions. We do not want a missive to be sent from St Andrew's house saying exactly how many individuals should be allowed into a venue at any one time; that can be prescribed locally. The people concerned should be obliged to take the necessary action, however. The filling in can be done at local level—discretion can be given for that—but the Scottish Office should issue an order for that to be done. That would provide some consistency.

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I shall be happy to examine the matters that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. McFall: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, it is a Government amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McFall: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 1, line 16, after 'of', insert '(i)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 18, in page 1, line 17, after 'health', insert ', welfare'.

No. 19, in page 1, line 17, after 'event', insert

'; and

(ii) promoting knowledge among such persons about the effects of the misuse of alcohol and drugs.'.

Mr. McFall: Amendment No. 17 is consequential: it is a paving amendment for amendments Nos. 18 and 19. We consider that the conditions that the licensing board is obliged to provide under new section 18A should safeguard the health and safety of those attending raves; but health and safety are not the only matters with which the board should be concerned: it should also be concerned about the welfare of individuals. That might not include all types of provision that a licensing board can make, however. The welfare category could include the hours during which such an event takes place, the physical environment and, perhaps, the volume of the music.

Amendment No. 19 imposes a new obligation on licensing boards to promote knowledge of the effects of misuse of alcohol and drugs. The duty on licensing boards in respect of promoting the health and safety of those attending raves needs to be tempered by information that allows people to make informed decisions about their health. The Minister will note that we have included alcohol as well as drugs in the amendment. We think it important to educate people about that. We welcomed the all-party approach to drugs adopted by the Government and the Opposition parties in Scotland, but people must be educated at local level. Licence holders organising such events should be obliged to disseminate information about the misuse of alcohol and drugs.

As the Minister knows, many young people are abusing alcohol to an unacceptable extent. Some brewers and other companies have produced "alcopop", which I believe is aimed specifically at very young people. A local educational programme should be provided to counter that. Yes, we are placing an obligation on licence holders, but they are dealing with young people who may be vulnerable, and it is important for them to have obligations.

Mr. Galbraith: I support amendment No. 19 in particular: I am in favour of the concept of continuing education. I do not intend at this stage to deal with the question of how to prevent people from taking drugs, which is wide and difficult, but I am encouraged by the fact that the amendment refers to alcohol as well as drugs. There is some equivalence between the two.

[Mr. Galbraith]

We often forget that alcohol is a drug, in the sense that many other substances are drugs. We should not seek to distinguish the different kinds of drug for historical or social reasons. I am only disappointed that the amendment does not include tobacco. People who find that they have to smoke are addicted to nicotine: they are nicotine drug addicts, and in that sense they are no different from any other addict, although it is socially less acceptable to admit. Those who indulge in tobacco do not want to admit that they are physically dependent.

When we consider the number of people who die as a result of drug taking, we tend to go by the generic terms. We think of heroin and cocaine, for instance. In 1994, 247 people in Scotland died as a result of using drugs defined in that way. More people—335—died of illnesses directly related to the ingestion of the drug alcohol, while 3,000 died from diseases associated with alcohol.

In 1991, 10,600 people died as a result of using the drug nicotine, obtained through nicotine. Let us keep the figures in proportion. A total of 247 people died as a result of what are commonly and popularly known as drugs; 10,600 people died as a result of the drug nicotine. That does not excuse the use of any of the other drugs, but it does mean that we should see the matter in perspective.

I welcome the amendment, and hope that the Minister will take it on board. If he does, I hope that, by whatever method, he will include nicotine in its provisions.

Mr. Wallace: I share the sentiments and good intentions behind the amendments, but I am afraid that I cannot support them, because I do not honestly think that they are capable of being translated into action by licensing boards. Although matters such as health and safety may be susceptible of an objective approach when a licensing board attaches conditions, to impose responsibility regarding welfare is to impose a duty that is so wide that I am not sure how the board could, in all conscience, discharge it. Welfare may differ considerably from one person to another, and, given such large crowds, it would be very difficult to discharge such a responsibility.

Amendment No.19 speaks of

"promoting knowledge among such persons about the effects of the misuse of alcohol and drugs."

Again, we do not object to that idea—much more should be done generally to promote knowledge of those effect—but how is a licensing board to discharge that responsibility? What will be required? Must adverts be placed or must there be a period during the evening when a lecture is given or do leaflets have to be distributed? If leaflets have to be distributed, I think that all hon. Members would agree that how one promotes information and explains the effects of such actions can often be a matter of debate and dispute.

During our debate on an earlier group of amendments, the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) mentioned the furore sparked off by the remarks of the director of social work in Glasgow. I shall not go into the merits of what was said, but the incident illustrated the number of differing views that can be held on the subject. A person who is granted a licence may distribute leaflets seeking to promote knowledge, but others might say that the leaflets do nothing of the sort and, indeed, encourage such actions. When criminal sanctions are attached to a breach of the licensing conditions, it is incumbent on the board to be precise so that the person who has to comply with the conditions knows exactly what he is required to do. I do not think that that is possible.

There is an important task to be done in promoting knowledge. The Liberal Democrats have supported the all-party initiative, Scotland against Drugs, and we shall be taking to the buses on Tuesday to take the message around Scotland. We must not stop there; we must promote information through our schools and through health education. As the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden rightly said, the message must also include alcohol as well as drugs and nicotine. I do not believe that the responsibility can adequately be discharged by he licensing boards when dealing with such applications.

Mrs. Adams: I support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall). While I recognise that it would be difficult to put the provision into practice, it would be remiss of us to miss the opportunity at least to try to promote some of the health messages that we have heard from the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith).

In the midst of our discussions, we may have lost the message of the dangers of alcohol and nicotine. We are aware of the dangers of drugs. All hon. Members have desperately tried to promote the message that drugs are exceptionally dangerous. We must not lose sight of the fact that many people are dying of alcohol and alcohol-related diseases, and of nicotine-related diseases. No end of organisations are willing to come to venues such as raves and clubs to promote good health practices and to mix with young people. Whether leaflets are used or information is circulated via anti-drugs and anti-alcohol organisations, we must try to put some of the measures into practice, not simply leave it to chance. If we do not take the amendments on board, we shall be missing an opportunity.

8.15 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: New section 18A spells out the purpose for which boards, having concluded that an event is a relevant one, attach conditions to the liquor licence. Following debates in Committee, that purpose was extended to safeguarding the health and safety of people attending relevant events. The change was warmly accepted by hon. Members.

As the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) said, amendment No. 18 would extend that purpose still further. That would be a praiseworthy aim if it achieved any further benefit. However, like the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), I do not believe that it does. Protecting the health and safety of young people is an all-embracing objective that must reasonably imply the inclusion of welfare, so a specific reference is unnecessary.

Amendment No. 19 would introduce a second purpose for attracting conditions to licences. While I agree with the essence of the point, the change is unnecessary.

Of course alcohol and drug misuse is detrimental to health and safety. Under new section 18A, a board is empowered to attach appropriate conditions to a licence to achieve the objective. A board is surely best placed to gauge how to achieve that aim in any particular circumstances, which is why it should be provided for as a condition.

The terms and conditions that boards should attach to licences will be fully covered in the guidance to be issued by the Scottish Office following consultation. Boards will be fully aware that informing people about the dangers of drug misuse is part of the Bill's purpose. As we have already debated and confirmed, if boards do not attach appropriate conditions to licences, the Secretary of State will have the power to prescribe the conditions that boards will have to attach.

Amendment No. 17 is simply consequential on the other two amendments. I trust that I have explained why the amendments are unnecessary, although their purpose is praiseworthy. The terms of the Bill cover the points raised.

Mr. McFall: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. McFall: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 2, line 1, leave out

'at which it appears to the board'

and insert

'in respect of which the board has received specific information'.

The amendment is concerned with specificity rather than vagueness. The Bill states that the appearance of the possibility of the misuse of drugs at events is a sufficient basis for a licensing board to act. The amendment requires the board to have specific intelligence that offences may be committed. The Minister knows that we have raised the issue with him before. I believe that he has said that the Government consulted the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and it was content with the provision, but it is important to specify what the licensing board has to know.

Under the Bill, the so-called information could be a rumour—one member of the board could hear it and decide to act. That member may have listened to a chief constable or another person's competitor. The wording is too vague, and it would be better if it were stated in the Bill that the board had received specific information.

I am aware that, if a chief constable gives information, it could be confidential. The amendment allows for that information to remain confidential, but it must be specific. The amendment is aimed at tying down the information to being specific rather than vague. The Minister is aware of our concerns.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth and Kinross): I support the amendment. I am uncertain about its precise wording, but the tenor is right. I have been concerned that this part of the Bill has insufficient legal clarity and that licensing boards will be laid open to challenges if they take decisions on the basis of how matters appear to them, without having anything much to back up their decisions.

I understand the Government's position—they do not want to narrow the board's flexibility too much and introduce a standard with which, until now, they have not had to deal. If the Bill is to proceed, it would be useful if the Government could take on board our concerns, which are partly echoed by the police.

I have contacted my local police force on the subject and they expressed a little concern about the wide way in which the provision is drawn. It was said that, if the police were asked to advise, it would be difficult for them to envisage an event about which they could say that it fell outside the criteria, but they could think of many events at which it would be unlikely that offences would take place. Including a tighter definition of what should appear before the board when it makes its decision would be helpful in the longer term.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) has done us a service by introducing the amendment, as it allows the opportunity for some consideration of the language to which the amendment is directed. The Bill says that the new section applies to any event that offences may be committed.

"at which it appears to the board"

The difficulty is that the scope of those words is extremely wide. As the Minister will be well aware, licensing boards are not bound by the strict rules of evidence. They are entitled to have regard to hearsay evidence, and they often proceed on the basis not of formal, evidence but of ex parte statements. That has been the custom of the licensing board in Glasgow from time immemorial.

As that is the standard of evidence that licensing boards are entitled to adopt, when one produces a statutory provision that is drawn in such wide terms as the present provision, one allows for the possibility of vague rumour or an unsubstantiated attempt by a competitor to do down the business of someone who is a commercial success and is causing envy or detracting from other commercial opportunities. Although the hon. Gentleman's amendment, which refers to specific information, may not be correct in its precise phrasing, he is right to argue for greater precision as to what a board is entitled to rely on.

As the hon. Gentleman was speaking, it occurred to me that it might be possible to insert some reference to those who are entitled to object to the awarding of a licence—for example, a chief constable, a community council or a person owning an adjacent or neighbouring property. Such people are provided with a statutory right of objection when any application is made for what might be called in this context a full licence. I think that that would be more specific than what presently appears to be an opportunity for the board to hoover up scraps of information from anywhere in order to justify a decision.

The difficulty is that the words

"at which it appears to the board"

give a quite extraordinary discretion to the board, which it would be very difficult to challenge on the ground that the discretion was exercised unreasonably. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's amendment points to a part of the Bill where the lack of precision of language is a substantial defect.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) speaks from considerable experience in handling such cases. However, I remind him of the right of appeal to which reference is made in the Bill a few paragraphs later.

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) for explaining the purpose of the amendment. In Committee, we debated the pros and cons of the wording of the present characteristic. One of the purposes of the Bill is to provide a framework within which licensing boards will be able to make their own definition of relevant events. That is achieved by setting out certain characteristics that provide local authorities with the flexibility to address a problem whose nature may change over time.

The hon. Member for Perth and Kinross (Ms Cunningham) is correct in thinking that we did not want to narrow that flexibility too much. A change was proposed in Committee that we felt was too restrictive and would have fettered the board's discretion. However, I promised to consult the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on the matter, and it responded with concern. It made clear its strong opposition to the amendment tabled in Committee. It felt that it would not assist boards in any way and would prevent their discharging their functions properly. We listened to the advice from the practitioners, which effectively confirmed our original belief.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): What guidance can an objector secure? I speak not of a chief constable but of someone who lives nearby and does not have the means to obtain legal advice. Are there any guidelines for such objectors?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. However, the hon. Gentleman may submit proposals to cover that issue in the guidance. I sent a copy of the guidance to all members of the Committee. The hon. Gentleman escaped serving on the Committee on this occasion, so I shall send him a copy. It is not too late for him to propose any amendments or drafting changes if he so wishes. We shall look carefully at any suggestions that he makes.

Mr. Wallace: In replying to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) earlier, the Minister said that someone who was affected by the amendment would have the right of appeal. Does he agree that the right of appeal as set out in new subsection (5) relates to the terms of any condition that might be imposed under a subsection? The amendment addresses the definition of an event to which conditions might apply. It addresses not the terms of the condition but whether any conditions should apply at all. In that case, what legal remedy would be available to someone who feels that the licensing board has taken account of unsubstantiated tittle-tattle?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The right of appeal refers also to the refusal of consent under subsection (4)(a). We consider that to be an important safeguard for the individuals concerned.

Amendment No. 22 is far less flexible than the reasonable suspicion test which was proposed in Committee. It also begs a number of questions: from whom will the specified information come, what form will it take, what evidence will be required to support it, what must be revealed to the licence holder, and so on? There is no question that, when considering whether to apply the relevant characteristic, a board could not have regard to hard information provided by a reputable source such as the police.

As drafted, the provision allows the board to take account of other issues, such as local experience, which the amendment would prevent. I understand that hon. Members are concerned that boards may exercise their discretion too freely and that their decisions may have important consequences for licence holders. We believe that the present wording allows boards to take note of their own or other parties' apprehensions that drugs offences may be committed at events held on premises in respect of which a licence application has been made. On the basis of that explanation, I hope that the hon. Member for Dumbarton will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McFall: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 2, in page 2, line 4, at end insert—

'(3A) The Secretary of State may, by order, prescribe the conditions which are to be attached to a licence or permission under this section, and an order made under this subsection may prescribe—

(a) the terms of any such condition; or

(b) the description of any such condition, the terms of which shall be specified by the licensing board, and such an order shall be made by statutory instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.

No. 3, in page 2, line 6, after 'above', insert

'or to the power of the Secretary of State to prescribe terms or descriptions of conditions under subsection (3A) above'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 10, leave out from 'board' to end of line 13.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 6.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Clause 1 allows licensing boards to sub-delegate some of their powers to set conditions to third parties. The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) tabled an amendment in Committee to remove the power of sub-delegation from the Bill, because it was felt that, as licensing boards were now being given a wide power to impose conditions directly under licence as opposed to using the byelaws route proposed originally, they should retain sole responsibility for their action.

I undertook to consult the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on the matter and to return to it when I had the convention's views. COSLA does not object to the retention of the provision, but it feels that a board's ability to operate the requirements of clause 1 properly would not be affected adversely if it were removed. In light of COSLA's response and the general feeling that the boards should be solely responsible for the matter, I accept that the reference to sub-delegation should be removed from the Bill. The hon. Gentleman will recall that that was his proposal in Standing Committee. Amendment No. 4 achieves that objective and, in so doing, I hope answers the question raised by the hon. Gentleman. Amendment No. 6 is a consequential drafting amendment. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. McFall: I thank the Minister for taking on board those concerns. We are satisfied with both the amendments.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: One practical matter arising out of the fact that there is to be no delegation of responsibility is that the board will have to meet formally to deal with such cases. Some consideration may have to be given to the fact that the board may have to meet at short notice and that may have administrative consequences for the licensing boards. Although I accept the amendment and the basis on which it has been proposed, boards may have to overcome some consequential administrative difficulties to fulfil their responsibilities which are incapable of delegation.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 5, in page 2, line 16, after 'condition', insert

'(other than the terms of any condition prescribed under subsection (3A) above)'.

No. 6, in page 2, line 18, leave out '(4)(a)' and insert '(4)'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

8.30 pm

Mr. McFall: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 2, line 24, leave out 'all reasonable' and insert 'such'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 26, in page 2, line 25, after 'steps', insert

'as appear reasonable to him'.

Mr. McFall: Amendment No. 25 affects clause 1(7) in which the Bill sets too high a standard and is not sufficiently subjective. That is a matter for debate, but I would like the Government to consider it.

Amendments Nos. 25 and 26 would ensure that the defence of reasonable compliance relates only to such steps as are reasonable to the licence holder, the employee or the agent. Under the Bill as drafted, the individual would need to take "all reasonable steps". I would ask the Minister whether it is reasonable to expect people to take every reasonable step. One can only expect people to take the steps that seem reasonable to them. Amendment No. 26 would inject some subjectivity into the test, instead of the absolute requirement that appears to be in the Bill.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We looked at the subsection quite hard. New section 18A(6) provides that a licence holder, his employee or agent shall be shall be guilty of an offence if he contravenes any condition attached to the licence or permission under new subsection (1).

To preserve fairness, new subsection (7) provides for a defence. As drafted, the defence consists of an objective test whereby the person charged has to prove that he took all reasonable steps to comply with the condition. That is a common requirement in law and is mirrored elsewhere in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. The court will judge whether each person charged took all reasonable steps.

Amendments Nos. 25 and 26 would introduce a different defence—that a person took such steps as appeared reasonable to him to comply with the condition. That is a subjective test. One person may consider that a token effort to comply with the condition is reasonable, while another might consider it reasonable to go to a considerable effort to comply with a similar condition. Such a defence would lead to inconsistency and unfairness and would undermine the criminal sanctions in the new section 18A. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take note of the argument and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Wallace: I support the Minister's comments. Amendments Nos. 25 and 26 would weaken an otherwise reasonable test, if I may use that word. At the end of the day, it must be for a sheriff or a jury to decide whether any steps taken were reasonable.

Mr. McFall: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 7, in page 2, line 31, leave out 'and'.

No. 8, in page 2, line 34, at end insert 'and

"prescribed conditions" means the conditions prescribed by the Secretary of State under subsection (3A) above.'.

No. 15, in page 2, line 38, at end insert—

'Conditions for existing licences

18B.—(1) This section applies to premises in respect of which a licence has been granted, whether before or after the coming into force of this section, under section 17 of this Act where no conditions have been attached to the licence in pursuance of section 18A of this Act.

(2) Where it appears to a licensing board that an event to which section 18A of this Act applies may be held on premises to which this section applies, the board shall convene a meeting for the purpose of attaching to the licence the conditions specified in subsection (1) of that section.

(3) The clerk to the licensing board shall, not later than 21 days before the date of the meeting to be held under subsection (2) above, serve on the holder of the licence and send to the chief constable a notice of—

(a) the meeting;

(b) where the Secretary of State has prescribed the terms of any prescribed conditions, such terms;

(c) in the case of any other prescribed conditions, the terms proposed by the board; and

(d) where the board proposes to attach any other conditions to the licence, the terms of such conditions.

(4) At the meeting held under subsection (2) above, unless the holder of the licence satisfies the board that no event to which section 18A of this Act applies will be held on the premises, the board shall attach to the licence the prescribed conditions and such other conditions as it considers necessary in the terms determined in accordance with subsection (5) below.

(5) In determining—

(a) whether the board is satisfied as mentioned in subsection (4) above; or

(b) what conditions (other than prescribed conditions) to attach to a licence or the terms (other than such terms as are prescribed) of such conditions,

the board shall have regard to any observations submitted by the chief constable and any other person or body mentioned in section 16(1) of this Act.

(6) Subsections (2) to (4) of section 16 of this Act shall apply in relation to any observations made under subsection (5) above as they apply in relation to any objection made under that section; and for the purposes of such application any reference in the said subsections (2) to (4)—

(a) to an application shall be construed as a reference to conditions proposed to be attached to the licence;

(b) to the applicant shall be construed as a reference to the holder of the licence;

(c) to an objection shall be construed as a reference to an observation;

(d) to the proper address of the applicant shall be construed as a reference to the address at which notice is served on the holder of the licence under subsection (3) above, and cognate expressions shall be construed accordingly.

(7) The terms of conditions to be attached to the licence in pursuance of subsection (4) above are—

(a) in the case of the prescribed conditions—

(i) where the terms of any condition have been prescribed, such terms;

(ii) where the description of any condition has been prescribed, such terms as the board considers appropriate;

(b) in the case of any other condition notified under subsection (3)(d) above, such terms as the board consider appropriate; and

(c) in the case of any condition not so notified, such terms as are agreed with the holder of the licence.

(8) Subsections (4) to (9) of section 18A of this Act shall apply to conditions attached to a licence under subsection (4) above as they apply to conditions attached to a licence under section 18A(1) of this Act.

(9) The clerk to the licensing board shall forthwith intimate to the holder of the licence—

(a) where the board is satisfied that no event to which section 18A of this Act will be held on the premises, that fact; and

(b) where the board attaches conditions to the licence, such conditions by sending to the holder of the licence a copy of the licence with the conditions attached.

(10) In this section "prescribed conditions" has the same meaning as in section 18A of this Act.'.

No. 11, in page 2, line 42, after '18A(1)', insert 'or 18B(4)'.

No. 12, in page 2, line 46, after '18A(1)', insert 'or 18B(4)'.—[Lord James Douglas–Hamilton.]

Order for Third Reading read.

8.33 pm

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I shall speak briefly and mention only one or two key points. The Special Standing Committee heard evidence from interested parties at sessions in Stirling, Ayr and Inverness. The hearings were a considerable success and made the future progress of the Bill more satisfactory.

The parties included such organisations as the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, Sheriff Neil Gow, the Law Society of Scotland, medical, health and education experts and the owners of venues for raves.

We listened to the concerns expressed in Special Standing Committee and decided to give licensing boards a free-standing power with a requirement to apply conditions where appropriate. Other changes followed the Special Standing Committee evidence, including a significant amendment enabling the Secretary of State to ensure consistency in practice throughout the country.

I believe that the Bill will make a valuable contribution to liquor licensing practice in Scotland. I have always said that it is a relatively limited measure, but it flags up our resolve to deal with the evil of drugs, to protect young people and to take every measure that is necessary in that process, of which this is merely one.

8.34 pm

Mr. Galbraith: In continuation of the spirit of which the Minister spoke—

Dr. Godman: My hon. Friend will be brief.

Mr. Galbraith: As my hon. Friend always says, I shall be brief. However, my hon. Friend normally follows that phrase with a 45-minute speech. I shall not do that.

Let me once again commend the procedure in the Special Standing Committee. I served on the Special Standing Committee considering the Children Bill, as did the Minister, and its scrutiny greatly helped that measure. This Bill was almost rewritten as a result of the same procedure and that is to be commended.

I also commend the speed with which the Bill has been introduced to deal with an identified problem. In many ways, legislation reflects the failure of society, as we have not been able to do the right thing without it. However, when it is necessary, we should introduce it quickly and make it short. The Bill is a model of that process.

Let me emphasise a point that I tried to make time and again on Second Reading. The Bill is not a drug prevention measure. On Second Reading, the Minister attempted to link it with drug prevention schemes in Scotland. It is a health and safety Bill involving raves. It is not a drug prevention Bill and the Minister demeans it if he persists with that idea.

Finally, I should like to address the criticism that we cannot have chill-out areas and various other facilities as that assumes that we are in favour of people taking drugs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) said, the fact that we have fire extinguishers in halls does not mean that we are in favour of fire and the fact that our hospitals have facilities for dealing with people who have been stabbed does not mean that we are in favour of people being stabbed.

Legislation has to consider the real world and not moralise about it. We must produce legislation not for the world as we would like it to be, but for the world as it exists, the Bill certainly does that. I welcome it, and commend it to the House.

8.37 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell: In the calm, rational and consensual atmosphere in which we have discussed the Bill this evening, it is easy to forget the tragic events that prompted it. Those tragic events caused great suffering to families, raised great apprehension in the minds of many people and created considerable public concern. The Bill would meet the difficulties that gave rise to that public concern.

One cannot always be 100 per cent. confident that a measure passed through the House will meet the problem for which it is designed, but it is clear from the spirit that has characterised not only the Second Reading debate before the Grand Committee—that was something of an historical first—but this evening's proceedings and the Grand Committee, on which I did not have the privilege to serve.

The Bill comes through proceedings with a considerable good will attached and a strong belief among those who had any responsibility for its passage through the House that it will meet the problem for which it was originally designed. I am happy to support the Bill on Third Reading; the sooner it is enacted, the better.

8.38 pm

Mrs. Adams: I, too, am happy to support the Third Reading. It has been a good Bill, a model of how to pass necessary legislation. By and large, we have been in agreement and we have tried hard to come up with answers where none existed before we began. As my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) said, this is primarily a health and safety Bill. If it saves just one life in Scotland, it will have been a success.

Over the past couple of years, we have all been confronted with worries about young people going to raves and places of great danger. I hope that the Bill has removed that danger, and that from now on young people will be able to spend time dancing without fear of losing their lives.

I know that some have expressed concern about the words "chill out". I am not too worried about chill-out areas—perhaps parents are more worried about them than children are, though. Young people know better what they are than we do: we are just not accustomed to the term. I sometimes think that a chill-out area in the House would not be a bad thing; it might help to pass legislation such as this in good order.

8.40 pm

Mr. Gallie: The term "ice hockey cooler" might also be useful in this context.

I too welcome the passage of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) referred to the tragedies that lay behind the Bill, which is what brought me to my feet. Many people thought that the impetus for the Bill came from the tragic events at Hangar 13, where there were three deaths. Sheriff Neil Gow's contribution, in the public hearing on the deaths that he held at Ayr, certainly influenced many people to think about a Bill such as this.

As for Hangar 13, I honestly believe that young people in my constituency would not have been deprived of their dancing facility if the Bill had been on the statute book before hand. It would have provided reasonable guidelines enabling the licensing board to stipulate the conditions for dancing to be allowed at Hangar 13. That would have been valuable indeed. Had there been controls on stewarding, paramedics and supervision inside the dance hall at an earlier stage, the closure might have been prevented.

I welcome the Bill and commend the Minister of State on the manner in which he has taken it through its various stages. I also commend all hon. Members who have participated in the debates.

8.42 pm

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: I too support the Third Reading of the Bill. It is a useful example of legislation arising out of specific circumstances and being designed to deal with them.

It is important to restate the fact that the Bill does not condone drug use. As I am sure all hon. Members agree, we should refute any suggestion that that is what it is designed to do. It is unfortunate that such suggestions have emanated from people such as whose who served on the former Glasgow licensing board. The position that the board adopted flew in the face of reality. The Bill is about dealing with real life—it is important that legislation should do that.

I recall Crew 2000 giving evidence to the Committee about Ecstasy-related deaths, pointing out that most of them resulted from the way the drug was used, not from the drug itself—an important distinction, which is acknowledged in the conditions laid down by the Bill. If it transpires that disparities arise across Scotland, from board to board, I hope that there will be an attempt to monitor and deal with them.

The Bill is a specific one, designed to deal with a specific problem. Were it designed to deal with the wider problem of drug misuse, it would be a very different kind of Bill, because drugs are used far more widely than just in clubs. A recent survey conducted by Britain's top selling teenage magazine, Sugar Magazine, came up with some startling percentages. Members may be surprised to hear that cannabis is used by 40 per cent. of teenagers, 3 per cent. more than use tobacco. It appears that it is more popular among teenagers than tobacco. Neither statistic is to be welcomed, and I certainly hope that the campaign against tobacco will not be won only at the expense of increasing cannabis use. The survey just goes to show that drug taking is now endemic among certain groups of teenagers.

This legislation cannot begin to tackle that problem, but I commend it for achieving what it attempts to do.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Northern Ireland (Elections)

[Relevant document: The Memorandum relating to this Order contained in the Eighteenth Report from the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, House of Commons Paper No. 34-xviii.]

8.45 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Ancram): I beg to move,

That the draft Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 29th April, be approved.

The draft order fills out the details of the mechanism by which the forthcoming elections in Northern Ireland are to be held. It fixes the date of the election at 30 May, in line with the Prime Minister's announcement of 21 March. Like the elections provisions of the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act under which it is made, it is for use at a single election only; thereafter, it will be spent.

All the most significant features of the framework for the election were embodied in the Act which was approved by this House and another place last week. Briefly, the voters in the election will be all who are entitled to participate in local elections in Northern Ireland. The election will be based on a constituency list system, and five delegates will be returned in respect of the participating parties from each of the 18 parliamentary constituencies in Northern Ireland.

In addition, a further 20 delegates will be returned at regional level—two in respect of each of the 10 parties gaining most votes on aggregate across Northern Ireland which have submitted regional lists. From those delegates will be chosen teams to participate in the negotiations, in accordance with section 2 of the Act; and they will together constitute the forum set up by section 3.

That is the structure of the Act which this order now has to fill out. For convenience, we have as far as possible sought to apply existing legislation with which those involved in electoral matters in Northern Ireland will be familiar. Thus, the order applies broadly the existing law relating to parliamentary elections, with only those modifications that we believe necessary to accommodate them to the electoral system set out in the Act. We believe that proceeding in this way makes the legislation simpler to understand and apply, and more manageable than trying to set out a comprehensive new code.

The part of the order which I know to be of particular interest to the participating parties in the election concerns the arrangements for nominating representatives to hand in their lists of candidates. The draft order originally provided that party lists should be submitted at the chief electoral officer's headquarters in Belfast. That has been changed in this order, so that they may be submitted to any of his offices, thereby introducing a local element to the procedure. He will be required by the legislation to give notice of precisely where and by when constituency and regional lists should be submitted. I am sure that nominating representatives from all parties will make the most of this opportunity.

We have also borne in mind the fact that this is a novel system of election, and that the electorate will need to be sufficiently well prepared to play as full a part as possible. We have therefore arranged for two leaflet drops to all of Northern Ireland's 590,000 households. The first leaflet alerted people to the possible need for an absent vote, explained the franchise and included a reminder of the need for a specified document to be presented at a polling station. The second leaflet, which will be delivered shortly, repeats the information about the franchise and specified documents, and explains how to vote and how the vote works. In addition, we have arranged a series of television and radio advertisements to encourage people to participate. These we will put out during the campaign.

The broadcasting media are an important part of modern elections, and it is important that their coverage serves the interests of voters. With that in mind, the Government have decided that, exceptionally for the elections, the provisions of section 93 of the Representation of the People Act 1983, relating to broadcasting, shall not apply. The unusual nature of the elections, involving votes for parties rather than individual candidates, means that the application of section 93 might cause problems in distinguishing the campaign in a particular constituency from that across Northern Ireland as a whole. We want to avoid potential for disputes between the parties and the broadcasters, with the consequences that that could have for electoral coverage.

The Government have presumed that broadcasters will share the view that the forthcoming important elections should be given balanced and fair coverage. That would reflect the inclusive nature of the approach that we have taken.

Mindful of the financial constraints on some of the smaller parties, we have made provision for unaddressed postal communications, which also need not state the name of the constituency. Nominating representatives and their parties will note that we have also applied provisions relating to electoral expenses for the election. I am sure that hon. Members will agree with me that limiting election expenses is an important part of our democracy, ensuring as it tries to do that an element of parity governs the electoral contest.

We could not simply apply the provisions as they stand for parliamentary elections, as those provisions relate solely to candidates. We have sought instead to apply an aggregate limit, the limit for each party being the limit for one candidate at a parliamentary election multiplied by the number of constituencies that it is contesting. We believe that that formula manages to preserve the principle of applying limits, while at the same time breaking the link with the individual constituency spending that has applied at other elections, by recognising that parties may wish, for example, to spend regionally rather than locally.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): Will the Minister assist the parties in Northern Ireland by stating what the total would be if a party decided to run five candidates in each constituency?

Mr. Ancram: If I have the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. It may be that I can give the hon. Gentleman the figures that will apply per party per constituency at that stage, and then allow him to arrive at the aggregate. His arithmetic may be every bit as good as mine.

We have tried to respond to some of the concerns that have been expressed by the parties. One example is the listing of the individual candidates who compose the constituency and regional lists. It would have been impracticable to include those names on the ballot paper, not least because it would have made it too large to fit on the shelf of a polling booth.

Instead, we have made provision, as I said during the passage of what became the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996, for lists of the names on the parties' constituency and regional lists to be displayed in every polling booth in every polling station in Northern Ireland.

The House may be interested to hear what provisions have been applied for the count. Hon. Members will be only too familiar from their own experience of the rules that allow us and our partners, together with all other candidates and their partners, to attend a count. The rules will be no different in this election. Of course, there could be a far greater number of candidates wishing to attend the count at this election than is usual, given that a maximum of 155 candidates could, in theory, contest one constituency alone.

We gave serious thought to the practical problems that admitting such numbers may pose. We concluded, however, that it would not be realistic to seek to exclude candidates from such a key process. They will therefore be admitted to the count proceedings, with party agents or sub-agents. We shall leave it to the parties to respond responsibly.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Does that mean that all 2,000 candidates will be allowed to attend the count?

Mr. Ancram: The counts will take place on a constituency basis, where the allocation of delegates from the constituency lists will be made. As I have said, in our view that gives a maximum at worst of 155 candidates in one constituency alone. We are leaving matters to the responsibility of those concerned to ensure that attendance at the counts is conducted responsibly.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): When will the votes be counted? Will the count be conducted the next day, or on the evening of the election?

Mr. Ancram: In due course, I shall give the hon. Gentleman the reference in the order. They will be counted the next day. The count will start the following morning. It is right, in the circumstances, that it should be done in that way.

To return to the question of the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross), if a party stands in five constituencies, the limit will depend on the constituencies in question. The amount that would normally go to each candidate in a parliamentary election will be allowable for each party standing in any constituency. The important feature is that that money does not have to be spent in any one constituency by the party. The party might decide to have a more regionally based campaign, and use the resources in that way. That degree of flexibility is an important part of the process.

Mr. William Ross: If a party is standing in all 18 constituencies, it seems that the total expenditure could be well over £100,000.

Mr. Ancram: I shall give the hon. Gentleman the relevant amount, and he can make his own calculation. It is a similar amount to that which would be available to any candidate at an election. I think that the calculation was last made in 1994. Any party could receive only that amount times 18 if it stood in every constituency in Northern Ireland.

It is important that we proceed in this way. For example, the hon. Gentleman's party might decide that it wished to spend not the full allowance within each constituency but less in one constituency and more in another. It seems right that that flexibility should be allowed. For that reason—to create what we hope is a flexible system on behalf of the parties—we decided to operate in the way that I have outlined.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Paragraph 76(2A)(a) and (b) give the block figures—£4,642 for a county constituency or a borough constituency, with an additional 5.2p for a county constituency and 3.9p for a borough constituency. We are not asking the Minister to engage in any mathematics. Do these figures apply per candidate or per party per constituency?

Mr. Ancram: They apply per party per constituency. What is entered in each constituency is a party list. The hon. Member for East Londonderry, who is an accountant, could make the calculations in his head far more quickly than myself. It is right that we allow flexibility, to ensure that the money can be spent regionally as opposed to merely locally. We have tried to allow parties the maximum flexibility in conducting their campaigns.

I have presented the scheme and some of the detail of the draft order. Much of the order recreates existing legislation. There are some technical terminological changes to address the particulars of the elections that we shall see take place on 30 May.

Dr. Norman Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Minister mentioned the role to be played by both television and radio. What of newspapers?

Mr. Ancram: Obviously newspapers have an important role to play, but, as the hon. Gentleman will know, there were no restrictions on the way in which newspapers conduct themselves during election campaigns. I was referring to the removal of the provision which is normally applied in elections, because of the nature of this election. We look to the broadcasters to operate responsibly in the interests of fair coverage during the election.

The order represents the most reasonable approach to adopt, in the complex and technical body of electoral law, to the requirements of the forthcoming election. I commend it to the House.

8.58 pm

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I am grateful to the Minister for his introduction. I judge from the way in which we have started that the debate will liven up as people get into their mathematics. I was confused immediately, but, as people become clearer on the issue, there will be more coherent questions.

Let us not pretend that we will give the order the scrutiny it deserves, or that the way we are dealing with it is in any way satisfactory. I started considering the order at the earliest possible moment late on Monday afternoon.

[Mr. Tony Worthington]

I know that many other hon. Members will have had considerably less time to consider it and will not have been able to scrutinise it adequately, as I have not been able to do.

The order is important, because we hope that, against all the odds, successful all-party talks will take place following the election. If those talks are successful, the lives of all people in Northern Ireland will be transformed, but if some of the order is wrong, the only people who will be benefit from it are those who are not trying hard for a full peace and a broad constitutional settlement.

I raise those points because it is better to anticipate them now than for them to be used to upset or to cause controversy at the election—although I realise that we cannot amend the order, so the choice is whether to vote for or against it. We know that, were we successfully to vote against it, we would derail the elections, so it is not much of a choice.

This is a difficult order, because it is a mongrel election—it is unlike any others. In some respects, it is like a local election—the electorate is a local government electorate. In relation to the rules that are being followed, such as, for example, those on free post, it is like a general election. It also attempts something for the first time in Northern Ireland: a party list system, with a party rather than an individual as the candidate.

The Government said that they went about this in the simplest possible way: by not attempting to bring in major, new and substantive legislation. It is an incredibly difficult order, because it is possible to make sense of it only by reference to large parts of other legislation that are not in the Bill. It is impossible to make sense of the order without looking up 1983 and 1985 Acts. Whatever the outcome, however, we should congratulate the parliamentary draftsmen, who have had to struggle with a beast not of their own making. If, having produced the order, they are now brain-dead, I would sympathise with them.

Mr. Ancram: They have been stimulated.

Mr. Worthington: They have been stimulated by the production of the order, but it has had less than a stimulating effect on me. I suspect that some of the parliamentary draftsmen may be sleeping for several weeks after producing it.

Let me go through some of the points that have occurred to me in reading the legislation. On page 2, paragraph (6), will the Minister explain why he has taken his decision on overseas electors, and what is meant by "overseas electors" in this context? Is it simply people from Northern who are temporarily away from home, or is it long-gone expatriates? In the case of some interpretations of overseas electors, it would not be too serious, but if it is genuine Northern Ireland residents, members of the forces or others, it is an unfortunate decision, if I have read that correctly.

We have talked about election expenses. Again, I am by no means certain that I have read this correctly, but the point is important. The parties that are represented here will want to understand it, and to have it explained clearly by the Minister.

As the Minister will know, in a general election, there are tight restrictions on what candidates can spend in their constituencies, but no restriction on what is spent nationally—whatever "nationally" means in this context—by the parties. In the Bill, we see the familiar restrictions on constituency expenditure, but this election is different, because the candidate is the party, not an individual. Is it real to impose those limits in relation to constituencies, because the literature and propaganda for the whole of Northern Ireland are likely to be the same as for a part? The issue is the same in every constituency.

I know that that is an academic question for most parties, because they simply do not have enough money, but there may be parties with a lot of money to spend. Is it the case that there is no limit on the amount that can be spent on the election by those who have the money? There seems to be no restriction on expenses. A large amount can be spent Provincewide or UKwide, and the only limit on expenditure is the amount that people can raise. Perhaps the Minister will explain that.

The order contains no reference to rules about broadcasting. It is unfortunate that it was only in his speech and not before it that the Minister referred to the suspension of section 93, which deals with the rules that broadcasters have to follow.

I understand that their public service role, which places an obligation upon them in elections to give even-handed coverage to all parties, has been suspended. I suspect that public service broadcasters may still want to fulfil that role, but did the Minister means that there is no duty upon broadcasters to be even-handed to all parties, as happens in other elections? I should welcome some clarification.

I hesitate to return to the subject of party names, on which the Government made such a mess.

Mr. William Ross: Given that some moves are afoot in various parties in the House to have PR elections, should not this aspect of the legislation put down a marker of which everyone should take note? If there is a multiplicity of parties, which occurs under PR, section 93 would have to be suspended in all future elections in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Worthington: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's point is valid, but I have enough difficulty learning for the present without trying to learn for the future. I hope that we shall all learn from this. Above all, I hope that the talks are successful.

As I say, I hesitate to return to the subject of party names, because the issue caused considerable contention in Committee. Schedule 1 (ii) allows some individual names on the ballot paper but not others, and that has been the cause of contention. I and may others cannot see the logic of it. In Committee, the Government said that the names could appear on the ballot paper only in the way that is set out in the schedule, but, of course, the law is only what appears in the Bill, and I cannot see where the Government get their authority for that in the legislation.

The law simply states that the Secretary of State shall cause to be published in the Belfast Gazette an initial list of the nominating representatives of the parties that are listed in the schedule. The Bill has been to the other place, and I assume that it has received Royal Assent and is now the law, but it does not state that the schedule contains the only way to describe these parties. There is no prohibition in the schedule or in the relevant clause on the use of other names.

Rule 6(1) states:

"A constituency or regional list submitted to the Chief Electoral Officer" shall state

"(a) . . . the name of the constituency;

(b) . . . in the case of a regional list, that it is such a list;

(c) . . . in the case of any list—

(i) . . . the name of the party".

There follow instructions about the address and so on.

Rule 12 states that a list

"shall be deemed to be valid unless and until the Chief Electoral Officer decides that it is invalid."

It says that the chief electoral officer may hold a list invalid only if the particulars of a party or candidates

"are not as required in rule 6(2) above"

or

"that the party is not a party listed in part II of Schedule 1 to the 1996 Act".

For the sake of argument, what would the electoral officer do if a party described itself as the Democratic Unionist Party (Ian Paisley)? It is undeniably the same party as the one listed as Democratic Unionist—DUP in the schedule. On what statutory basis would the electoral officer be able to deny its candidacy or change the way in which it is described? There may be a simple answer to that, but I raise it because the legislation is not clear.

We know what was said in Committee, but it is not clear in the legislation that a party cannot use some minor or major variation on its name as listed in the schedule. All that matters is that "the Chief Electoral Officer is entitled to hold a list invalid" only on the grounds that

"a party is not a party listed in part II of Schedule 1 to the 1996 Act".

That is very different from saying that a party has to use exactly the same words. For whatever reason, a party might put its name forward in a different way. It would be a bold electoral officer who rejected the party on that basis, or sought to change the name by which the party described itself. I am open to explanation by the Minister. The Government made their intention clear during the debate in Committee, but I query whether they have been made explicit in the Bill.

Finally, there has been some controversy about the postal ballot arrangements, which were being centralised. Will it be possible to make postal ballot arrangements on a local, rather than a Northern Ireland, basis?

As I said at the outset, I have gone through the order in a short time and raised the questions that occurred to me. It is unfortunate that we are dealing with it in this way, because we will be denied the immense wisdom of lawyers outside Parliament and other people who know electoral law, who could have pointed out other discrepancies. I look forward to the Minister's response to my points.

9.12 pm

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): We are confronted this evening with the Elections (Northern Ireland) Order, which consists of no fewer than 30 pages of tightly packed amendments. The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) has done a good job in wading through it in the time at his disposal. He and the House know that they have had a chance only to scratch the surface of the order. Much more needs to be said.

I deeply resent the fact that names are not to be included on the ballot paper. Like it or not, the names of individual candidates have a bearing on whether a party gains votes in a particular area. Leaving names off is much to be regretted and bitterly resented.

The issue has been raised of the sums that can be spent in the elections. Several parties in Northern Ireland have no difficulty in raising money. They go along with a balaclava and a gun and ask for it. I suspect that one or two parties will have enough money to fight the election and spend the full sum.

This process is regarded by people in Northern Ireland as another step along the road to meeting the IRA deadline of 10 June. The Government are trying to create a body that will be powerless. Thanks be to God, though, the people of Northern Ireland, like people elsewhere in the United Kingdom, value their freedom and the electoral process, and are intent on making full use of it. I have no doubt that, whenever the forum is elected, the Minister will find considerable difficulty in trying to restrict what it says. It will, like all elected bodies, slowly but steadily acquire power.

We are faced with a order of 30 pages of amendments to the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996, the Representation of the People Act 1983, the Representation of the People Act 1985, the Elected Authorities (Northern Ireland) Act 1989—four Acts of Parliament, three of which deal purely with representation of the people, and the latest Act, which was, of course, passed by the House last week—plus the Representation of the People (Northern Ireland) Regulations 1986, the Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1992 and the Election Petition Rules 1964. The order amends four Acts of Parliament, two sets of regulations and one set of rules.

Every one of those bodies of legislation is complex enough in itself and very difficult for the ordinary citizen, coming face to face with it for the first time, to understand. They all set out penalties for transgression, up to and including the disqualification of candidates and persons elected. The correct procedures for the elections can be determined only by reading the list of changes in those 30 pages across the previous Acts, regulations, and so forth, to which they refer.

As it happens, the order was considered at yesterday's meeting of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, of which I am a member. I should like to apologise on his behalf for the absence of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), the Chairman of the Committee, who is unavoidably absent from this debate. I think that he would have been very happy to say some of the things that I am saying.

We were advised that the procedure being used to make the changes was simple. As a Member, I am the first to accept the logic of that advice. The procedure is simple and easy for us in this place and those who concoct amendments to Bills to understand. It is presumably also easy for lawyers to understand. Indeed, the field is a paradise for lawyers, so I do not see how anyone in the time available could have gone through the order in the detail that is necessary to be certain that everything is absolutely correct, as is essential in such orders.

[Mr. William Ross]

The elections in Northern Ireland are not all going to be run by lawyers. They will be run by ordinary men and women, who will have to run elections for their party, or, occasionally, for themselves or for a friend who is standing as an independent candidate. If one is, say, a lay member of the population in Northern Ireland, without any legal training or qualifications, one might be lucky because at least one would have an excuse when acting as an election agent.

A trained lawyer will not have that excuse. Such trained lawyers will find that they are supposed to have a total grasp of the huge and complex body of legislation and the effect that each and every one of the 30 pages of amendments have on it. Yesterday, the Committee took the view that such a procedure was simply not good enough. The Committee said that the legislation and the rules should be plain and easy to understand. This is, after all, legislation dealing with the electoral process and the basic right of democracy—the right of people to vote.

The Committee also noted that very few people would have all the necessary Acts, rules and regulations. I inquired for them at the Vote Office this morning, but they were not there, and they are not there yet. The reason is that such documents dating from 1964 are not held in this place. One must ask how hon. Members were to start the cross-referencing work, even if we had the time to do it this week. How were we to get the documents? They were not available. One would have to go to the Library to get the file copies and sit down with a couple of wet towels and ice around one's head while one waded through the whole thing.

Mr. Robert McCartney (North Down): Recently, I was the senior counsel for the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron) when he was faced with an electoral petition, and I therefore had cause to peruse in great detail the electoral provisions as they then stood. I can endorse entirely everything that the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) has just said.

It is not just a question of it being difficult for a layman: I can assure the House that, for a senior counsel of 20 years' standing, the problems then presented by the representation of the people legislation were immense. Now that this new batch of legislation has been added, those problems will be far beyond the ken of any layman, and will strain the resources of many trained lawyers.

Mr. Ross: We have just heard one of the most eminent barristers in Northern Ireland—a man who has acted in the courts on this very issue—explaining how difficult it is for lawyers. I would say to the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney)—meaning no harm to his general profession—that the only defence that any defendant in such a case could have now is the fact that he is not a lawyer. He might plead ignorance, which, although it is no real defence, might make the judge look more kindly upon him.

No civil servants—either from the Home Office or the Northern Ireland Office—were present at the Committee last night to answer questions, and the Committee did not take kindly to that. I hope that the House will realise that the Committee members were in some difficulty, because we knew that the legislation was necessary, and that the elections could not be held without it.

We therefore adopted the device of publishing immediately an extract from the Committee's 18th report, which sets out our opinion. This has been available in the Vote Office today. The Committee members point out in the extract their regret that a full text of this legislation has not been published so that people could see the whole electoral law for this election set out in a single and cohesive structure. Even at this late stage, the Government should go down that road.

The Committee says in its paper that it does not wish to draw the attention of both Houses to the instrument. But the object of having the paper in the Vote Office is to draw the attention of this House and the other place to the failings that we find in the legislation. I therefore hope that the Minister will take on board the views of the Committee, and no doubt we will hear more about this later.

As an annexe to the paper, the Northern Ireland Office memorandum of 26 April has been published. It is labelled in the paper in the Vote Office as a memorandum from the Home Office, but that is a humbug that we are prepared to put up with in this place sometimes to give information to hon. Members and to the world outside.

The Committee's view was that there should be a full text for the benefit of those who have to operate within the legislative framework created by the original legislation, as modified by the order. That is not so much a view as a vital necessity if we are to avoid the possible consequences of getting the whole process wrong.

Even when the order has been sorted out, the problems will not be over. The timetable for elections is always tight, even in an election where the rules have long been in existence and are well understood by those participating in and organising it, and by the lawyers who usually deal with any thorny problems that come up. But on this occasion, we do not have that advantage of time.

This stuff appeared only within the last few days. We simply do not know what will be acceptable. If we wind up in the courts, we could find, far too late, that a whole party has been disqualified. People could be chucked out if they get it wrong—I do not think that I am going too far in saying that. That is a possibility. I hope that the Government have taken that on board, or perhaps they are deliberately refusing to do so. This is a serious matter.

We also have all the hullabaloo about application forms for postal votes. They are to be available only to the individual applying to a central point. Why should that be so? That has never been the case before. It was possible for someone to go along to the electoral office to get a form for themselves and their neighbours.

The application form is not a postal vote; it is only an application form. It is up to the chief electoral officer for Northern Ireland, formidable man that he is, and his assistants, to determine whether an application is correct and should be granted. It has been the practice to give a number of forms to the parties and the candidates. People should find it easy to vote. Surely it is part and parcel of our democratic standards and procedures that we should not try to make it difficult to vote.

But in Northern Ireland during the past 20 years, there has been the hullabaloo about getting the forms, the problem of identification whenever we arrive at polling stations, and the difficulty sometimes of getting to polling stations because of security arrangements. Voting has been made incredibly difficult for people. It is all right for those of us who run elections and are being elected—we know what we can and cannot do—but the ordinary citizen votes once every four or five years, and, if they are refused a vote because they do not have the correct documentation, they go away and do not come back.

During the Bill's passage last week, I asked the Government to take on board the necessity of keeping a record of the people who were refused a ballot paper, and the reasons for it. I fear that that has not been taken on board. Why are the chief electoral officer and his officials so anxious not to get the facts? This is a matter about which we have complained in this place and in Northern Ireland for years, but no one wants to know.

No one wants to know why fewer people vote in Northern Ireland. The answer is simple, and glaringly obvious. Sometimes it is hard to lay one's hands on the necessary document. Some people do not have any acceptable document.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux) pointed out this evening that this election takes place at the end of the month. The old-age pensioner will be trotting along with her pension book. If it has no valid payment order, it will not be good enough. That might be the only document that thousands of people have. There will certainly be some who will not have a valid pension book, and that may be the means by which they are denied the right to cast their vote. That is not acceptable. It is about time that the Government got their finger out and found out how many people are refused.

Above all, it is about time that the Government got their finger out and had a single document, such as a proper identity card, with a photograph on it in Northern Ireland. If there was a photograph, even of the standard that one sees on passports and driving licences, it would at least give some idea. Photographic machinery has improved enormously and most of us recognise ourselves even if we are not too pretty. If we had that, everyone would know that they had to take it with them, and everyone would know that, if they presented it, they would be given their ballot paper.

We know that there are those who practise intimidation and others who have been stealing the document known as the medical card, which we were told by the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron) is so easy to forge. All that would disappear. There seems to be no desire to make life difficult for the evildoer, only for the law-abiding.

In his opening remarks, the Minister said that the nominations for candidates would be submitted at different places. He did not make it clear, at least not to me, whether the nominating member from each party had to be present, or whether an agent, the candidates or somebody else could hand in the paper on his behalf. What we have seen so far is not good enough.

Will the Government, even at this late stage, do a full print of the legislation, so that we know a little more about where we are and so that those involved can work through the legislation and keep within the law and proper procedures rather than go through what I believe will turn into chaos as a result of this incomprehensible order.

9.31 pm

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): This is the third time in as many weeks that we have dealt with the election in Northern Ireland. The only motivation driving my party in that respect is the hope that we shall have a full complement at the all-party negotiating table. We knew that an election was unnecessary to enable parties and groups to come to the table, but because of certain requirements and self-imposed obstacles of other parties, we are in this position.

We have an ad hoc position, an ad hoc proposal, ad hoc legislation and now an ad hoc order. Like many hon. Members who have already spoken, I believe that it would be dishonest to pretend that we have had anything other than a superficial look at the document—superficial not only in terms of what is before us, but in terms of what is not before us. As has been said, it would need several constitutional and electoral lawyers to give us any idea about the quagmire in front of us.

It is in that context and with tongue in cheek that I tell the House that I obtained a copy of the order yesterday and tried to pick out one or two things that were perhaps obvious, but I am sure that there are many subversives in it that will not surface until they hit us hard during the election campaign.

I must refer to the order by page numbers because it is difficult to know what section we are talking about. On page 13, there is a reference to section 144(2C) of the Representation of the People Act 1983, which deals with the validity of an election. It states:

"Where the election court determines that the election of a delegate or delegates of a particular party was void but that the election as a whole in the constituency to which the petition relates was not void, the return of delegates under paragraph 14 . . . shall be calculated again and the votes given for that party in that constituency shall be disregarded."

I am not sure that I understand that. I understand what it says, but I am almost frightened of its implications.

It appears to be saying that, if a nominee of a party in any constituency for some reason transgresses the complexity of this and other legislation—ignorance of the law being no excuse for good or for evil—and he is declared a void delegate, the entire party in that constituency is declared void. His colleagues will be deemed not to be delegates because of his illegal act, even though they have not committed a wrongful act. Is that the right interpretation of the order? It seems to be confirmed in section 157(2B), which states:

"Where the election court determines that the election of a delegate or delegates of a particular party was void but that the election as a whole in the constituency to which the petition relates was not void, the court shall not order a fresh election."

The party groupings will be dependent on the absolute integrity and validity of every candidate in every election. This is a huge and complex document and it has huge ramifications. Perhaps the Minister can answer that point in his reply.

I refer to rule 1 and to the timetable. The nomination papers will be submitted to the chief electoral officer—he is required to validate nominations within one hour for other elections. Is rule 1 telling us that, if we allow for various bank holidays and the like, two days are to elapse before the candidate or series of candidates will know whether they are validly nominated?

[Mr. Eddie McGrady]

The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) said that there is some concern about the practicality of the administration of the election and the centralisation of almost everything to the chief electoral officer. There is no hint that the normal devolution of authority will take place through the deputy electoral officer and other officers. It appears to me that the validation of postal applications—as well as the issuing and researching of them—will be centralised. That is totally at variance with our normal practice. It is administratively clumsy and will lead to all sorts of complications and challenges.

Rule 29, on page 20, relates to the information that will be given at polling stations. During consideration of the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Bill the Minister said that there would be a simple electoral process for the voter—that he or she simply had to put an X on the ballot paper. He then succumbed to pressure that a lot more information would be required regarding all the candidates and parties, both for the constituencies and for the regional listings. It was decided that the booth, as opposed to the polling station, should contain that information.

Can hon. Members envisage a voter going into a booth—which is usually a small, square box—and having a number of posters around him with up to 135 names on them? Would it not be simpler to have that information in the polling station, in a much more legible form than could possibly be contained in a polling booth? The Minister made the distinction between a booth and a station. I should like that to be clarified. Will he emphasise the party aspect of the electoral process rather than the candidature of the various persons?

I should also like clarification of rule 32, which relates to the candidate and/or his agent having access to the polling stations. Will the Minister explain, in simple terms, how many agents would be appropriate in a constituency, according to the legislation? Would it be one for each party, or one or more for each named person on the party list?

Rule 57 is simple: it refers to the layout of the ballot paper, and the possibility of vertical columns. At this point, however, the mind begins to boggle—the mind, that is, of the straightforward, honest-to-God voter coming in to put an X on the ballot paper. Throughout his voting life, he has been used to reading a list and then putting an X against the name of the appropriate person or place. Now he is to be confronted unexpectedly and, I think, unnecessarily—that is my point—with a columnar ballot paper. That may be all right for the sophisticated, but I do not think that it is all right for many people who make a great effort, and a great sacrifice, to go to the polls and do their best according to their conscience. I ask the Minister to reconsider. Such complexity should not be brought into play, especially in constituencies in which only five or six parties, not 30 or 31, will participate.

Page 24 of the order deals with amendments to section 7 of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985. Much is made of the requirements of postal votes; there are a good many minor amendments. Let me tell the Minister that, even at this early stage—perhaps in anticipation of the order—applications are being made for postal votes in cases of absence and sickness, and votes by proxy, on the basis of the existing format of the forms. The Minister is now changing that format unnecessarily. Will the changing of the word "the" to "a", or the other way round, invalidate applications that have already been made, or, indeed, invalidate the electoral officer's entire stock of application forms?

The important aspect of the elections is the simplification of the apparent over-complication of the 1985 Act. As I have said, the act of voting is straightforward: it involves putting an X on a piece of paper. We must be careful not to confuse the voter unnecessarily. There must be a balance between full information, presented clearly and well, and information presented in such a complicated form that it makes it difficult or impossible for the ordinary man, woman or youth to vote logically.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The hon. Gentleman referred to applications for postal votes. People throughout Northern Ireland have already received letters about that. Could not the ambiguity that is obviously not apparent in electoral offices—where people have been told that they cannot take copies of the original forms—lead to confusion in the minds of others? If applications are turned down now, a person receiving another application form may wonder what is going on, and perhaps forget to send it back.

Mr. McGrady: The hon. Gentleman has made my point about postal votes rather better than I did. Applications have already been made, and the attitude of the chief electoral officer is that no one can make an application without obtaining an application form from him. According to the legislation, that is entirely incorrect.

Mr. Ancram: This is an important point. The chief electoral officer will accept the information needed for a postal vote application and is not worried about the form.

Mr. McGrady: I thank the Minister for that important clarification, which will be welcome to the activists on the ground in Northern Ireland who are already engaged in the election.

Rev. Martin Smyth: We appreciate the guidance that the Minister has just given, but can he assure us that the officials in the various electoral offices have been given that information, because no later than this morning they were saying something entirely different? It is important that there is consistency among the electoral offices.

Mr. McGrady: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Unfortunately, it is not within my power to reply on the Minister's behalf—as yet. No doubt I shall be glad to do so at some future venue on some future date.

The issue of identification was raised on Third Reading of the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Bill in the small hours of last Wednesday morning. We attached importance to the problem of impersonation, particularly in certain areas. In response to a colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron), the Minister suggested that he would give further consideration to the subject of the eradication of impersonation—multiple impersonations. When he winds up, will the Minister address that problem?

We must all admit that this is an unsatisfactory way in which to deal with the situation. But we shall all do our best to run with it because the prize is beyond price. If the negotiating talks take place on 10 June, the prize of peace and stability in Northern Ireland will be worth all the heartbreak, despair and annoyance that we have suffered over the electoral process. My party would like to give it as fair a wind as possible, to enable the people to be represented—in the broadest sense—at that negotiating table.

9.47 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): I can certainly follow from where the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) left off in terms of saying that the provision is unsatisfactory. The hon. Gentleman considerably understates the case—the measure is a grotesque affront to the democratic process; it is a contempt of the House; it is a most disgraceful way for a Government to behave. If one was looking for an example of bad practice, the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office has provided it with the legislation.

I listened to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington), who spoke on behalf of the official Opposition. He suggested that he first laid eyes on the legislation some time on Monday afternoon. He is one of the less favoured ones—some people saw it before then. Would the Minister like to intervene and give us the full list of those he favoured with a draft copy of the legislation last week? Did he send it to the leader of the Provisional IRA-Sinn Fein organisation? Did he send it to the loyalist paramilitary organisations of the Progressive Unionist party and the Ulster Democratic party? Did he send it to other parties that are not represented in the House?

Mr. Ancram: It is important to make it clear that, in light of the short time scale, I thought that it was proper that the party leaders of Northern Ireland parties represented in the House should have an advance copy of what was then an incomplete draft—those who received it know that it contained some hieroglyphics. Copies were sent to the party leaders of all parties from Northern Ireland represented in the House, including the leader of the Democratic Unionist party, the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), who speaks for the Opposition on the subject, and the Liberal spokesman.

Mr. Robinson: The Minister confirms that a draft was available last week and that he was prepared to ignore the existence of hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland constituencies in this House by refusing to make it available upon request—even when hon. Members said that they would be leading for their parties in the debate.

We are supposed to have an intelligent debate about a complex measure at short notice. It was made clear to the Minister that, although he had sent a copy to my hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. I. Paisley), I would not see my hon. Friend before I left for the United States. Therefore, I sought a copy before I left the country and the Minister refused to allow his staff to fax one to me. I did not receive a copy of the measure before today, so any remarks that I make tonight have the degree of preciseness that one would expect to gain from a cursory glance at 30 pages of legislation.

The legislation cannot be read in isolation. One must refer to a stack of other legislation, as each part of the schedule refers to a section or a clause from some other legislation. When I sought to obtain the associated legislation from the Vote Office today, I was told that it was not available to hon. Members. I had to go to great lengths to secure it.

The hon. Member for South Down described the election as an unnecessary creation of the Unionist parties. Of course, political parties do not need to hold an election in order to sit down and participate in negotiations. If constitutional parties in Northern Ireland had wanted to engage in negotiations, they could have done so. But that is not what is proposed by this process. The hon. Gentleman hopes that those who are not members of constitutional political parties and those who do not have an electoral mandate will be brought into the process. Clearly, if people have no electoral mandate, there is no justification for their presence, other than allowing them an opportunity to secure such a mandate. At least the election gives people that opportunity.

The scrutiny of the measure is limited not only by the short period that hon. Members may debate it in this House, but by the type of debate that we are having. We are considering it as an Order in Council on a "take it or leave it" basis. Of course, we know that it is the latter as the Government will trundle the measure through the House as they did with the rest of the legislation—without any opportunity to put forward amendments or to test the validity of the many complex issues in this instrument.

I do not share the faith that the Minister and some other hon. Members have in our broadcasting media. I do not believe that the broadcasting media will make valiant efforts to be fair-minded, balanced and even-handed in reporting the election. If they do, it will be the first time without a legislative requirement. Hon. Members know that the media will undoubtedly allow representatives of the IRA to appear on programmes with those of other political parties as though the IRA were a normal political party. While the Government will not sit down with the Provisional IRA, because of the legislation, parties in Northern Ireland will be required either to sit down with the IRA or to opt out of the opportunity of speaking on television programmes.

Mr. William Ross: The mere fact that the Government do not appear to sit down with the IRA does not prevent them from sending other members of their party to do it for them.

Mr. Robinson: No.—particularly when it is someone who has flown kites for the Government on a number of issues. I shall not test your patience, Madam Deputy Speaker, by going off at a tangent on that issue; however, many people may consider that the Government had greater knowledge of such contacts than they would like people to believe.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that there will be a greater demand for engraved watches in the near future.

Mr. Robinson: Yes—no matter what the inscription may be.

[Mr. Robinson]

To be honest with the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie, there is no reason why political parties will find it difficult to operate within the limits that are laid down in the order. Indeed, when the system is applied to the whole of Northern Ireland, costs will be reduced considerably as the larger political parties will send out the same literature in South Down, North Down and other constituencies unless, as the Ulster Unionists appear to do, they want to concentrate on local candidates. However, there is absolutely no reason why there should not be considerable savings on printing costs, which are a major expense in an election campaign.

I have no difficulty with the amounts that are specified, but nor will any political party that wants to go beyond those limits. Provided that they hire the right lawyer, they will be able spend whatever they want. The hon. Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron) has already raced a coach and horses through that legislation. Anyone who feels that the figures are a wee bit tight should not be too concerned. They will simply have to spend an extra few thousand pounds on a proper defence thereafter.

The Minister would be disappointed if I did not raise the matter of party names. As I understand the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations etc.) Act and the list in schedule 1 to that Act, it states that the only parties entitled to stand in an election are those on the list. It contains no requirement—I shall be interested if the Minister can draw my attention to one—for nomination papers to refer to political parties by the names that are listed in the schedule to the Act.

I shall be interested if the Minister tells me that I am wrong, but if I am right, neither the Act nor the elections order specifies how parties should present themselves. It specifies the parties that are on the list, but it does not state that they have to present themselves under those names.

There is precedent for that. I am a member of the Ulster Democratic Unionist party. That is the official title of my party, but I have never stood as an Ulster Democratic Unionist party candidate. I have never put that name on the ballot paper. I have stood as a Democratic Unionist candidate, a DUP candidate, or even as a Democratic Unionist-DUP candidate, but I have never stood as an Ulster Democratic Unionist party candidate.

Under past procedures, there was never a requirement to put alongside my name on the nomination form the official name of my party. Nor do I see in the election order any requirement for me to specify my party in the terms that it is in the schedule to the entries and negotiations measure. Again I look to the Minister for advice, as he may be aware that this matter is likely to be tested.

If parties are not prepared to stand for election under names other than the ones that they present to the chief electoral officer, what powers does he have to change their names or to remove them if they are clearly the parties included in the schedule to the Act? I see no such power given to the chief electoral office in this order. The Minister therefore needs to turn his mind to the problem. He should not assume that what he says in the House becomes the law. The established law allows political parties to describe themselves in whatever form they wish—the precedent for that is clear. If the Minister does not sort out this question, there wil be considerable difficulties with the nominating process.

It would seem, moreover, that the tossing of a coin will decide which candidates are selected in some cases. Besides the other farce of the whole system, if there is a tie for votes, the outcome will be decided—what could be fairer?—by the drawing of lots, the tossing of a coin or the drawing of straws. I do not have a clue what the Minister was thinking of, but surely he could have found a more scientifically based system. If he is short of ideas, might I suggest that the party that has contested the smallest number of constituencies should be entitled to the disputed seat? We can presume that a party with a candidate in another area might at least have received one vote—

Mr. William Ross: I am sorry to interrupt remarks with which I agree, but does the hon. Gentleman recall that, if there was a tie in a parliamentary election, it was decided by counting the pink ballot papers in the box?

Mr. Robinson: Yes, those are the papers given when someone has stolen his vote. That would certainly cast the whole system into considerable doubt. Another idea would be to lock the two candidates in a room and see which one came out. The Minister must have a better idea than casting lots. Imagine arriving at the forum and bumping into another delegate who stated that he was elected because he called tails. It is farcical to choose people to enter a mature forum so as to take part in serious negotiations in this way. The Government could surely have done better.

The hon. Member for South Down mentioned vertical and horizontal ballot papers. The Government have provided for something akin to a Littlewoods football coupon, on which people can choose numbers across the paper or down the paper, or across and down. I can think of nothing more likely to lead to confusion for the voter. Northern Ireland's voters have had single transferable vote elections, first-past-the-post elections and European-style elections with the whole Province involved; but they have never been faced with a ballot paper that goes across as well as down. I would not like to represent the party stuck somewhere in the middle of the paper, rather than at the top left or top right. A distinct advantage would be attached to the placing of a party on the paper if it were different from a standard ballot paper on which the parties are listed one below the other.

No matter how long the ballot paper—it could be the length of a toilet roll—Northern Ireland's voters have always been used to the names of the parties appearing one under the other; and the chief electoral officer would be greatly mistaken if he produced a different ballot paper that led to confusion and advantaged some parties at the expense of others.

I say that in the context of someone who has an alphabetical disadvantage. My surname starts with the letter R, and usually places me fairly close to the bottom of the list. I am never at the very top of the ballot paper, as some Members have the good fortune to be. I would rather be towards the bottom of the ballot paper, however, where there is one continuous list, than somewhere in the middle if names are to go across the page as well. I hope that the Minister will think twice and give advice to the chief electoral officer not to take that route.

We have an election that was set to meet an IRA deadline. We have a system that was rigged to ensure that certain gunmen would get to the negotiating table. We have a ballot paper that the Minister tried to determine to the advantage of some and the disadvantage of others in terms of the names that would be permitted on the ballot paper. In addition to all that, we have a system that is nothing short of a farce in its operation. The best that I can say to the Minister is that the parties in Northern Ireland will contest the election in the hope of producing a satisfactory result, not with the Government's help but in spite of the Government.

10.6 pm

Mr. Ancram: With the leave of the House, I shall reply.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) is upset that I was not able to make available to him an early draft of the order. I felt that it was an important courtesy to allow the party leaders to have sight of an early draft. It was an exceptional step to do that. I thought that it would help. The normal procedure would have been to wait until the order was published, which was on Monday. I am sorry that what was intended to help the parties, including the party which the hon. Member for Belfast, East represents, has caused him such distress.

For all the remarks of the hon. Member for Belfast, East, the drawing of lots is a normal procedure for both parliamentary and European elections in the context in which we are discussing the order. In my experience, it has been used. It is for the returning officer to decide on the method to be used.

Mr. William Ross: What about the pink ballot papers? Is it not laid down in legislation that they are to be used as the determining factor?

Mr. Ancram: I am saying that the drawing of lots is the system used in both parliamentary and European elections. In the context of the election that we are discussing, which will involve party lists, we felt that it was the best system to use. I believe that that is the position where there is a parity of votes.

Mr. Ross: Surely the system, whatever it may be—I object to what the Minister has been saying—would apply only to the last seat and not to any of the first four.

Mr. Ancram: The context in which it is applied is in relation to the aggregating of votes. I think that that is dealt with in paragraph 6. It applies where the aggregated votes are equal. The process will be used to decide whether they are in the top 10 and, therefore, get the two top-up seats. Lots will be drawn. It is proper that that should be done in those circumstances.

Several hon. Members have talked about party names on ballot papers. The point was raised originally by the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington). It is an important matter and I would not wish there to be any misunderstanding. The Act determines how party names appear on the ballot paper. Paragraph 7(2) of part I of the schedule prescribes that the ballot paper will show the names of the relevant parties for each constituency. I am informed that the effect of the legislation is that the names will be as set out in part II of the schedule.

As for the consequent effect of that provision, if a list is submitted in the name of a party where the designation is different, the chief electoral officer must reject that list under rule 12(2)(c) of the election rules on page 18, which refers to the breach of requirement in paragraph 6 in part I of the schedule. He could also make a rejection under paragraph 12(2)(b) on the ground

"that the party is not a party listed in Part II of Schedule 1 to the 1996 Act".

I want to make this clear in case there are any efforts to produce different names. That is the effect of the legislation and the chief electoral officer will act accordingly. I hope, therefore, that there is no doubt about that, because it is an important point in terms of the way in which the elections are to be conducted. I would not want any party to find that its lists were rejected because of a misunderstanding on that point.

Mr. Worthington: This is a serious point. Both the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and I read that and I think anyone else reading it would not draw the inference that the Minister has drawn about the naming of parties. Does that mean, that, if the Green party, instead of putting down "Green party" puts down "The Green party", or if Independent MacCaffer puts down "Independent Ignatius MacCaffer", their names will be ruled out? The law does not state what the Minister says it states.

Mr. Ancram: During the previous debates on the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc.) Act 1996, I have stated its intention. I have confirmed today that I am reliably informed that that is the effect of the legislation. A constituency or regional list must state the name of the party under rule 6(2)(c), on page 18 of the order. If the party is not a party listed in part II, schedule 1 of the Act, the list must be rejected under rule 12(2)(b). I make that very clear. The hon. Gentleman recognises that this is an important and serious point and I wish there to be no misunderstanding. That is why we spent some time on the issue during the passage of the legislation.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ancram: I give way, but it is at the expense of being able to answer other questions.

Mr. Robinson: The Minister and a court could not judge that the "Democratic Unionist party (DUP—Rev. Ian Paisley)" is not the same party as the one in the schedule. We are talking not about whether the party is the same, but how it will be described on the ballot paper. Nothing in the legislation would disallow the party from putting down the name that it chooses.

Mr. Ancram: All I can say is that I have made clear what I understand to be the legislation's effect and what I am reliably informed is the effect. I hope that that is clear to all the people who will be submitting party lists for the election.

A number of other points were raised. Obviously, in the time available, I will not be able to cover them all. On broadcasting, section 93 of the Act deals with broadcasting related to constituencies or electoral areas. In this election, as with a general election, broadcasters must ensure that their coverage of the campaign generally—national or regional—reflects their obligation for balanced and fair coverage. It is only the difficulty of distinguishing constituency coverage in this election that has led us to decide not to apply section 93. It is sensible in that context.

[Mr. Ancram]

A number of questions were raised in relation to election expenses. Of course, normally, limits apply to candidates and not parties, but this election creates unique circumstances. We saw no reason why the principle of limits should not apply to this election too. It is fair to say that we should agree that the principle of limiting expenditure is a fundamental part of our democracy.

We wanted to retain the limits for the election, but we decided to apply them on an aggregate basis to the parties contesting the election. The current limits apply for candidates in a constituency at a parliamentary election. Those will apply to a party in a constituency and, if a party chooses to contest six constituencies, it will have six times the limit.

As I have said, we envisage that the spending will not be necessarily tied to any particular constituency, which is why we have made provision for an aggregate limit. That limit allows for more flexibility and means that there will not be parties that, because they have vast resources outside, can exceed those limits. Generally, we have come to a balanced view in terms of the legislation.

I say to the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) that I realise that this is complex legislation. I noted what he said about the order, but the procedure is not unusual. The Representation of the People (Northern Ireland) Regulations 1986 for the European Parliamentary elections were produced in exactly the same format as the order. As I say, it is a complicated matter, but, if the hon Gentleman goes through the measure as I have done, he will find that many of the provisions suggest no modifications and that much of the existing electoral law with which the hon. Gentleman is as familiar as I am, will still apply. I hope that in practice the outcome will not be as complex as he thinks. I ask the House to approve the order.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 29th April, be approved.

Northern Ireland (Deregulation and Contracting Out)

10.15 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Sir John Wheeler): I beg to move,

That the draft Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 7th March, be approved.

The order has two clear objectives: to introduce deregulatory measures that will remove burdens on business, and to remove statutory obstacles to contracting out. In so doing, the order follows and builds on the general thrust of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994. In Northern Ireland, we have already launched a programme of deregulation and contracting out. Much has been achieved and much more can be achieved. I shall later touch on that.

The Government have sought to release British business from the shackles of unnecessary rules and regulations. Our aim is to work towards fewer, better and simpler regulations—both new and existing. Small firms in particular stand to benefit from such moves. Excessive paperwork and unjustified interference burden and harm management, taking it away from running businesses. It costs managers time and money and stops them employing people. Surveys carried out in Northern Ireland by the Northern Ireland Small Business Institute have identified regulations and associated paperwork as ranking among the top four problems facing small business.

The Government's competing for quality policy is focused on improving the quality and value for money of our public services. Contracting out is a keystone of that policy, but there are some areas of Government business where the opportunity to test whether a function can be done more efficiently or effectively is being denied by some small but significant legal obstacles.

The order will bring an element of consistency between Northern Ireland and Great Britain. Its measures are reasonable and sensible, and the evidence of that is the small but valuable response to our consultation exercise, which was open to all members of the public. Comments were specifically invited from 300 individuals or bodies with a particular interest in the order and 18 responses were received. Each was carefully considered and individually addressed, but no amendments were considered necessary.

I thank hon. Members for their written comments. In particular, I am grateful to the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) for his correspondence on the handling of Northern Ireland legislation. I trust that, from the responses that he has received from my noble Friend Baroness Denton, he appreciates that his comments have been given lengthy and careful consideration. I shall later draw attention to our stance on the use of enabling powers in the order.

The House may find it helpful if I deal with the subjects in the measure in the order in which they arise, starting with deregulation. As I said earlier, good progress is being made. Through the deregulation initiative, businesses in Northern Ireland and throughout the United Kingdom are already benefiting. For example, 500,000 of the smallest businesses no longer need to have their accounts audited.

Taxation and national insurance systems are being streamlined—one important example is that there is now a single point of registration for VAT, national insurance contributions and pay-as-you-earn. Some 30 sets of health and safety regulations have been repealed as part of a programme to cut the rulebook by 40 per cent.

I know that the deregulation policy may give rise to some misapprehensions, so I emphasise that deregulation does not mean the reduction or removal of necessary safeguards. Our priority is always the proper protection of the public interest. Building on the 13 specific deregulatory changes benefiting businesses in both Great Britain and Northern Ireland in the 1994 Act, the order adds a further six deregulation provisions that will be of particular benefit to Northern Ireland business.

Three articles introduce further deregulatory change to Northern Ireland legislation in line with the 1994 Act or deregulation orders made under it. Article 4 removes statutory constraints on measuring a pint of beer. The Government believe that the consumer is quite able to determine what a pint of beer is. Article 6 removes restrictions on Sunday sporting activities. Article 7 removes constraints on totaliser operators in relation to deductions from stakes. That provision follows a Great Britain order made under the 1994 Act's enabling powers.

The remaining three provisions are unique to Northern Ireland. Article 3 removes the requirement to license premises used for horticultural processing. Article 5 removes redundant controls on local auctions. Article 8 removes the requirement for taxi drivers to sit a separate driving test to obtain a taxi driver's licence, while safety continues to be assured through the good conduct and character check tests.

The other side of the matter is how the measures are to be enforced. Businesses complain that they often incur unnecessary costs to meet the demands of overzealous enforcement officers. They also suggest that they should be able to challenge enforcement officers' decisions at an early stage and that when a formal decision has been made, their rights of appeal should be clarified and the appeal procedure should be speedy and inexpensive. The Government recognise those concerns. We believe in ensuring that the manner of enforcement is as fair, transparent and consistent as possible. That is stated in article 9.

Article 10 sets out powers to introduce model appeal provisions that will provide a clear procedure to help businesses to appeal enforcement decisions.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I am listening to my right hon. Friend with considerable interest because this is a matter of great importance to Conservative Members. In England, when we dealt with appeals, several Conservative Members suggested a local mechanism using the magistrates courts, so that, if an over-zealous official, as in the Lanarkshire blue cheese case in Scotland, got it wrong, the case would not to go on and on through various appeal courts but be dealt with locally by the local magistrates. Is he aware that, although the matter was raised two years ago, it has not been resolved and that the Minister responsible in England has proposed a statutory instrument that is no more than a discussion document on whether the appeal system should be local or national? Could he assure the House that in Northern Ireland, we will not go down the same bureaucratic road where nothing happens except talk about local appeal mechanisms?

Sir John Wheeler: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is something of a renowned expert in such matters and devotes a good deal of his remarkable zeal and energy in testing out such procedures and assumptions. I am not personally familiar with the Lanarkshire blue cheese case, and as far as I know, we do not have a similar problem in Northern Ireland. I think that I can assure him, however, that the procedures that I hope that we shall be pursuing in Northern Ireland will entirely fulfil his expectations of expedition and simplicity. That is perhaps one of the benefits of Northern Ireland being able to pursue its own administrative arrangements in the way that I am describing.

The other part of the order relates to contracting out. Contracting out is a major component of the Government's policy on competing for quality. The policy is set out in the White Paper "Competing for Quality", which was published in 1991 as a companion document to the citizens charter White Paper. Together, those important policy documents had a single aim: the safeguarding and improvement of our public services, for the benefit of the people who use them, at a cost which the taxpayer can afford.

The competing for quality programme has been the main driving force in delivering the very real benefits of competition within government. The evidence is clear. In just three years, from 1992 to 1995, of a total of £2.6 billion of UK activities reviewed, annual cost savings of £540 million were found. In Northern Ireland, £58 million-worth of services have been reviewed, achieving total savings of about £9 million a year. That is a substantial achievement, yet savings have not led to poorer service or lower quality—quite the reverse. Users have benefited from higher quality, backed by specific contract conditions and innovation in the way in which services are delivered. The savings produced are re-channelled, either to enhance services for the same spend or to provide more services overall.

One example of the benefits to be had from competition can be found in the contracting out of the computer bureau service that the Department of Finance and Personnel provided to Northern Ireland Departments. The value of the service was £6.25 million, and £1.77 million-worth of savings were produced a year.

Another example is the Department of Agriculture's market testing of an inspection service related to the payment of subsidies. The market test was won in-house, making savings of more than £250,000 in 1995-96 from a total service cost of £1.3 million—a saving of a little more than 22 per cent.

With so much to gain, it is important not to let the on-going process of opening up competition be obstructed by unnecessary statutory obstacles. The order does not impose contracting out, it merely allows it. It will be up to central Departments, district councils and non-departmental public bodies to choose whether to use the freedom that the order provides to enable contracting out to take place. I would welcome a move to competition, and I feel that the public bodies concerned will wish to do so in their own interest and those of the taxpayer, but the order will enable, not compel.

[Sir John Wheeler]

Measures in the order such as articles 11 and 12 are simply common-sense amendments. They enable the Official Receiver and Registrar of Companies to delegate functions to their own staff, in so far as they do not already have power to do so. They will also enable the registrar and the Official Receiver to contract out certain functions, such as the incorporation of companies, receipt of company documents and statements of affairs in cases of bankruptcy and insolvency.

The provisions in articles 13 to 15 deal with the important areas of accountability and contract conditions and make it clear that the accountability of Ministers is not diminished if a service is contracted out. Nor will contracting out affect the responsibilities of office holders or Departments in relation to services affected by the order. It is the work that is delegated, not the responsibility.

Confidentiality is also a matter about which concern has been expressed about the contracting-out process. Article 16 gives effect to schedule 4, which contains provisions modifying certain restrictions on the disclosure of information to contractors. The measures provide that restricted information may be disclosed to authorised contractors where this is necessary to enable the contract to be performed. They also ensure that contractors are subject to the same safeguards and sanctions in relation to confidentiality as is the contracting body.

Article 18 and schedule 5 of the order remove specific statutory obstacles in relation to the agricultural census and dog control services provided by district councils and the administration—but not adjudication of entitlement—to housing benefit. Most of those reforms follow the practice in Great Britain, but there are two departures in the order from the approach taken in the 1994 Act, the first on the Sunday betting provisions. Those provisions were subject to an extensive public consultation exercise, and the results showed that a substantial body of public opinion in Northern Ireland was opposed to any relaxation of the present legal position. The Government have listened, and a policy decision has been made not to include the provisions in the order.

Secondly—this is the enabling powers issue to which I referred earlier—the Government have decided not to include a general order-making power similar to the 1994 Act. We have taken into account the legislative implications and potential loss of parliamentary scrutiny. Such a general power would have enabled Northern Ireland Orders in Council to be amended by subordinate legislation without reference to Parliament, where the aim is to effect deregulatory change or to remove an obstacle to contracting out.

That situation would have been substantially at odds with that in Great Britain, where an effective system of parliamentary checks has been put in place. Again, we have listened to concerns and responded by making it the rule not to include a general order-making power. Hon Members will be right to surmise that every rule has exceptions, and article 17 is that exception. This refers to a special order-making power for social security legislation alone. Its inclusion recognises the need—out of fairness—to provide for parity of treatment for social security provision between Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Not to include such a provision would delay the start of Northern Ireland businesses enjoying the benefits enjoyed by their Great Britain counterparts in an area where it is policy and practice that concurrent action is the norm. In addition, without the power, should changes be introduced under the order-making powers in the 1994 Act which impact on claimants, differential treatment for Great Britain and Northern Ireland claimants could result.

In conclusion, the Government believe the order to be sensible and reasonable. Its intention is to add to the considerable progress already made in the UK and to remove obstacles within Northern Ireland that stand in the way of the proven benefits of deregulation and contracting out. The order is entirely consistent with the Government's on-going desire to reduce the regulatory burden on business, to enable our companies to compete more effectively and to help boost economic prosperity to the benefit of all the people of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

I commend the order to the House.

10.34 pm

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): As the Minister said, large parts of the order replicate for Northern Ireland much, although by no means all, of the parallel legislation for the rest of Great Britain, the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994. The objections that the Opposition raised to that legislation still apply.

When the then President of the Board of Trade, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), introduced that measure, he said:

> "No advanced society can manage itself outside a regulatory framework. Indeed, it is impossible to contemplate the sophisticated assumptions on which we conduct our everyday lives without the underpinning of regulation."—[Official Report, 8 February 1994; Vol. 237, c. 147.]

We agree with that.

Furthermore, we would go on to say that regulation, of itself, is neither good nor bad. It has no intrinsic merit and it is not necessarily harmful. Regulations have to be effective and responsive. There are good and bad regulations. When it comes to the burden of regulation, the Government certainly know how to regulate, but they seem to be unable to tell the difference between good and poor regulation.

The cost of dogmatic deregulation can, most topically, be clearly seen in the case of the deregulation of the rendering and animal feed industry. That has led directly to the spread of scrapie and bovine spongiform encephalopathy, with potential consequences for human health because of the link to Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, putting lives and an entire industry at risk, with who knows what cost to the taxpayer.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this is not the time for the Government to be considering contracting out tuberculin testing, which has traditionally been carried out by veterinary surgeons? Does he further agree that consumer confidence throughout the United Kingdom, which must be built up, is very much dependent on tuberculin testing being carried out by qualified veterinary surgeons, not contracted out to lay persons?

Mr. Dowd: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern in large measure. We have recently seen the difficulties that the Government and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have run into with our European partners because their yardstick of what are reasonable actions do not correspond with that of our partners. That has led to our current difficulties. That impacts on the Government's approach to many things. They approach things in a dogmatic fashion and are pulled up short only by events and experience.

As far back as June 1989, the Government's consultative committee on research into spongiform encephalopathy, the Tyrrell committee, published a report which called for a survey of the brains of cattle routinely sent for slaughter in order to monitor the incidence of unrecognised infections. Despite repeated calls from the Opposition, the Government have ignored the advice of their scientists.

The Government also rejected Labour amendments to the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 for the banning of advertisements for dangerous knives and weapons for which there is no conceivable legitimate use. They did so on the ground that the Advertising Standards Authority had power to deal with the problem.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), the shadow Home Secretary, brought to the attention of the ASA some specific advertisements for horrific weapons such as the Rambo short sword and the SAS shoulder holster knife, the chairman of the ASA, Lord Rodgers, stated that the authority had no powers to ban such advertising. The Government's reliance on that secondary measure was proved to be not only ill founded but completely untrue.

The Children Act 1989 stipulated the need to ensure that all those providing out-of-school activities were registered. This impacts on what I said earlier to the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs) about the Government's efforts being overtaken by events. The Government were right to introduce such a measure then and to relax the regulations covering the vetting of staff working with children in playgroups and other similar out-of-school activities would be little more than a perverts charter. Parents throughout the country would be horrified that the Government were even thinking of removing that protection from their young children. It was only the recent tragic and desperately horrific events in Dunblane that prompted that reconsideration of the Government's proposals.

The Minister mentioned removing the burden on business. In 1979, "Butterworth's Company Law", the almanac of company law, consisted of just under 500 pages. Its annexe described 80 different forms that a company may be called upon to fill in. The most recent edition of that textbook—I believe that the print size is identical—runs to more than 4,000 pages and the annexe contains 265 different forms that a company may be called upon to fill in.

To confirm the difficulties that small firms have over filling in too many forms, there is the example of a service sector firm with 25 employees which responded to the Association of British Chambers of Commerce small firms survey and said:

"Please can we have less paper/form filling/regulations! We have been in business since 1982 and the amount of time taken out of management time to reply to letters/forms etc. has probably quadrupled."

I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Conservative party has been in office throughout that firm's lifetime. The quadrupling of time and effort put into meeting regulations has taken place entirely under this Government. That helps us to learn much more about the Government's approach to deregulation. They have been responsible for much of the regulatory burden placed on small businesses.

The Department of Trade and Industry's deregulation task force identified 3,500 regulations that could do with significant amendment or abolition. More than 70 per cent. of those have been introduced since the Conservative party took office. This measure is truly a cure for a disease that is largely of the Government's making. There is a clear inability to recognise regulations that need to be lifted and those that are required, as the right hon. Member for Henley, then the President of the Board of Trade said, for our "advanced society".

The Government have made great play of how the private finance initiative will come to the aid of the public purse. The biggest potential area for partnerships between the public and private sectors is in local government. To be sure about the legality of deals with local authorities, potential private sector partners have to seek legal advice on parts IV and V of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989, 17 different sets of regulations and orders dealing the local authority capital finance and local authority companies and 15 sets of regulations dealing with the detail of capital finance. It is no surprise that the private finance initiative is languishing in such a manner.

Small firms have grappled with the uniform business rating system. Many firms thought that the idea of a uniform rate was a good one, but they have been put off by the system that the Government have created. Current legislation is contained in two statutes and 140 statutory instruments, many of them amending pre-existing regulations. Steve Cherry, British Telecom's head of rating and valuation, who represents the Confederation of British Industry on the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors national committee, said:

"The rate demand on a property used to be easy to understand . . . The business community wishes to see a system which is clearer to operate."

The Government have responded by blaming Brussels for the increase, certainly in recent years, in the amount of regulation going on to the statute book. In fact, fewer regulations come from Brussels than come from Whitehall.

The Internal Market Commissioner, Mr. Bangemann, has singled out the United Kingdom for being over-zealous in adopting too many national regulations to implement the single market programme. The Republic of Ireland has felt it necessary to enact only six pieces of legislation to enforce 415 European laws, while the United Kingdom has felt it necessary to enact 235 pieces of legislation. The Institute of Directors has called this process gold plating.

In March, a dairy farmer in Hampshire was forced to close because he could not afford to install new bottling equipment to meet the requirements of the 1992 European directive on dairy products. However, the Commission disclaimed all responsibility by pointing out that the law in question allowed the member state flexibility when interpreting the directive. Neither the local authority nor the Ministry of Agriculture, will take the blame.

Mr. Steen: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to question the principle of gold plating. The Government have recognised that officials, quite wrongly, have added to directives from Brussels to pander to their own interests and for convenience. The Government are now acting on that. I shall tell the hon. Gentleman something about which he will be much more concerned—

[Mr. Steen]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Gentleman will have to tell the House later, as his intervention is too long.

Mr. Steen: With respect, I am just getting to the point that I want to raise.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman has passed the point.

Mr. Steen: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I had merely introduced my question with a statement. I was about to come to my question. With respect, my introduction was only three or four sentences long. I ask to be able to complete my question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman cannot complete his question. He obviously needs to make his point in a speech. Interventions, by their nature, should be short.

Mr. Dowd: I will not respond to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), except to say that I believe that the Procedure Select Committee is looking at the changes that are needed in this regard. At the moment, we have the odd spectacle where the Ministry is claiming one thing but permitting an entirely different thing. Clearly, there would be worries for Northern Ireland legislation in the same way.

Mr. Steen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the problem with Europe is not so much the directives as the way that rules get around the European Parliament and the Council of Ministers? Up to 4,000 rules are coming into Britain and are being put into law without Parliament even seeing them.

Mr. Dowd: There is a problem, but, as I outlined earlier when contrasting the approach of the Government of the Republic of Ireland with our Government, Britain is developing a reputation for being the most officious in the way that it introduces many of the changes that our European partners have no difficulty in accommodating. I refer to the recent example of the change to metric weights for foodstuffs. The European regulation became more complicated than it actually was because of the way in which Whitehall interpreted it. I shall make a few more points before I—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the points of the hon. Gentleman relate to the order. He seems to be straying.

Mr. Dowd: The Minister outlined the general purpose of deregulatory legislation, and I am merely picking up on his points.

The deregulatory measures are a curious assortment of makeweights. Of the six that are mentioned by name, three were introduced by this Government; one was introduced by a previous Conservative Government in 1957; one was introduced by a Labour Government; and one was introduced in 1695—I do not know which Government were in power then.

I refer to the horticultural produce provisions that state that the Food Safety (Northern Ireland) Order 1991 can safely deal with this issue. When that order was advanced in 1991, why was the relevant section of the horticultural produce provisions not repealed at the same time if it was performing the same purpose? The Weights and Measures (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 allows brewers to get their pay-off. I have seen figures that show that it would cost an additional 7p to ensure that all customers get a full pint—which is, after all, what they order. Whether we believe that or not, if it is taken at face value it suggests that the brewers are currently conning every customer in the pub out of 7p for each pint that is sold.

I draw the Minister's attention to the proposal for review of the Repeal of Auctions (Local Control) Act (Northern Ireland) 1957. He will know—especially in his capacity as a constituency Member—that Westminster in particular and, to a lesser extent, Camden have had considerable difficulties with bogus auctions in and around the Oxford street area. Members of the public, particularly tourists, are being rooked right, left and centre, and local trading standards officers believe that the current legislation is inadequate for them to protect visitors and residents.

Article 9 of the order provides for a considerable extension of powers. The Minister sought to downplay that, saying that it related merely to the enforcement regime, but article 9 extends powers not just to Ministers but to Departments. Elsewhere in the order, a Department is defined as "the Head of such a Department".

Powers are being transferred to civil servants as well as to Ministers.

The Minister said that the arrangements were different from the legislation in Great Britain. Legislation governing the rest of the United Kingdom provides that before any deregulation order is made, the Minister must "consult such organisations as appear to him to be representative of interests substantially affected by his proposals".

There is no equivalent in the order, although, as it contains deregulatory measures, I imagine that taxi drivers, for example, must have been consulted. I hope that the Minister will tell us whether those consultations will continue, or will take place if they have not yet occurred.

Article 10 explains how the provisions with respect of appeals will be prescribed. This relates to points made by other hon. Members. I seek an assurance that the provisions will not be used to undermine either employment protection or equality legislation—I shall return to that shortly. The part of the order dealing with contracting out is resented and opposed—or, at least, its implications are opposed—by many people throughout Northern Ireland. I admit that the Minister said that this was enabling legislation that would not necessarily make the arrangements compulsory, but I suspect that everyone realises that contracting out and the privatisation of many of the functions concerned will follow as night follows day.

The order also has implications for fair employment, policy appraisal and fair treatment guidelines and, in particular, women's employment. The background is significantly different from the background to regulations in Great Britain. The Minister will be aware of a report by the Equal Opportunities Commission for Northern Ireland, which highlighted the disproportionately disadvantageous effect that contracting out in the health and education boards has had on female employment in particular. So disproportionate has that effect been that the commission called for the whole process of contracting out and privatisation to be suspended until the problem had been properly dealt with.

We are told:

"It is difficult to see how compulsory competitive tendering could have been introduced in the way it was if a PAFT"— policy appraisal and fair treatment—

"analysis had been made of its potential impact. PAFT offers us a way by which government departments can work together with different constituencies at community level to assess policies and ensure that they will undermine rather than compound inequalities in the labour market."

Government activity is now clearly aimed at regulations, the bulk of which they have introduced themselves. That has not gone unnoticed in Northern Ireland, as elsewhere. I was intrigued to note that, at a recent dinner, Mr. Howard Hastings, the chairman of the Northern Ireland division of the Institute of Directors, slammed the contracting out of public sector services. I believe that the Minister's colleague, Baroness Denton, was present at the dinner when Mr. Hastings criticised the Department's performance, and said:

"Unfortunately, ministers cannot treat policies like Pepsi Cola, for changing the colour of the can will not make unworkable policies any more palatable . . . The public sector has been subjected to everything from Next-Steps Agencies to devolution and delayering . . . We have now reached the point in some agencies where the logo has become the more important than the logic."

As the Government continue their pursuit of the structure of a minimalist state, we see them repeating the "Animal Farm" mantra of "Public sector bad; private sector good". They should demonstrate an objective commitment to improving public services, not an insensitive ideological determination to undermine them, which the order represents.

10.55 pm

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): We come to the second order of the evening, in which we have some interest, not least because, on 21 January 1994, my right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux), speaking in a debate, said:

"We must not be stalled by those who decline to move with the times. We should not ignore the stimulus contained in this week's Deregulation and Contracting Out Bill, which applies to Northern Ireland and bears the name of the Secretary of State. The powers to repeal and amend in the first four clauses could provide a solid launching pad for a campaign to open doors and gates that have remained closed for far too long."—[Official Report, 21 January 1994; Vol. 235, c. 1165.]

The Bill applies to Northern Ireland, but we find ourselves, two years later, removing some obstacles to the Bill's full implementation that should surely have been noticed and dealt with in the schedules to the original Bill. I hope that the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, who is to reply to the debate, will explain why it is necessary to deal with the matters in this way, and why it has taken two full years to catch up with the situation in the rest of the United Kingdom.

I have with me the 13 reports of the Select Committee on Deregulation, of which I am a member. I can also say for the second time this evening that I am also a member of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. The Chairman of the Deregulation Committee, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field), has written a number of letters to various Ministers asking why Northern Ireland was not included whenever something was deregulated. There is no good reason why that should not be so. I have raised that point several times during meetings of the Committee, and I have not been given a totally satisfactory answer.

We have been told on the Floor of the House over the years that it was necessary in order to preserve the Northern Ireland statute book. We have been told that it was necessary because the Northern Ireland statute book had to be preserved intact for the day when there would be a parliamentary legislative structure in Northern Ireland.

As that dream slowly fades, the Government should step closer to the real world and recognise the changes that have overtaken the issue of a devolved administrative structure for Northern Ireland over the past 25 years. They should not be so anxious to preserve that statute book; it could simply be brought back into being if a future legislative Assembly, should it ever come into existence, wished to do so.

I believe that it is not necessary, for that reason. I believe also that the sort of delay represented by this order will be a hindrance to Northern Ireland and will keep it lagging behind Great Britain—not only in terms of the measures mentioned this evening, but in other areas also. If would often be easy to include Northern Ireland in the deregulation orders affecting the rest of the United Kingdom.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Does my hon. Friend accept that most people in Northern Ireland agree with his argument—particularly about measures that improve the quality of life? However, there are those who would question whether we should always rush along the materialistic road down which the Government have taken us at times. We want to uphold some spiritual values in Northern Ireland, rather than joining the Gadarene swine.

Mr. Ross: I accept that my hon. Friend speaks from a theological position, but I ask him to be an evangelist in this instance. We should try to export to the rest of the United Kingdom the spiritual values that we in the Province hold dear. It would not be the first time that evangelists from the island of Ireland have converted the English. We shall try our best to do so again if we are given the opportunity.

Despite my hon. Friend's comments, I am in favour of keeping Northern Ireland in line with Great Britain. We should determine a United Kingdom position, which hopefully embodies the spiritual values of Northern Ireland. I hope that that will become general practice—it will certainly save the time of the House in many instances.

We must remember that all the items being deregulated this evening were included in the legislation that created them for a very good reason. In other words, they were created in order to avoid or to prevent an evil consequence or to correct an existing evil. Whenever we consider deregulation of any sort, we should ask ourselves why the original evil that we intended to avoid is now redundant.

[Mr. Ross]

That is the point of the Deregulation Committee. Hon. Members from all major political parties are represented on the Committee, and they probe, ask questions, request information and examine witnesses. Before anything is deregulated, it is explored more thoroughly in that Committee than is possible in a debate such as this, when several items are being dealt with together. I hope that the Minister will take my comments on board, and examine how we can integrate our deregulation procedures with those of the United Kingdom and the House as a whole.

We are told that the Horticulture Act (Northern Ireland) 1966 was chosen for deregulation because it has been overtaken by other legislation. But surely those who framed that legislation—which is also listed—could have repealed the Act at that time. In other words, there was a slip-up, and the Act was passed over. That should not happen.

We are told that article 4, which refers to the gas in foam on beer, brings Northern Ireland into line with Great Britain. There has been a row about that in the Common Market, but we now seem to have reached a fairly sensible conclusion.

Article 5 refers to the Auctions (Local Control) Act (Northern Ireland) 1957. The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) made the point that there is a problem with auctions in some parts of London. Are we repealing a power that was not widely used because those who would transgress knew about it? If so, we should think carefully before we remove that power. Sometimes the passive existence of a power is sufficient to stop an evil, and the law accomplishes its purpose without taking people to court.

Article 6 represents a further erosion of the Sunday quiet that we have enjoyed hitherto. That takes me back to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth). I believe that Northern Ireland is wrong to move towards making Sunday into just another day of commercial activity. The matter was debated in the House, but unfortunately the Government carried the legislation into practice. Although we were not in favour of it, it is now the law of the land.

I think that it was a mistake, and that, in future years, it will be seen as such and we shall have to repeal it. Such a change does not create freedom; it simply promotes a licence that is misused by many people for many different purposes.

Turning to article 7, the same general point could be made about the Betting, Gaming, Lotteries and Amusements Order 1985. Those matters are being dealt with in the Deregulation Committee.

In respect of article 8, I am curious as to why a taxi driver should be treated in the same way as any other driver. A taxi is a public service vehicle taking citizens and non-citizens around on their lawful business. I believe that people need the full protection of very high-quality drivers. That has been the case hitherto. It helps to keep cowboys off the streets and should not be abandoned lightly.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does that mean that the volunteers who drive people to and from hospitals are no longer required to get public service vehicle certificates, or does that requirement still exist?

Mr. Ross: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, which I hope the Minister will cover in his reply to the debate.

Article 9 permits Northern Ireland Departments to amend Northern Ireland legislation to include good practice procedures. We shall have to wait and see how that works out in practice.

Article 10 again permits certain changes in the Department of Economic Development, and gives it additional powers.

All those questions require answers. We cannot probe matters in the same way as the Deregulation Committee. The Minister may promise to answer our questions in writing, but that reply, with which we have become so familiar in appropriation debates, fails the test of public awareness. An answer is sent to an individual Member. It not on the record of the House or on the public record, and I hope the Minister will take that on board.

The contracting out part of the order brings Northern Ireland into line with Great Britain. There is much I could say about it, but I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. I have a problem with some of its provisions. The change to the dogs order is welcome, but there is a problem with the agricultural census order, and a particular problem with the social security administration order.

As for housing benefit, in Northern Ireland many citizens would prefer certain elements of confidential information to remain in the hands of Government rather than be transferred to private organisations. The safety of some people, such as members of the Royal Irish Rangers and police reservists, is paramount, and it is not beyond the realms of possibility for information to go astray once it passes out of the public domain and into private hands. Having said that, I give way to other hon. Members who wish to speak.

11.4 pm

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I have no problem with the contracting-out part of the order, but I have problems with the deregulation provisions. I always welcome measures that promote deregulation, and it was a pleasure to hear my right hon. Friend the Minister of State introduce the order in his normal inimitable way, which has been accentuated by the fact that it is his birthday today. What better way could there be of spending one's birthday than introducing such a measure?

I speak tonight because the people of Northern Ireland need to be warned: they must not have high expectations of the order. Our experience of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 shows that little has happened since in the United Kingdom. That Act took 16 hours and 11 minutes on the Floor of the House, and another 92 hours 56 minutes in Standing Committee. One would have expected that to produce an outstanding Act of Parliament.

In fact, the Act established the Select Committee on which the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) has had the privilege and honour of serving. It has not really been much of a privilege and honour, because the Committee has sat 34 times, each time for one and a half hours, and has considered only 24 deregulation orders. That must have been a galling experience.

The orders that the hon. Gentleman has considered with the Committee are to do with greyhound racing, parking equipment, and gaming machines; there have also been the long pull order, the length of the school day order, salmon fisheries orders, special hours certificates and the gun barrel proving order. I can understand the hon. Gentleman's frustration at serving on the Select Committee. He would certainly not want the same to happen following enactment of this order.

Apart from four of the orders, the rest of them combined save business £628,000. The gun barrel proving order saves just £200, but cost £9,500 to draft. The Committee itself has created a new tier of bureaucracy. It has four full-time staff, it spends £31,000 on printing its reports, and it introduces a whole new parliamentary procedure. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not want Northern Ireland to follow that example.

Deregulation in the United Kingdom is a new growth industry. It is one of the fastest growing industries we have, in fact. I congratulate the Government on privatising this new form of industry. Even The House Magazine is organising a conference on how the system of deregulation works.

On the one hand, we are repealing irrelevant regulations to do with tattooing and casinos, saving business virtually nothing; on the other, we still churn out domestic and European legislation with heavier compliance costs than all the savings made in the name of deregulation.

Another problem is that Opposition private Members use their time to introduce Bills that cost private commercial businesses a great deal of money. The new legislation on activity centres is a case in point; it will cost businesses £10 million to enforce the relevant regulations. I therefore hope that Northern Ireland will learn from our experience and not go down the same track.

Worse than all this is the rise and rise in the number of statutory instruments. Since Lord Sainsbury's task force report, which suggested repealing 605 regulations, we have passed 7,839 new statutory instruments. I hope that this order will not achieve the same in Northern Ireland. There is no point in repealing regulations if we pass more than 12 times as many new regulations at the same time.

If the Government really want to deregulate, they will have to halt the flow of new statutory instruments. Another solution—I do not know if it is included in the order—is to cut the number of officials. If we reduce their numbers by 50 per cent., they will not be able to enforce the regulations. That is probably the most effective way of dealing with deregulation.

In short, the 1994 Act has failed to help the small business man. I mentioned in my intervention—I know it was far too long, but I did my best—the model appeal system. That system was designed to help the small business man to appeal against an over-zealous official. Over-zealous officialdom is certainly one of the problems. Surely the way to deal with such officials is by way of a local procedure; and what better way than the local magistrates court?

Mr. William Ross: Surely one of the best ways to deal with over-zealous public officials is to ensure that they are liable for costs, unlike the case that he mentioned in Scotland.

Mr. Steen: Absolutely—the hon. Gentleman is right. The trouble is that, where the local authority is penalised, the individuals who in turn are penalised are council tax payers, not individual councillors. That is the problem.

We do not have a model appeal system that works, and we need one. All we have is a consultative draft statutory instrument for a model appeal system. Nothing has been done.

Deregulation is, of course, right. We all support it. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, on the Floor of the House, said to me in answer to a question on 25 May 1995 that deregulation is at the heart of our economic strategy. He was absolutely right. Unfortunately, it is not working.

There seems to be no willingness to tackle the real issues, which are health and safety legislation, fire regulations, food hygiene and employment law. No official and no Minister will take the risk of repealing any legislation involving safety, security or hygiene, in case something goes wrong.

It is understandable that officials cannot recommend to a Minister that he should repeal something that bears on hygiene, safety or security in the event that things might go wrong. An official's job would be on the line, as would the Minister's. All the way up the ministerial ranks, and all the way down Whitehall, more and more rules and regulations are being introduced on health and safety, fire controls, food hygiene and employment law. At least those involved feel safer doing that.

I am anxious that the order before us does not lead Northern Ireland on the route that I have described. I am trying to give Northern Ireland a warning that what happened in England might happen there.

I am all for deregulation—it is a tremendous idea—but it needs to work better. I hope that Members who represent Northern Ireland, who are in the Chamber in great force, will ensure that the Government do not introduce an order that they cannot implement.

11.18 pm

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): The hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) has reinforced my opposition to the consequences of the order. There is considerable and justified opposition to many of its provisions among the community in Northern Ireland. The order is at variance with the wishes of many local groupings and interests.

In introducing the order, the Minister said that he had received 18 representations. He did not say—perhaps he will correct me if I am wrong—that only four were in favour of it. The other 14 were opposed. That is a fairly strong indictment of the course of action proposed.

The consequences of this form of legislation and the continuing process of privatisation, agentisation, or what is now called, euphemistically, in Northern Ireland "externalisation", are diminutions of democratic accountability within the present system. That seems to be at variance with the exhortations of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and other Ministers that we should be trying to enhance democratic accountability. The order flies in the face of all that.

There are differences of requirement in the society of Northern Ireland when set against requirements in Great Britain. I listened to the arguments in favour of harmonisation, but there are many instances where the system does not lend itself to literal translation of GB to NI. Health and education are only two examples of that.

[Mr. Eddie McGrady]

The introduction to the deregulation section refers to necessary protection for consumers, employers and the environment.

A most startling omission is employees. It is mainly employees who will suffer when protection is removed. It is significant that employees are not mentioned at all in the introduction, and we may therefore conclude that they are being ignored. Additionally, part of the order's purpose is to remove consumer protection at a time when such protection needs to be enhanced, especially in horticultural food processing.

The deregulation provisions are of particular interest. I am no expert on the subtext of heads on pints of beer. The only thing I can conclude is that I do know what happens when several beers produce a head, which I carefully avoid. I am also confused by the fact that a legal duty to provide good measure has been totally removed. It is left simply, shall we say, to the good graces of the innkeeper or proprietor to provide not too much gas and a much greater property of liquid. I do not know how the innkeeper will respond to that, but I suspect that he will take a close look at what is gas and what is liquid.

Sport on Sunday is a contentious issue in Northern Ireland. The provision on that seems to have been just thrown in, without much consultation with the people and parties of Northern Ireland. I will probably be sat upon at home for hinting a warning about this. The Downpatrick race club, the oldest race club in Ireland, is anxious to be able to facilitate racing on a Sunday, so perhaps I am doing that community a disservice, but, in general terms, circumscription regarding keeping Sunday a separate day is not well removed without greater consultation.

Moving on quickly to taxi drivers, I simply repeat what was said. I cannot for the life of me see why people in charge of other people's lives in a public service vehicle should not have a more meaningful and exhaustive test than is provided by the order, which removes the current requirement.

The Minister made much of the cost savings that would occur in many of the order's sectors. The model appeal mechanism has been referred to. The hon. Member for South Hams said that a bureaucracy and costing system would be created by the necessity to police, as it were, the procedures on behalf of the offended parties. I doubt whether there will be any real saving, because other sectors will have to be brought into play.

Some of the Minister's examples on the contracting-out section were selective. He referred mainly to high technology and computerisation. Certainly, it was widely known in Northern Ireland in particular that many civil servants did not have a clue how to introduce computerisation into Departments, and should have had expert advice from outside before they engaged in it, so there is bound to have been considerable saving as they did not know how to do it in the first place.

On the contracting-out section, I am surprised to find that, in relation to the incorporation of companies, I think the Minister said, and to insolvencies, the registrar of companies and the insolvency agencies could be contracted out. In any commercial terms, those are sensitive areas. Until, for instance, incorporation is complete, contracting out would be extremely dangerous. The commercial sector will be wary of the fact that the details, the capital involvement and the persons involved would all be available to a private firm and would not be within the confines of the Government's privacy provision. I am worried about the consequences of that.

I shall pass quickly over the contracting out of dog control, but not because it is not important. Northern Ireland is a rural area and a farming community, and it depends largely on an efficient service in that area. When that function was given to district councils, there was great dismay, but to be fair to the councils, they introduced a detailed and effective service, and it is working. The Government seem to be following the principle: "If it works, fix it." I do not think that any other service could be better than the present one, because no organisation could better the councils' activities in that respect.

On contracting out generally, in most instances, particularly in health and some other areas, the quality of the service has deteriorated. I do not think there is any dispute about that, and certainly the terms and conditions of employment have deteriorated considerably under privatisation. That is capable of absolute proof. Time prevents me from going into detail in many areas, but the issue that concerns me most is contracting out in relation to part IV, article 17, and schedule 5(5), on social and other housing benefits that are currently dispensed and administered by the Housing Executive.

That is a large area of sensitive personal information. It relates to personal, financial, medical and social details, and details on special family problems. There are even personal details, and they all contribute to the making of decisions on benefit—or, indeed, housing. It is essential that that is kept secure by the Housing Executive, which has proved beyond doubt over the years that it is capable of effectively administering such matters.

Like other hon. Members, I am also greatly concerned about article 9 and the powers given to the various Departments without the necessary overriding constraints. Most of the suggestions in the order do not find great favour with me. It is the pursuit of dogma rather than of efficiency and savings.

In that context, the people I represent would certainly oppose the implementation of most of the order, because it will inevitably lead to the exportation of earnings from Northern Ireland. Consequently, there will be a rundown in some service jobs and perhaps some smaller manufacturing jobs. We could well do without that in an area of high unemployment. For those reasons, I entirely oppose the order.

11.28 pm

Sir John Wheeler: In the remaining minutes at my disposal, I shall endeavour to deal with some of the points that have been raised in the debate, to which I listened with great interest. Perhaps I should outline the purpose of the order and reiterate how the implementation of its provisions will benefit both business and administration in Northern Ireland.

The deregulation provisions will remove unnecessary restrictions on business and open up new market areas. The contracting out provisions will widen the potential for Departments, district councils and other bodies to introduce competition and further improve the quality and cost-effectiveness of public services.

To take up the point of the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), contracting out is an enabling measure, not a requirement. I believe that local authorities and others will wish to use the provisions of the order because they will want to get the best possible value for their money while retaining accountability. I shall deal with his concern about accountability straight away because I know that other hon. Members have an interest in it.

In all cases where a function is contracted out, the body letting the contract remains both accountable and legally liable for the acts and omissions of contractors in the same way as it is at present for its own or its employees' acts or omissions. Of course, Ministers remain responsible for policy to the House. I assure the hon. Member for South Down that there is no change in accountability. Indeed, it could be argued that a well-drafted contract makes the obligations among the different parties and interests more precise. It certainly makes the contractor more vulnerable to claims in the county court and by other means than would otherwise be the case.

Mr. McGrady: Accountability and responsibility are important in Northern Ireland. My experience as a Member of Parliament is that if I ask questions about a sector of a Department that has been agentised, my letter is not answered by the Minister, but referred to the agent. I cannot raise in the House questions that I have hitherto been able to raise on behalf of my constituents. The Minister may say that one is administration and the other policy, but the Howard situation shows that there is a grey area in between.

Sir John Wheeler: Mr. Deputy Speaker, we are moving beyond the scope of the order, but if you will allow me a brief indulgence, I shall try to assist the hon. Gentleman, because it is in the context of accountability that he raises his question. He is right to say that, where an agency has been established, it is the responsibility of its chief executive to respond to questions raised by Members of Parliament. However, Ministers are not removed from the scene; they remain firmly responsible for the policy objectives of the agency, and, indeed, set them.

In replying to questions from hon. Members, the chief executive of the agency is delivering direct and personal accountability for the work for which he or she is responsible. I suggest that that is an improvement in accountability. Instead of the chief executive being an anonymous civil servant, he becomes a person known in his or her own right, and accountability is accordingly advanced. Of course, the agency publishes its annual report and sets out its policy objectives. All those can be examined and challenged by Members of Parliament. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that.

Mr. William Ross: The Minister has given a full explanation of how the agencies allegedly work, but does he really think that the Child Support Agency would have lasted as long as it did without major revamping if it had been directly under the control of a responsible Minister in the House?

Sir John Wheeler: Again, we go somewhat adrift of the order. However, the Child Support Agency has been the subject of detailed analysis, including that of the Social Security Select Committee. One could therefore claim that the agency's accountability to the House and its Members has been very considerable. The Secretary of State for Social Security is of course responsible for policy, and I think that I am right in saying that, on many occasions on the Floor of the House, he has had to defend the agency's policy and its work. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will therefore allow that there is still accountability. I suspect that the Minister responsible for the agency believes it to be so, even if nobody else does.

The hon. Member for South Down also referred to employees being ignored by the order. Employees are not ignored. Contractors are required to observe the requirements of equal opportunities legislation and of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, known as TUPE. Those provisions remain.

Mr. McGrady: Will the Minister gave way?

Sir John Wheeler: In fairness to other hon. Members who have spoken, I should like to make a little more progress. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I should like to catch up on one or two other points that have been made.

The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) raised a number of points. He referred to forms in Northern Ireland. The importance of ensuring that forms are simplified and not too numerous is fully recognised by the Northern Ireland Departments. Indeed, a review of all forms unique to Northern Ireland and issued to business has been carried out by the Northern Ireland Departments, to ascertain whether all the forms are necessary and as user-friendly as possible. Of the 123 forms reviewed, 37 have been identified for redesign. So, work is in hand. The hon. Gentleman also asked whether there would be any significant changes in the licensing of taxi drivers. As is the norm, there would be consultation with the representatives of the organisations concerned.

The hon. Member for Lewisham, West also mentioned his interest in equal opportunities and fair employment. Since I have already referred to that, I can confirm that the Government are committed to promoting and securing equality of opportunity and equity of treatment for all people in Northern Ireland in accordance with the law. The equal opportunities legislation in Northern Ireland is among the most stringent in Europe, which underscores that point. Indeed, it is sometimes criticised for being so stringent. Guidance on market testing does not stipulate particular employment policies and practices, but it is made clear to the prospective contractor that he must comply fully with the relevant equal opportunities legislation. I am glad to tell the hon. Gentleman about that.

I thought that I also heard the hon. Member for Lewisham, West use the phrase "public sector bad; private sector good". I was puzzled about that, because his hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has become a convinced convert to the concept of contracting out and the best use of public money. When he spoke at the Manchester business school on 29 April, he said, among other things:

> "The first question any government should ask about public spending is what any business manager would ask: not how much more money you should spend, but how to use existing spending better."

[Sir John Wheeler]

I agree with him and welcome his remarks.

In looking at the order, I think that that means that there has to be the means of testing that very concept. How does one test whether the public sector is delivering value for money and providing quality unless one has the means of testing through contracting out and market testing? The hon. Member for South Down, who appeared to question the whole concept, should perhaps look at the remarks of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. It is clear that, whoever forms the Government of the UK, those concepts are now a firm part of our public service thinking.

Other hon Members raised various points, and I shall pick up one or two of them. The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) referred to spiritual values, and stated that they should be maintained as opposed to being deregulated. He referred in particular to the interesting part of the order that refers to a 1695 Act passed in the reign of our late sovereign William III—of blessed memory in Northern Ireland—and the intention of the order to allow participation in Sunday sport. I accept the hon. Gentleman's good intentions, but surely in this day and age it should be a matter for individual citizens—including those of Northern Ireland—to decide how to spend their time on a Sunday.

For many people, Sunday is the family day out, and deregulation of all Sunday sporting events will add to their choice. The hon. Member for South Down referred to Downpatrick race course—a facility that I have enjoyed visiting—and his dilemma as to whether the provisions of the order should apply there. If people want to go to the races on Sunday at Downpatrick, they should be allowed to do so. All hon. Members representing constituencies in Northern Ireland will know that, whatever the legislation says, it is almost impossible to reach Knutt's Corner on a fine Sunday in the summer because of the volume of traffic as people go to an illegal open-air market. People are therefore participating in activities on Sundays, and it is right that the law should be modernised to reflect what people wish to do.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The Minister said that I referred to a particular Act, but I did not. I asked my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) whether he accepted that there were places that we did not want to go—especially when going down the road of materialism following the Gadarene swine. In that context, the Minister's last illustration shows that the law is not being exercised at Knutt's Corner market.

Sir John Wheeler: The hon. Gentleman should employ his undoubted skills as a preacher to inculcate moral values in the people in Northern Ireland. The civil law must reflect the customs and practice of people in our age, and one must recognise that people in Northern Ireland choose to exercise their judgment in these matters on Sunday at Knutt's Corner.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) also asked why the order does not include the general order-making powers of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994. It is well established that, where policy changes are proposed and legislation is to be amended, proposals should be subject to parliamentary scrutiny. The general enabling powers in the Northern Ireland setting would have meant that amendments to effect deregulatory changes or remove obstacles to contracting out would have to be effected by subordinate legislation without any parliamentary consideration. The Government thought that that approach was not acceptable and so decided to employ this legislation today.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether people taking visitors to hospitals would still need PSV licences. Unfortunately, I cannot give him the answer that he sought on that, as PSV licences are not within the provisions of the order, and it will be necessary for me to make inquiries elsewhere in the Northern Ireland Departments. But when I have the answer to the hon. Gentleman, I shall write to him and give him the necessary information.

The hon. Member for South Down—

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14B (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community Documents).

The House divided: Ayes 101, Noes 14.

Division No. 119] [11.45 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (East Surrey)
Alexander, Richard
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Nicholas (North Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Matthew (Southport)
Bates, Michael
Beggs, Roy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Boswell, Tim
Bowis, John
Brandreth, Gyles
Brazier, Julian
Browning, Mrs Angela
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Peter
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Ru'cliff)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre For'st)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon Sir John
Cran, James
Deva, Nirj Joseph
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Elletson, Harold
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
French, Douglas
Gallie, Phil
Gillan, Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Alastair
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth, N)
Harris, David
Hawkins, Nick
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hendry, Charles
Hughes, Robert G (Harrow W)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Mrs Angela (Erewash)
Knight, Rt Hon Greg (Derby N)
Kynoch, George (Kincardine)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Luff, Peter
MacKay, Andrew
McLoughlin, Patrick
Maginnis, Ken
Maitland, Lady Olga
Malone, Gerald
Merchant, Piers
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Molyneaux, Rt Hon Sir James
Monro, Rt Hon Sir Hector
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steve
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, James
Pickles, Eric
Rathbone, Tim
Roberts, Rt Hon Sir Wyn
Robertson, Raymond (Ab'd'n S)
Robinson, Mark (Somerton)
Ross, William (E Londonderry)
Rowe, Andrew (Mid Kent)
Shaw, David (Dover)
Sims, Roger
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Smyth, The Reverend Martin
Spencer, Sir Derek
Squire, Robin (Hornchurch)
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Stephen, Michael
Streeter, Gary
Taylor, Rt Hon John D (Strgfd)

Thompson, Sir Donald (C'er V)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Townsend, Cyril D (Bexl'yh'th)
Twinn, Dr Ian
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Waterson, Nigel
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen
Wheeler, Rt Hon Sir John
Whittingdale, John
Wood, Timothy

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Simon Burns and
Dr. Liam Fox.

NOES

Brown, N (N'c'tle upon Tyne E)
Dewar, Donald
Dowd, Jim
Godman, Dr Norman A
Illsley, Eric
McGrady, Eddie
Michael, Alun
Mowlam, Marjorie
Pope, Greg
Prentice, Bridget (Lew'm E)
Robinson, Peter (Belfast E)
Skinner, Dennis
Worthington, Tony

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Llew Smith and
Mr. Harry Barnes.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 7th March, be approved.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

Trustees

That the Trustee Investments (Division of Trust Fund) Order 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 845), dated 18th March 1996, a copy of which was laid before this House on 19th March, be approved.

Charities

That the draft Charities (Trustee Investments Act 1961) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 21st March, be approved.

Social Security

That the draft Jobseeker's Allowance (Pilot Scheme) Regulations 1996, which were laid before this House on 28th March, be approved.

That the draft Income Support (Pilot Scheme) Regulations 1996, which were laid before this House on 28th March, be approved.—[Mr. Conway.]

Question agreed to.

European Central Bank

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Conway.]

11.56 pm

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): In recent times, we have celebrated the end of apartheid in South Africa, the anniversary of the Chartist struggle in south Wales and the work of the suffragettes in other parts of the country. Those people had many things in common: their bravery, their sense of justice and their recognition of the potential power of the vote. Indeed, their struggles helped to ensure that the millions of people who were disfranchised eventually received the vote.

In the United Kingdom and in other parts of the European Union, we are considering ditching the things that those people fought and sacrificed so much for, merely so that we can become members of a single currency and the economic and monetary union. How will this affect the value of the vote that those people struggled for? The answer is simple: among other things, we shall have to become a member of the European central bank. The European central bankers will be responsible for the major economic decisions, they will be appointed for eight years and, no matter what damage they inflict on us, no one will be able to remove them.

Democratically elected Governments will be helpless if they wish to tackle problems such as unemployment and poverty—the power to do so will no longer be in their hands. If hon. Members doubt this, they should do what the Chancellor of the Exchequer failed to do some time ago—read the Maastricht treaty. In particular, I refer hon. Members to the part of the treaty that states:

"Community institutions . . . and Governments of member states undertake not to seek to influence the members of the decision making bodies of the European central bank . . . in the performance of its tasks."

Not only will democratically elected Governments no longer be responsible for the major economic decisions; as that quotation shows, they will not even be able to influence those unelected and unaccountable bankers. While people will still have the right to vote, that vote will be a gesture—a charade—because the parties, peoples and Governments for whom they vote will no longer have powers to rectify the wrongs inflicted on them.

We saw an example of the transfer of powers from democratically elected politicians to unelected and unaccountable bankers some months ago. Then, the Chancellor of the Exchequer overruled the Governor of the Bank of England on interest rate levels; but, if we join the single currency, it will be the Euro-bankers and not the Chancellor of the Exchequer who will make decisions on interests rate levels, the money supply, Government borrowing and, indeed, whether we wish to devalue. As the Maastricht treaty reveals, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not even be allowed to influence such decisions: if he does, he will be acting illegally. I hope that some hon. Members appreciate the irony of that.

In "A Partnership of Nations" the Government have the audacity to claim that they are trying to prevent "the erosion of national parliaments",

[Mr. Llew Smith]

and they state elsewhere in the same document that they intend to

"entrench subsidiarity into the Treaty".

That is nonsense. Subsidiarity means bringing power closer to the people; it certainly does not mean putting it into the hands of bankers. To agree to that process would be to betray our history of Chartism, and to betray the suffragettes and many other brave people.

Some, while recognising the undemocratic nature of the treaty, still seem to believe that all is not lost, because those bankers could still agree on progressive policies to create jobs and combat poverty. That would be a most unusual type of banker. If anyone is naive enough to believe such a notion, a quick glance at the treaty will reveal that the central bank's objective is not to overcome unemployment. There are 50 clauses and four protocols concerning price stability, but not one clause spells out anything about unemployment.

I am also interested in the position of the Welsh and Scottish nationalists: their pro-single currency, pro-European central bank stance, together with their dream of independence. If that should ever come about—I hope that it will not—they will immediately recognise that it is independence in name only. The most important decisions will be made by that most powerful of all quangos, the European central bank.

My position is straightforward. Not only do I—like the nationalists and others—oppose rule by quango in Wales, Scotland and other parts of the United Kingdom; unlike them, I also oppose such rule by quango from Europe. I want to extend democracy and accountability, rather than destroying them. Nor—this is linked to what I have just said—do I understand those who want to devolve power to a Welsh Assembly or Parliament, while at the same time supporting the centralisation of power in the hands of the European central bank in Frankfurt. The powers of all the quangos in Wales, Scotland and, indeed, the United Kingdom will be not nearly as great as those of that one quango based in Frankfurt.

The European central bank should not be seen in isolation from the single currency and economic and monetary union. What effect will the adoption of a single currency have on policy-making and our economy? Writing in the Sunday Times on 31 December last year, the respected political commentator Peter Kellner had this to say:

"any country which abandoned its national currency not only loses the right to devalue; it also loses its power over interest rates, money supply and (to some extent) government borrowing . . . Britain would lose all real control of its economic destiny.

With a single currency, changes in interest rates, or the price of oil or food on the world market, will affect different countries in different ways. Yet national governments will lack the means to respond to the different problems that arise. They will have none of the financial levers that finance ministers normally use in order to avert recession or minimise hardship. If, for reasons outside its control a country tied to the euro suddenly becomes less competitive, its government will have little or no power to prevent a sharp rise in unemployment."

The European central bank, the single currency and economic and monetary union are all inter-related and dependent on one another, and all lead to a similar end: a society lacking in fairness, democracy and accountability. I find that unacceptable; I want to create a society in which individuals, councils, Parliaments and corporations are more accountable and more democratic. I want to create a society over which people feel they have some control and in which they are not simply victims of the power game. I may be described as old Labour and old-fashioned. If so, all I can say is that I have no intention of changing.

12.7 am

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on obtaining this Adjournment debate. I want to address my remarks to the issue of independent central banks—whether the European central bank or central banks in general.

Economists like to see themselves as pursuing a scientific discipline, but more often than not it seems like a species of faith healing. Every year, economists seize on some new cure-all for the long-term decline of the British economy. In the 1970s, the big issue that economists liked to talk about was the balance of payments. A few years ago, the important remedy for the decline of the British economy was meant to be fixed exchange rates and the exchange rate mechanism. A recurring fashion in recent years has been the fashion for independent central banks. In the context of European monetary union, it would be an independent European central bank.

I want to explode some of the myths about independent central banks—whether about the European central bank or about making our own Bank of England independent. The argument for an independent central bank is that it will be more effective in dealing with inflation—if it were a European central bank, it would be more effective on a Europewide scale. That has been repeated so many times by politicians—both Labour and Government—and by economists, pundits and newspaper columnists that it has taken on the status of fact.

However, there is no statistical or empirical basis for the belief that simply having an independent European central bank, independent of politicians, will have any effect on European inflation levels. In 1994, the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, on which I have the honour to serve, considered the role of the Bank of England and issues relating to independence.

Our special adviser, Andrew Wood, said that, even where price stability was a central bank aim, there was only a weak causal connection between central bank independence and low inflation. Another of our advisers said that there was no conclusive statistical evidence of a causal relationship between the status of the central bank and inflation performance. In other words, the main empirical argument for a European central bank that is independent of politicians—that somehow it would help to keep inflation low—has no basis in fact. Yet politicians and pundits, whether in the context of debates about Europe or the Bank of England, continue to pursue that argument.

One may ask, if that argument has no statistical basis, why people have become so fixated on the notion that a European central bank that is independent of politicians would somehow bear down on inflation. I believe that that is simple reverse causality: because the Germans, who have had an independent central bank since the war, have been so successful in keeping down inflation, people think that a European central bank would have the same effect in Europe.

Anyone who has studied the German economy and politics knows, however, that there are all sorts of underlying reasons why German politicians and the German public have been so willing to swallow the policies that keep inflation low. The reverse causality argument—which says that, because the Bundesbank has been so successful, Europe needs a European central bank that is independent of politicians—does not stand up statistically.

Moving away from the facts and figures, the chattering classes and the people who claim to know about economics reiterate constantly the idea that monetary policy is so important that it should be taken away from politicians. They claim that the temptation for politicians to debase the currency should be removed. The argument for central bank independence and for a European central bank has found some favour with those not just on the Government Benches but on my own side.

In that context, I remind the House of evidence given to the Committee by Sir Douglas Wass, who, as some hon. Members will know, is a former permanent secretary to the Treasury. On the question of a European central bank that is independent of politicians, he said:

"It is not the job of central bankers to judge how far it is right to go in damaging the standard of living of some members of the community, or destroying the jobs of others, in order to bring inflation on to some particular path. These are broad matters as much of social welfare as of economics. The decisions of ministers may not escape criticism; they rarely do. But, that it is and should be their responsibility to make the decisions, seems to us to follow from the nature of the decisions and the way they work".

That is the central argument against a European central bank. The statistical case that independent central banks bear down on inflation has yet to be made. The idea that one can extract monetary policy, with all its implications for unemployment, from wider political considerations seems quite wrong; in other words, decisions to do with the exchange rate and monetary policy are too important to be left to bankers—whether they are European central bankers or our own wonderful Eddie George.

I refer once again to Sir Douglas, because I think that, as an ex-permanent secretary to the Treasury, he might know more about the subject than anyone in the House. He said:

"It seems to us to be fundamentally mischievous for a significant element of the polity affecting these issues to be removed from the domain of a democratically elected and responsible government and handed to that of an appointed and unaccountable central bank".

The arguments against an independent central bank—whether it is opposition to a European central bank or in opposition to giving independence to the Bank of England—are clear. There is no factual evidence to suggest that, if we had an independent European central bank tomorrow, it would be able to replicate Europewide the success that the Germans have had until recently in fighting inflation. It would be fundamentally undemocratic to take away from politicians and give to central bankers the important decisions that have such a wide-ranging effect on the whole community.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent, I oppose economic and monetary union under the terms set out in the Maastricht treaty, because I believe that there are democratic issues involved. Even if a British Government—the current Government or a Labour Government—wanted to pursue precisely the same policies that are in the Maastricht criteria, the British electorate should have the chance to elect the people who make those decisions. It is quite wrong for such important leaders of monetary policy to be handed over to central bankers. I am glad to support my hon. Friend in his Adjournment debate.

12.14 am

The Paymaster General (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): The hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) has chosen an important subject for his debate. He spoke with great clarity against the concept of a independent European central bank, chiefly on the ground of what he perceived as a lack of democracy.

The functions and powers of the European central bank are defined in the treaty of Rome, as amended—particularly as it was amended at Maastricht—which sets out the phased introduction and the steps on the way to full economic and monetary union in the European Union.

The bank is envisaged as being independent. It would be even more independent than the Bundesbank, which is frequently used as an example of a bank that is free of direct political interference. The object of making it independent is to ensure that it will deliver its primary objective—again as laid out in the treaty—of achieving price stability. One way of doing that is to ensure that political interference, particularly of a short-term nature, is minimised or eliminated altogether.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, that stage 3 of the economic and monetary union would entail the transfer of decision making about interest rates and monetary policy from the Bank of England and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the European central bank. That would be an irreversible transfer of decision making.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the consequences of that. Although he gave a somewhat partial and one-sided view of the difficulties, he touched on important possible consequences and considerations that will have to be debated in the House and the country before we make a decision about that final transfer.

He was right to draw attention to the possibility of differential adjustments and external shocks affecting one part of the single currency zone as against another. In the past, Britain has been affected in different ways from certain continental countries by energy shocks, for example. If our interest rate were laid down by a single European central bank, we would give up national autonomy over interest rates. Therefore, we would be unable to adjust our interest rates to respond to a possible local recession.

The hon. Gentleman did not mention the possibility that labour could migrate out of countries in recession to other parts of the European Union. However, such migration is not a feature of the European Union and realistically would not be an effective short-term adjustment mechanism. Nor did he touch on the possibility that wages and prices would have to adjust to respond to those differences. I know that the hon. Gentleman would not welcome such a possibility because it could mean that wages and prices had to adjust downwards, at least in real terms. Moreover, many developments in EU social, economic and employment policy go in the opposite direction and possibly make the market more rigid and less responsive.

Ms Abbott: The Minister has talked about the possibility of wages and prices adjusting within an

[Ms Abbott]

EMU-type regime. We found when we entered the ERM and locked exchange rates—having been told that all would be well because wages and prices would adjust—that wages and prices did not adjust, the ERM exploded and we had to leave it rather ignominiously. Given that experience, what makes the Minister think that wages and prices would be any more responsive within EMU and under an independent European central bank?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Lady is right to point out possible lessons to be learned from the ERM experience, which is why the Government have announced that they have no plans to re-enter such an exchange rate mechanism. But enthusiasts for a single currency point out that, if the possibility of a devaluation is permanently removed, other adjustment mechanisms might have to be found. So wages and prices might have to adjust in a way that does not happen now, while the other escape route is still available.

The other option is to respond to economic developments through expenditure and taxation mechanisms, although they will be somewhat restricted by the prohibition on excessive deficits which becomes binding in stage 3. That leaves only the possibility of large transfer payments between member states, which might require a very large increase in the European budget—an idea not being advanced in any quarter at present.

Mr. Llew Smith: The Minister rightly says that the transfer payments would be very large. Will he be more specific? He seems also to accept my point about the transfer of economic power from elected politicians to appointed and unaccountable bankers. If that happened, and the bankers gained the sort of powers that are written into the treaties, what powers would be left to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and a democratically elected Parliament with which to bring about the changes that the Government of the day thought necessary?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have to answer two complicated questions in half a minute. Any formal influence is ruled out by the treaty: member states "shall not" directly influence their members of the European central bank. The size of the European budget might have to increase enormously to render the adjustment mechanisms comparable with those available to member states in the form of their tax and expenditure programmes.

In the United States, a very large federal budget acts as a stabilising mechanism. When a state or zone goes into recession, it pays fewer taxes to the federal Government and receives back larger benefit payments. That acts as an automatic stabiliser of some potency. For the European budget to act in that way, the present 1.2 per cent. maximum of gross national product which forms a ceiling to the budget would have to be removed altogether, and there would be a spectacular increase in the size of that budget.

Luckily, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister secured the opt-out from stage 3, so it will be up to this House and the Government of the day to make the decision.

Unhappily, the Opposition are not enthusiastic about the opt-out. They have agreed in principle to stage 3 and they have not promised that they would hold a referendum, if and when they have an opportunity to recommend stage 3. I call that a severe democratic deficit on the part of those who occupy the Opposition Front Bench, which no doubt the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Lady will take up with the leaders of their party.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-four minutes past Twelve midnight.

House of Commons

Thursday 2 May 1996

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

BODMIN MOOR COMMONS BILL [Lords] (By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

To be read a Second time upon Thursday 9 May.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Abortion

1. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to extend the Abortion Act 1967 to Northern Ireland. [26375]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Malcolm Moss): I have no plans to extend the Act to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brown: I understand entirely the answer that my hon. Friend gave to my question, and I am sure that that answer will be welcomed by most hon. Members representing the Province. Why do we continue to legislate differently for the Province than for the rest of the kingdom?

Mr. Moss: The Government did not include Northern Ireland in the Abortion Act because at that time they considered the reform of social law in that very sensitive area to be a proper matter for a devolved administration; that remains the Government's view.

Dr. Hendron: The Minister will recall that, last year, an all-party delegation met the Prime Minister to discuss that question, and we all expressed our absolute and total opposition to any extension of the 1967 Act to Northern Ireland. I hope that the Secretary of State or the Minister will confirm that the Government will make no effort to extend that Act.

Mr. Moss: I am happy to confirm the answer I gave some moments earlier.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: My hon. Friend might like to know that I led that delegation to meet the Prime Minister, and I and other hon. Members are delighted to learn that the policy has not changed. It has the personal support of the Prime Minister and the unequivocal and unanimous support of hon. Members from all political parties in the House that represent the Province.

Mr. Moss: I am aware of the deputation that the hon. Lady led to the Prime Minister, and I am happy to repeat his assurance that there are no plans to extend that Act to Northern Ireland.

Motorway Emergency Telephones

2. Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what reasons the emergency telephone system on motorways is to be replaced; and if he will make a statement. [26376]

Mr. Moss: The chief executive of the Department of the Environment's road service advises me that the existing motorway emergency telephone system is more than 30 years old and is now obsolete. Many of the spare parts needed to maintain it are no longer available. In the interests of safety, it is therefore imperative that a new replacement system be provided.

Mr. Taylor: If the telephone system is 30 years old today, it was 29 years old yesterday. Why has it suddenly become a priority expenditure in the roads programme in Northern Ireland? It has never been in the roads programme before. Why has it replaced important major road schemes in the constituency of Strangford, which has not had a major road scheme for many years? Especially, I name the Comber bypass and the major link road between the Comber road and the Portaferry road in Newtownards, both of which were on the road programme and both of which have been damaged by the sudden inclusion of a new telephone system on the motorways. Is the real reason for the priority that the new telephone system is in some way connected with the provision of cable television in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Moss: In some ways, I regret having to contradict what the hon. Gentleman just said. The telephone system was first assessed by independent consultants back in March 1989, and recommendations in the short term were implemented in 1990 and 1991. It was recommended that the entire system be replaced, and the scheme first appeared in the five-year programme in 1993-94. We had to prioritise the road programme for the next five years, and the Comber bypass has slipped by only one year.

Unemployment

3. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what changes have taken place in youth and long-term unemployment in the past 12 months. [26377]

10. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the percentage change in the level of unemployment in the Province in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [26384]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Over the year to March 1996, youth unemployment in Northern Ireland fell by 6.1 per cent. and long-term unemployment by 9.1 per cent. The headline unemployment total fell by 5.1 per cent., or 4,580.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the prospects for enduring social stability in Northern Ireland are enhanced by that welcome news? Given the historically high levels of long-term unemployment in the Province, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the clear fall in long-term unemployment is welcome, especially as it is nearly twice the overall rate of decline?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: My hon. Friend is right. Long-term unemployment has fallen by 9.1 per cent. compared with 5.1 per cent. for unemployment overall. We continue to work extensively in the area and are pleased that we are reskilling and retraining that group of people to be competitive in gaining the jobs that we are attracting to the Province.

Mr. Coombs: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that a significant contribution to the improvement in the unemployment figures which he has just announced comes from tourism in Northern Ireland, which has received a tremendous boost from the more peaceful times of the past two years? Can he think of anything more important to continued prosperity and job creation in Northern Ireland than that visitors should feel secure in coming there? Can there be anything more important than an immediate resumption of the ceasefire?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and I endorse everything that he has said. The total number of out-of-country visitors for 1995, reaching 1,557,000, constitute a 20 per cent. increase on the number in 1994. The boost to employment that that gives works in exactly the way that my hon. Friend describes. There has never been any excuse for violence and the return to the ceasefire of August 1994, and an improvement on it, is urgently required.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: I am sure that the Minister is aware of the consternation surrounding the reduction in jobs in the action for community employment projects throughout the Province. In that connection, will he consider the problems of released prisoners and set up some form of job training agency under the auspices of the Training and Employment Agency?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I know my hon. Friend's concern with the unemployment problems in his constituency. He will be glad that, over the year, there has been a reduction of 8.9 per cent. in his constituency. It is important that prisoners should be helped to be reintroduced into self-supporting and lawful life outside prison, and I take note of what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Will the Secretary of State explain why, if there is to be support for youths in long-term unemployment, £12 million has been taken from the ACE budget? Is it to be restored?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: We must consider the best and most effective way in which our public expenditure can be deployed. The first and foremost avenue for that should be to encourage private sector investment, which has been so successful in the past year or so. The hon. and learned Gentleman will know that the ACE programme has been reduced—I did not enjoy doing that, but we did it for that purpose. The community work programme comprises three pilot schemes that provide improved conditions and a more attractive scheme in comparison with ACE. We are looking forward to seeing the results of their evaluation.

Rev. William McCrea: Bearing in mind the fact that the largest employer in the Province is agriculture and the crisis that it faces, what hope can the Secretary of State give to young farmers and young people hoping to come into the family farm? Does the Secretary of State accept that many European Governments, such as those of Germany, France and the Irish Republic, have been playing selfish games with the British beef industry? Is it not about time they were told where and when to get off? Finally, in future negotiations, will the Secretary of State bat for Ulster beef, which is no doubt the best in Europe?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Many people take that view, not least the Dutch. The hon. Gentleman will know that very big importers from Holland have stipulated that all beef from the United Kingdom should come exclusively from Northern Ireland. When the ban was imposed, they took the trouble to visit Northern Ireland to say they would continue in that if their Government allowed them to do so. I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of the agriculture industry. Yesterday, I had the pleasure of speaking at the Ulster Farmers Union annual general meeting where, although they did not need to do so, farmers stressed the importance of getting the wholly unjustified ban lifted, not just from Northern Ireland but from the United Kingdom. My colleagues and I will certainly press for that with utmost vigour.

Tourism

4. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what further measures are proposed to attract visitors to Northern Ireland from (a) the rest of the United Kingdom, (b) the Republic of Ireland and (c) overseas; and if he will make a statement. [26378]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Ancram): The Northern Ireland tourist board continues to promote Northern Ireland vigorously in all identified markets. Through co-operative campaigns with the relevant tourist authorities, it will strive to build on the considerable growth in visitor arrivals in 1995. Continual priority is being paid to increasing facilities and improving standards.

Mr. Mackinlay: Is the Minister aware that the greatest hindrance to visitors leaving London for Northern Ireland is not the mountains, streams, rivers or seas, but the high prices and profits of British Airways and other principal operators between London and Northern Ireland? Will he make it his business to encourage British Airways and other principal carriers to reduce the prices of air fares between Northern Ireland and London's principal airports with a view to increasing the number of people—visitors and those living in London and Northern Ireland—who can use those routes? Is he aware that there is great competition over the route between London and Dublin with Ryan Air, which offers a genuinely low fare? Will he encourage other budget airlines to operate routes, provide competition and increase mobility?

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that the airlines will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said. The Government wish to encourage all those involved in promoting tourism to do so in a way that attracts the maximum number of visitors. It is interesting to note that, despite what the hon. Gentleman says, in 1995 there was a 14 per cent. increase on the previous year in the number of visitors from Great Britain. That was most encouraging. My right hon and learned Friend has already mentioned the overall increase of 20 per cent. It is also interesting to note that there was a 53 per cent. increase in the number of tourists from north America and a 60 per cent. increase in the number of tourists from Australia and New Zealand. All in all, the Northern Ireland tourism industry is doing very well at promoting itself, increasing the number of holiday visitors and creating jobs in the process.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the success of the Northern Ireland tourism industry depends on its ability to offer competitive prices? How would that competitive position be affected by the introduction of a national minimum wage or by the social chapter being signed?

Mr. Ancram: I very much agree with my hon. Friend, who makes a good point. One reason why Northern Ireland is doing well, not only in tourism but in general economic terms, is that the employment regulations are favourable to economic growth and activity. Certainly, if we were to sign up for the social chapter that would no longer happen.

Mr. William Ross: We were told earlier that last year roughly as many people came to visit Northern Ireland as actually live there. Although we commend the efforts of those who increase the number of visitors, what is the point of attracting people to Northern Ireland if we do not have good-quality accommodation for them? What steps do the Government and the tourist board intend to take to increase the amount of reasonable-quality accommodation in the main tourist areas, which were almost overcome by the number of visitors last year?

Mr. Ancram: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, in a sense, we were victims of our own success last year, but I am sure that he will agree that that is the right kind of problem to have. I am delighted that hotel investment is taking place. Both the Stakis and Jurys hotel groups recently announced major hotel investments in Northern Ireland.

It is also worth reminding the hon. Gentleman that, since the beginning of 1995, the Northern Ireland tourist board has agreed, or has been in the process of negotiating, assistance to the hotel industry of £24 million. That investment represents total expenditure of more than £98 million on new and improved hotels. I hope that the problems caused by last year's success will gradually be met through such encouragement and support.

Terrorism

5. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his latest assessment of the capability of the Provisional IRA to mount a terrorist campaign. [26379]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Sir John Wheeler): It is a fact that the Provisional IRA remains a formidably organised terrorist structure with the personnel and the weaponry available to mount a terrorist campaign, as evidenced by recent bomb attacks in London and other activities in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that last week's attempt to blow up Hammersmith bridge is a further chilling reminder of the terrorist capabilities of the Provisional IRA? Does that kind of incident not show that we need to demand not only the decommissioning of weapons but the standing down and dismantling of the terrorist structure? Nothing less will convince the people of Northern Ireland and of the United Kingdom of the IRA's real intentions with regard to peace.

Sir John Wheeler: My hon. Friend is quite right: the standing down of the terrorist structure is essential. The Mitchell commission report said:

> "There must be a commitment and adherence to the fundamental principles of democracy and non-violence. All participants in any future all-party negotiations should confirm their commitment to those principles and honour them".

There can be no place for those who possess stockpiles of Semtex and weapons or who engage in racketeering or in punishment attacks. My hon. Friend is right to say that the confidence of all people depends on adherence to those principles.

Miss Hoey: Does the Minister agree that it would be inconceivable if the Republic of Ireland, which is an independent country, were to face the same terrorist threat as the United Kingdom, with bombs being found now and again—some of which explode and some which do not? The Irish Government would be much more up-front in dealing with those who were perpetuating terrorism. Does the Minister believe that we could learn some lessons from how the Republic of Ireland faced up to terrorism when it was occurring in that country?

Sir John Wheeler: The Republic's security forces, and the Garda Siochana in particular, co-operate very well with the Royal Ulster Constabulary. There is an excellent relationship between the two police forces who work closely together. The hon. Lady is right: it is a serious matter. Since 9 February, there have been six terrorist bombings in London alone, apart from the daily evil of punishment attacks in Northern Ireland. It is essential that the Governments continue to explore the best possible ways of extending and improving co-operation between the security forces and the police services in particular.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the Minister confirm that the IRA is still training, making weapons and attacking people by letter and by intimidation? Will he confirm that the police have recently visited many people in our constituencies to ask them to leave their homes and go to places of safety? Will he join me today in condemning the scurrilous attack made yesterday at the forum of the British-Irish interparliamentary body on the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire)? He was attacked because he denounced the IRA, and he was told by Paddy Harte that his attitude had caused many generations of Irish people to kill each other and to be anti-British. When the hon. Gentleman claimed that Northern Ireland was his country also, he was rebuked by the same Paddy Harte.

Sir John Wheeler: The hon. Gentleman is quite right when he describes the activities of the Provisional IRA. Unhappily, the targeting, training and other criminal activities continue. It is a regrettable fact that this year, to 21 April, there have been no fewer than 98 so-called punishment attacks on people in Northern Ireland. That is exactly double the number over the same period in 1995, and 61 of the beatings have been attributed to Republican groups. It is essential that that evil ends if there is to be confidence in an ensuing peace process.

I note the hon. Gentleman's comments about the forum in Dublin and I am sorry to hear them.

Ms Mowlam: Labour agrees with the point just made by the Minister about punishment beatings. Unless they end, the trust and confidence needed will not be engendered. Does the Minister share our view that the issue of decommissioning of paramilitary weapons must be addressed at the beginning of the negotiations on 10 June and that the Mitchell report provides the best way to deal with that issue? In addition, does the Minister agree that the proposals advanced by the Irish Foreign Minister, Dick Spring, are entirely in keeping with the report and provide the most sensible way to proceed if we are to avoid returning to the logjam on that issue when the negotiations start on 10 June?

Sir John Wheeler: The Government's position is based on the principles of the Mitchell report. It lays down a clear route if those engaged in terrorist activities wish to renounce violence and enter the democratic process. As I have said, the six principles in the Mitchell report set out very clearly what they must do, but they have to honour those principles. That will be essential if there is to be progress. I agree with the hon. Lady that the first item on the agenda must be decommissioning.

Deregulation

6. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to promote further deregulation measures in the Province. [26380]

Sir John Wheeler: I shall do so through the draft Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, which the House debated yesterday, and six specific deregulatory amendments will be made to Northern Ireland legislation.

Mr. Steen: As deregulation has not, unfortunately, been a great success in Great Britain—given that 7,839 statutory instruments have been passed in the past two years and only a few hundred have been repealed, although we have a £1.3 million task force of 43 staff in the Deputy Prime Minister's office, and that only 24 orders have come out of the Select Committee on Deregulation—why does the Minister think that we should impose the same disadvantages that Great Britain has had on Northern Ireland?

Sir John Wheeler: My hon. Friend took a distinguished part in the debate late last night on the draft Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 which, as the House knows, was passed shortly before midnight. He expressed himself in similar terms during that debate and I shall ensure that my right hon. and hon. Friends in Great Britain are made aware of his interest and concerns. I can assure him that in Northern Ireland we shall proceed with all due dispatch to ensure that our contracting-out and deregulatory arrangements work as efficiently and effectively as they can.

Sir James Molyneaux: As one who is more optimistic than the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), may I make a point to the Minister? Given the success and the ability demonstrated by the district councils in Northern Ireland in promoting in-house tendering, will the Minister make use of last night's Order in Council and enable councils to compete with private suppliers from the private sector?

Sir John Wheeler: As the right hon. Gentleman will know, last night's order will not compel, but will enable councils and other bodies to contract out and to compete for tendering. I hope that they will do so, because the evidence is that millions of pounds have been saved in Northern Ireland—money that can be better used for the services that people want. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman's support will be made widely known in Northern Ireland.

